Mr. Balfour is reluctant to trouble you with the draft in the present press of urgent business, but he feels that he would not be justified in submitting it to His Majesty in Council without your approval, in view of the possibility that its validity may be tested on an appeal to the Privy Council, or that its issue may give rise to discussion in Parliament. He would, therefore, be glad if you would take the draft Order into consideration and favour him with your opinion as to whether it is fit and proper to be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval. A telegram recently received from His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Peking indicates that the powers conferred by the Order in Council are urgently required, and Mr. Balfour would therefore be grateful to be favoured with your opinion at your very earliest convenience.

I have, &c.
VICTOR WELLESLEY.

Report.

As altered* and initialled by us the draft Order is, in our opinion, fit and proper to be submitted to the King for the approval of His Majesty in Council.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.

Law Officers' Department,
March 1, 1917.

Annex.

Draft China (War Powers) Order in Council, 1917.

WHEREAS by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means His Majesty the King has jurisdiction in China:

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890," or otherwise in His Majesty vested,

* Since the date of this Report the Law Officers have approved the draft Order in the form in which it was submitted to them.

is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered as follows:—

1. This Order may be cited as "The China (War Powers) Order in Council, 1917," and shall be read as one with the "China Order in Council, 1904" (hereinafter called the "Principal Order"), and with any Order amending the same.

2. Where in the opinion of the Minister there are reasonable grounds for believing that any British subject has acted, is acting, or is about to act, in a manner prejudicial to the public safety, or to the defence, peace, or security of His Majesty's dominions or of any part of them, the Minister may by order in writing direct that such person—

- (a.) Shall not enter, reside, or remain in any area specified in the Order;
- (b.) Shall reside or remain in any area so specified;
- (c.) Shall conduct himself in such manner, or abstain from such acts, or take such order with any property in his possession or under his control, as may be specified in such Order;
- (d.) Shall be detained in custody in such place as may be specified in the Order; and the person so detained shall be deemed for all purposes to be in legal custody.

3. If any person in respect of whom an Order is made under paragraph (a), (b), or (c) of the preceding article fails to comply with any of the provisions of the Order, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Order, and shall be liable on conviction by the Court to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding three years; provided, however, that nothing in this article shall be deemed to empower a Provincial Court to award any sentence greater than is authorised by Article 59 (2) of the Principal Order.

4. Where in the opinion of the Minister it is expedient that any person, in respect of whom the provisions of Article 2 of this Order apply, should be deported from China to some place in His Majesty's dominions, he shall send to the Supreme Court a certificate under his hand and seal to that effect, and the Supreme Court may thereupon order that such person shall be deported from China to the place specified in such certificate. The provisions of the Principal Order, and of any Order amending the same, relative to deportation shall, subject to the provisions of this Order, apply to any deportation effected under this article.

5. If any person deported under this Order returns to China without permission in writing of the Minister (which permission the Minister may give) he shall (without prejudice to any liability under Article 83 (11) of the Principal Order) be guilty of an offence against this Order, and shall be liable on conviction by the Court to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding three years; provided, however, that nothing in this article shall be deemed to empower a Provincial Court to award any sentence greater than is authorised by Article 59 (2) of the Principal Order.

6. This Order shall take effect on the day on which the text thereof is first exhibited in the public office of the Supreme Court at Shanghai, along with a certificate under the hand of the Minister stating that he has been informed by telegraph by the Secretary of State that the Order has been passed in the form annexed to the certificate; and shall remain in force only during the continuance of the present war.

And the Right Honourable Arthur James Balfour, one of our Principal Secretaries of State, is to give the necessary directions herein.

F. S.
G. H.

1917

(6)

FRANCE.

[222594]

No. 2.

[File 134659/1917.]

[November 20, 1917.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 15, 1917.

Anglo-French Declaration of 1904: Interpretation of provisions respecting Egypt.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Balfour, to request your opinion as to whether the French Government are still entitled to the benefit of certain provisions relating to Egypt in article 1 of the Anglo-French Declaration of 1904.

Conversations have been taking place, and will shortly be resumed, between representatives of the British and French Governments for the purpose of determining the future position of the two countries in Morocco and Egypt respectively.

In Morocco Great Britain still maintains her extra-territorial rights, though in 1914 His Majesty's Government adhered to the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912, which in effect creates a French protectorate in the French zone in Morocco.

In Egypt, France maintains her extra-territorial rights, though she has recognised the protectorate which His Majesty's Government declared of that country soon after the entry of Turkey into the present war on the 5th November, 1914.

Since 1904, when Great Britain and France entered into a series of arrangements for settling the numerous difficulties which had existed between the two countries up till then, recognition by France of the predominant position of His Majesty's Government in Egypt has been regarded as the counterpart of the recognition by His Majesty's Government of the predominant position of France in Morocco.

Among the agreements entered into in 1904 was the Anglo-French Declaration which dealt with the interests of the two countries in Egypt and Morocco respectively. The position in Morocco, however, has been greatly modified by the intrusion of Germany, and the determination she displayed not to allow her interests to be ignored. The result was the Act of Algeciras of 1906, and at a later date the Franco-German Agreement of 1911.

Both the British and French Governments realise that the time is now ripe for terminating the system of extra-territorial jurisdiction in Morocco as well as in Egypt. In Morocco French courts are already in existence, and codes on modern lines have been introduced. In Egypt similar arrangements are in course of preparation.

The desire of the French Government in Morocco is to get rid of the Act of Algeciras and the Agreement of 1911, and to return both as to Egypt and as to Morocco to the position established by the Anglo-French Declaration of 1904. So far as regards Morocco, no difficulty arises with regard to the interpretation of that instrument, but with regard to Egypt Mr. Balfour is anxious to obtain your opinion as to whether in the events that have happened the French Government are entitled to maintain a claim to the directorship of the Department of Antiquities, and to the privileged position of their schools in Egypt as laid down in the last two paragraphs of article 1.

The Declaration of 1904 (Paper A) consisted of two parts: the published articles and the secret articles; the latter were not made public until 1911. The published articles are nine in number, and in Nos. 1 and 2 His Majesty's Government and the French Government declare that "they have no intention of altering the political status" of Egypt and Morocco respectively. The secret article 1 provides that in the event of either Government finding themselves constrained by the force of circumstances "to modify their policy" as to Egypt or Morocco, Nos. 4, 6, and 7 of the published articles are to stand. It would seem to follow that if the secret article 1 comes into play, the published article 1, not being among those for the maintenance of which special provision is made, is not to stand. If that is so, the provisions in the last two paragraphs of published article 1 would disappear. It is important therefore to know whether the Declaration of the British protectorate in 1914 (now accepted by France) constitutes a "modification of policy" in respect of Egypt, calculated to bring secret article 1 into force. On this point, I am to enclose a memorandum (Paper B) which has been prepared in the library of this Department giving such information as is afforded by the record of the negotiations as to the meaning of the article.

FRANCE.

7

I am also to enclose an extract from the "Gazette" containing the announcement of the British protectorate (Paper C); a copy of a circular telegram to the Powers, dated the 18th December, 1914 (Paper D); and a rescript addressed to the new Sultan of Egypt, dated the 19th December, 1914 (Paper E).

I am to request that you will favour Mr. Balfour with your opinion whether in the events that have happened the French Government are still entitled to claim the benefit of the last two paragraphs of article 1 of the Anglo-French Declaration of 1904.

Mr. Balfour would at the same time be glad to receive any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

As the conversations are to be resumed very shortly, Mr. Balfour would be glad to receive your report at an early date.

I have, &c.

MAURICE DE BUNSEN.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Declaration between the United Kingdom and France respecting Egypt and Morocco, April 8, 1904.
- (B.) Library Memorandum, November 9, 1917.
- (C.) "London Gazette" of December 15, 1914 (3rd Supplement, December 18, 1914).
- (D.) Circular telegram of December 18, 1914.
- (E.) Rescript addressed to Sultan of Egypt December 19, 1914. ("Recueil des documents relatifs à la guerre," vol. 1, p. 191, Foreign Office Library, 8vo, 9235.)

Report.

In our opinion the words "modify their policy in respect of Egypt" in article 1 of the secret articles of the Anglo-French Declaration of 1904 refer to the policy declared in article 1 of the published articles of the same date, namely, that His Majesty's Government had no intention of altering the political status of Egypt.

We are therefore of opinion that the action of His Majesty's Government, as stated in the notice of the 18th December, 1914, placing Egypt under the protection of His Majesty and declaring Egypt to be a British protectorate, is an alteration of the status of Egypt, and therefore a modification of policy in respect of Egypt, within the meaning of article 1 of the secret articles of 1904.

We are further of opinion that the whole of the provisions of the published articles of the Declaration of 1904 were conditional on the political status of Egypt remaining unaltered, and that upon an alteration in the political status of Egypt taking place the published articles are (except as otherwise preserved) no longer binding. In our opinion this effect is recognised by article 1 of the secret articles which provides that, in the event of the status of Egypt being altered, articles 4, 6, and 7 of the published articles are to remain intact. On any other view this provision would have been unnecessary. The same conclusion is reached by applying the general rule of construction that what is expressed excludes what otherwise might be implied. The express confirmation in secret article 1, of articles 4, 6, and 7 of the published articles, excludes in our view the continuance of the other articles not so confirmed.

It follows that in our opinion the French Government are not entitled to claim the benefit of any of the published articles other than articles 4, 6, and 7, and consequently are not entitled to claim the benefit of the last two paragraphs of article 1, of the Anglo-French Declaration of 1904.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.* Law Officers' Department,
November 20, 1917.

1917

(8)

GENERAL.

[61321]

No. 3.

[File 11829/17.]

[March 22, 1917.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

*Foreign Office, March 17, 1917.*Effect of outbreak of war on validity of multilateral
treaties.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Balfour, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list and to request that you will take into your consideration the following observations as to the extent to which the validity of multilateral treaty arrangements is affected by the outbreak of war between certain of the Signatory Powers.

As will be seen from the list appended to the memorandum prepared by the Librarian of this Office (Paper (A)), these treaties vary greatly as regards importance and subject-matter; and whatever effect a state of war might technically be held to have on their validity, there can be little doubt that at the conclusion of peace such of them will be revived or re-enacted as deal with questions of a humanitarian or otherwise generally useful nature and are manifestly to the advantage of all the Contracting Parties. As examples of arrangements belonging to this category may be cited the Conventions regarding seamen, labour conditions, the "white slave traffic," and public health.

The question of the policy to be adopted in respect of undertakings not included within the category indicated gives rise, however, to considerable doubt and difficulty, and the views of accepted authorities on International Law are somewhat conflicting and afford no sure guidance.

From Paper (A), which contains a summary of the views held by leading authorities as regards the effect of war upon the validity of treaties, it will be observed that, according to Professor Oppenheim, the majority of writers have abandoned the doctrine formerly more largely held, to the effect that the outbreak of war ipso facto cancels all treaties previously concluded between the belligerents, excepting only such as have been especially concluded for the case of war. Such authorities as Phillimore ((III), 3rd edition, 1885, § 530, p. 793) and Twiss (I, 252) are, however, cited as maintaining the former doctrine, in contradistinction to the writer himself, to Hall (6th edition, 1909, pp. 378 et seq.), and, it may be added, to Wheaton (see "Wheaton," chapter 2 of Boyd's English edition, 1889).

There is a still more recent authority, viz., Dr. Coleman Phillipson's "Termination of War and Treaties of Peace," 1916, which could not, of course, be cited by Dr. Oppenheim, but which is dealt with at some length by Sir Algernon Law in his memorandum annexed.

After remarking on the lack of unanimity which exists as to what treaties are or are not cancelled by war and the absence of any uniformity of actual practice in this respect, Professor Oppenheim, however, proceeds to state that a majority of writers are agreed that multilateral treaties generally are not cancelled by the outbreak of hostilities, but that belligerents may suspend them, as far as they themselves are concerned, in case the necessities of war compel them to do so. This contention was adopted by your predecessors in office as the basis of the opinion which they furnished to the Board of Trade on the 8th April, 1916, in connection with the Industrial Property Convention (Paper (B)), and Westlake (part 2, p. 34) and Hall (p. 331) are therein cited in support of it.

While Mr. Balfour cannot but recognise that these views must carry great weight, he desires me to put forward for your consideration the following alternative, which, if it can be asserted with any degree of certainty from the legal point of view, would greatly simplify and facilitate the institution of the measures to be adopted by His Majesty's Government at the end of the war, in some cases in concert with the Allied Powers.

The alternative suggested is that every multilateral treaty arrangement should be regarded as being in effect a set of bilateral arrangements fashioned into one whole for general convenience, and that it should be maintained as the natural corollary that, as a bilateral treaty expires on the outbreak of war, so also would that part of a multilateral treaty expire which concerns the belligerents.

GENERAL.

9

In a memorandum, of which copy is enclosed (Paper (C)), Sir Algernon Law, the late Controller of Commercial and Consular Affairs of this Office, has adduced cogent arguments in favour of this suggestion, the adoption of which would enable His Majesty's Government to regard themselves as free from any obligation after the war towards their present enemies, even though such obligation was imposed by a multilateral treaty and though the latter itself continues in force as between this country and the other Contracting Parties, neutral or Allied. The disentanglement of former obligations towards an enemy State from those towards other parties might be difficult in some cases, e.g., that of the Copyright Convention, and in practice it might be expedient formally to revive such instruments.

From the point of view of convenience the suggested alternative has much to commend it, and its adoption, as you will readily appreciate, would greatly facilitate the carrying into effect of the resolutions of the Economic Conference of the Allies held at Paris in June 1916 (Paper (D)), which contemplated drastic changes in the relations between the Allied and the present enemy Powers after the war. These changes will entail variations in treaties in force before the war, not only with enemy, but also with neutral States.

I am to invite your attention in particular to the confidential declaration (second note (I)) that the provisions of the General Act of Berlin affecting commerce and navigation are at an end so far as enemy States are concerned.

The Legal Adviser to the Secretary of State (Sir Edward Davidson, K.C.) has indicated the possibility of adopting, if it should be necessary, a further alternative, which is that His Majesty's Government should formally announce their withdrawal from their ante bellum treaty obligations towards the States now at war with this country, and in this way secure freedom to enter into fresh obligations more suited to the altered circumstances.

Mr. Secretary Balfour will be glad if you will take the papers into your consideration and favour him with your opinion as to the course which should be adopted from the legal point of view by His Majesty's Government in regard to this question, and particularly as to whether the former of the alternatives suggested could be utilised as a practicable expedient and defended as such from the standpoint of International Law in discussion in this country or with foreign Powers.

The Secretary of State would also be grateful for any further observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer in this connection.

The matter is one of great urgency, as it will be discussed at the Imperial Conference which is about to meet.

I have, &c.
W. LANGLEY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Memorandum by the Librarian of the Foreign Office, December 9, 1915. (Confidential No. 10721.)
- (B.) Opinions of the Law Officers on questions raised by the Board of Trade in regard to Copyright and Industrial Property, April 8, 1916.
- (C.) Memorandum by the late Controller of Commercial and Consular Affairs, March 7, 1917.
- (D.) Resolutions of the Paris Economic Conference.

Report.

Whatever may be the true view as to the extent to which treaties between belligerents are annulled or suspended by war, it is apparent that the victor may impose whatever terms he thinks fit as a condition of peace. It follows that, in the case of those multilateral treaties to which the only parties are belligerents in the present war, there is no difficulty, in concert with such Allied Powers as may be concerned, in refusing to continue or to revive the treaty or in making variations or imposing new terms as a condition of revival.

The difficulty arises in the case of treaties to which neutral States are parties. It is, in our opinion, substantially though not completely accurate to say that every multilateral treaty is "in effect a set of bilateral arrangements fashioned into one whole for general convenience." But it does not, we think, always or necessarily follow that such a treaty can be annulled with respect to one or more parties without impairing the rights and obligations subsisting between other parties. The whole is something more than the sum of the parts. The relationships concerned are joint as well as several. So, for example, the international instrument which guaranteed the neutrality of Belgium could hardly have been annulled as between France and Germany after the war of 1870 without a violation of the rights of Great Britain.

[399]

D

There are, no doubt, many treaties which may be annulled as between some of the parties without injury to the rights and obligations of the other parties as between themselves. In the case of treaties falling within this category it appears to us that there is no objection to the course suggested by the Secretary of State. Neutrals cannot have ground of complaint where their rights under the treaty in question are ex hypothesi unaffected. But, if it is desired to annul or vary any treaties to which neutrals are parties falling within the other category (that is to say, treaties whose annulment or variation as between belligerents will affect the rights of neutrals), we are of opinion that the assent of such neutrals is necessary to the new arrangement so to the cancellation of the treaty, as the case may be.

It does not appear to us that there would be, for this purpose, any legal usefulness in an announcement that Great Britain withdraws from her ante bellum obligations towards the States now at war with her. So far as neutrals are concerned, the announcement would in the light of our opinion be inoperative. So far as this country is concerned, there is already complete freedom to deal as is thought fit with ante bellum obligations affecting only enemy States.

We do not examine in detail the views stated in document (C). Much of the argument therein urged is familiar, but the line of reasoning, and the conclusions apparently recommended, would lead to consequences to which it seems to us highly inexpedient that the Government of this country should be committed.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.

Law Officers' Department,
March 22, 1917.

[63293]

No. 4.

[File 386/1917.]

[March 23, 1917.]

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Lord Chancellor.

Commercial
and industrial policy during transitional period after the war:
As to conflict of recommendations of Committee with
His Majesty's Government's obligations under Commercial
Treaties.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the Lord Chancellor and would be much obliged if his Lordship would be so good as to favour him with his opinion on the following matter:—

Some time ago a committee under the chairmanship of Lord Balfour of Burleigh was set up to consider and report on the commercial and industrial policy which should be followed by this country after the war.

This committee has presented a secret interim report containing recommendations that for a period after the war the control of the exports of certain commodities from the United Kingdom should be continued. The method of control would be that of the prohibition of export except under licence, and the commodities to which the system would be applied would be those of which the enemy countries are practically dependent upon the Allies for their supplies. The chief object in view in maintaining after the conclusion of peace this control over the export of these commodities is to ensure that during the transitional period after the war the enemy countries shall not obtain an unfair trade advantage over the British Empire and the Allies, and also to guard against the risk of shortage in the Allied countries. A copy of the report is enclosed (Paper A). The essential element of the scheme is that supplies of these commodities will be allowed to go to our present Allies in preference to countries which have remained neutral.

A letter has now been received from the Board of Trade (Paper B) raising certain points which must be settled before His Majesty's Government can decide whether or not the recommendations of the committee should be approved.

Many of the commercial treaties to which Great Britain is at present a party contain a clause to the effect that no prohibitions shall be imposed on the exportation of any article from the territory of either of the High Contracting Parties to the territory of the other which shall not equally extend to the exportation of the like article to any other foreign country.

The provisions in the various treaties are not all identical in their language, but they all embody the same idea. A list of the treaties containing such an article will be found in Paper C, and the text of the various treaties will be found in the accompanying "Handbook of Commercial Treaties."

The first question on which the Lord Chancellor is asked to advise is whether the recommendations in the report of Lord Balfour's Committee can be carried out without infringing the above provisions of the commercial treaties.

Inasmuch as prohibition would be general in form, discrimination would in fact be exercised, not by the prohibition as such, but by the administration of the prohibition. Licences for export would be given more freely to Allied countries than to countries which have remained neutral, or they might be withheld altogether.

In connection with this question it may be convenient to explain that whilst His Majesty's Government have during the war established prohibitions of exportation to certain specified destinations, they have felt justified in doing so in spite of the obligations imposed by commercial treaties, seeing that such discrimination has been adopted solely in the interests of the blockade, and has been aimed at preventing the goods reaching enemy countries, whilst by means of licensing combined with rationing exports to the neutral countries concerned of goods for their own needs have been interfered with as little as possible. Prohibitions of importation have in form affected all foreign countries alike, but the goods from certain Allied countries have received preferential treatment in regard to licensing.

From time to time the Swiss Government have raised objections on treaty grounds to the exclusion from this country of goods of Swiss manufacture under a prohibition of importation which, though general in form, was not enforced against the Allies; but no reasoned reply has been returned by the Foreign Office to these representations.

The precise ground on which prohibitions of this kind should be justified has not been determined, but the Secretary of State has been advised that the action of His Majesty's Government might be defended (a) on the ground that the commercial treaties were conventions which are only intended to operate in their entirety in a state of peace, or (b) under the principle of salus reipublice suprema lex.

With regard to (a) a similar line has been taken, on the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown (see Papers (D) and (E), Opinions of the 31st March, 1902, and the 31st March, 1915), with regard to the opening of closed mails in transit across British territory from one neutral country to another, despite the provisions in the Postal Convention guaranteeing the right of transit throughout the entire territory of the Union.

Returning to the question of the maintenance of prohibition after the war, Mr. Balfour has been advised that, if military reasons justify the imposition of a prohibition of export or import conflicting with a commercial treaty at all, there is no reason why the period during which such reasons operate should be exactly coincident with the war or should necessarily terminate with the conclusion of peace, and that a prohibition imposed for the purpose of conserving stocks in order to repair the ravages of war, or to guard against a shortage directly due to the war, could be defended as a legitimate measure of self-defence, even if it conflicted with a commercial treaty. If the Lord Chancellor considers that any such contention is well-founded, it would seem to cover the recommendations contained in this report of Lord Balfour's Committee.

In the event of the Lord Chancellor being of opinion that the recommendations of the Committee could not be carried into effect without infringing the commercial treaties, the question would arise as to whether it would be judicious to give notice to determine such treaties in the event of His Majesty's Government deciding to adopt the recommendations.

The Lord Chancellor will observe that there are twelve treaties enumerated in the list (Paper C). Of these, two treaties, Argentine, 1825, and Venezuela, 1825, contain no provision for their determination. In the case of Bolivia, 1911, and Honduras, 1910, no power to denounce arises before 1922 and 1924 respectively. In the remaining eight cases the treaty can be determined on giving twelve months' notice.

The question whether it would in any case be expedient to give such notice is open to doubt. Some alarm has already been expressed in neutral countries that the resolutions of the Paris Conference implied an intention to prolong the economic war after the conclusion of peace, and that any such action would be prejudicial to neutral interests. An idea of this kind would be accentuated by notice of determination of the treaty being given for the avowed purpose of enabling prohibitions of export to neutral countries to be imposed and maintained without affecting exports to Allied countries. The United States in particular have tolerated many restrictions on their trade with other countries as war measures, but they would almost certainly protest against any measures which appeared to foreshadow unfair discrimination against their trade after the war is over. As a matter of tactics, therefore, it might be better if the recommendations of Lord Balfour's Committee are adopted, and are inconsistent with the provisions of the commercial treaties, that the neutrals should not be approached by His Majesty's Government, but should be left to raise the point themselves and to establish their case that a violation of the commercial treaty had taken place.

A further point which must be borne in mind is that denunciation would not in any case become operative in less than twelve months, and it might conceivably be desired to enforce these proposed prohibitions before that time.

Mr. Balfour would be grateful if the Lord Chancellor would advise (a) whether the recommendations of Lord Balfour's Committee can be carried out consistently with the obligations of the commercial treaties as to prohibition of export; and (b) if the answer to the above is in the negative, whether notice to determine the Conventions in question should, where possible, be given. Mr. Balfour would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which the Lord Chancellor may be good enough to offer.

March 10, 1917.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Report of Lord Balfour of Burleigh's Committee, dated December 14, 1916.
- (B.) Letter from the Board of Trade, February 5, 1917.
- (C.) List of Commercial Treaties containing Export Prohibition Provisions.
- (D.) Opinion of the Law Officers, March 31, 1902.
- (E.) Opinion of the Law Officers, March 31, 1915.
- (F.) Handbook of Commercial Treaties, &c.

PAPER (C)—Treaty Provisions.

Country.	Date.	Article.	Reference in Handbook. Page.	Power to Denounce.
Argentina	1825	4	4	None.
Bolivia	1911	3	40	None before 1922.
Colombia	1866	4	219	In twelve months.
Greece	1886	3	450	" "
Honduras	1910	7	None	None before 1924.
Mexico	1888	3	526	In one year.
Nicaragua	1905	4	638	" "
Paraguay	1884	3	652	" "
Sweden	1826	9	928	In twelve months.
Switzerland	1855	8	938	" "
United States	1815	2	980	" "
Venezuela	1825	4	1,030	None.

The Lord Chancellor to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Lord Chancellor presents his compliments to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and in answer to the observations sent to him under date 10th instant has the honour to submit the following:—

In considering whether the recommendations of Lord Balfour's Committee can be carried out consistently with Commercial Treaties as to prohibition of export, &c., no attention need be paid to treaties with the countries at present at war with His Majesty's Government, as these treaties would be determined by the war, and the terms of peace will be such as to make it plain that they are not to be treated as renewed.

As regards other countries, the recommendation is that exports should take place only under licence, and that discrimination should be exercised between different countries by permitting exports to some and not to others. This would certainly amount to an infringement of treaties containing most-favoured-nation clauses, such as those to which I have been referred.

The object in view might, however, so far as the prevention of exports to the present enemy countries is concerned, be achieved to a considerable extent without any infraction of such treaty obligations. If the licence for export were granted only in the case of consignments to countries from which re-export of the goods imported to them under licence from this country is prevented, the danger of their finding their way to the enemy countries would be obviated. If there were any reason to believe that re-export was being permitted, licences in respect of consignments to persons in such neutral countries might be refused, and this would probably prove an effectual sanction. There would be equal treatment all round, as the licences would be granted in respect of all countries on the same terms. I assume that the Allied countries would be ready to acquiesce in a proposal of this nature.

It might, however, be desirable for a short time after the termination of the war, in the case of certain articles, to forbid their exportation altogether, except to such countries as (say) France and Belgium, on the ground that all that we could export would be absolutely necessary to enable these countries to repair the ravages of war. If British merchants can be induced to abstain from making sales of the articles in question to persons in any countries other than those where such supplies are imperatively necessary to repair the damage of war, no difficulty with regard to the most-favoured-nation clause would arise. Our whole available exports of such articles would go to (say) France and Belgium by the action of the sellers. But if it were found necessary, owing to the impossibility of securing such action on the part of British merchants, to forbid exports to countries other than such Allied countries as imperatively need supplies of these articles, there would be the strongest possible moral justification for taking this course, as "no claim can be conceived stronger than that which our Allies in war would have upon us for the provision of the means to enable them to make good the damage which hostile operations have occasioned to their bridges, roads, railways, machinery, &c." I do not think that this moral obligation would amount in point of strict law to an answer to a claim founded on a treaty containing a most-favoured-nation clause. But a treaty cannot be dealt with as if it were merely a bargain between two merchants enforceable by municipal law. Our moral obligations to (say) France and Belgium may well, looking at the matter broadly, be held to outweigh our obligation as measured by the strict terms of these treaties. The higher obligation may prevail over the lower, especially as such a state of circumstances cannot be supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties to the treaty at the time it was made.

From the practical point of view, the entry of the United States into the war as our Allies may profoundly modify the situation from many points of view.

It appears to me that it would not be politic to determine the treaties at present. Such a wholesale denunciation of treaties with the most-favoured-nation clause might conceivably have a bad effect in the United States, as well as in the other countries affected.

I have no further observations of a general nature to make beyond those already submitted.

House of Lords, March 23, 1917.

FINLAY.

(14)

No. 4.

[War Office.]

[April 2, 1917.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE following papers are sent herewith :—

- Copy of Memorandum by Dr. A. Pearce Higgins, December 7, 1916.
- Copy of War Office Memorandum, January 3, 1917.
- Copy of Letter from Admiralty to War Office, February 2, 1917.
- Copy of War Office Note in reply to Admiralty contention, February 1917.
- Copy of further Memorandum by Dr. A. Pearce Higgins, February 24, 1917.
- Copy of War Office Minutes.
- Copy of Correspondence.
- Print of Correspondence respecting Peace Conference, 1899 (C.-9534).

Hospital
ships:
Provision of the Geneva
(1906) and
The Hague
(1907) Conventions respecting the carrying of sick
and wounded of land forces, medical personnel
and supplies.

In this case the opinion of the Law Officers is requested on the question whether it is legitimate, in view of the Geneva Convention and the Xth Hague Convention of 1907, to convey on hospital ships medical personnel not forming part of their own staff and medical supplies not required for the service of the particular ship conveying them.

The relevant facts and arguments which have been advanced for and against the legitimacy of conveying such personnel and supplies on hospital ships appear from the correspondence, memoranda, and minutes sent herewith.

Apart from the suggestion made by the War Office that ships conveying personnel and supplies intended for land hospitals or conveying soldiers who have been wounded on land should be treated as distinct from hospital ships under the Xth Hague Convention and as analogous to mobile medical units or convoys of evacuation under the Geneva Convention, the Law Officers are requested to consider whether such use of hospital ships is not to be justified under the express terms of the Xth Hague Convention. In this connection attention is particularly called to—

1. The definition of "bâtiments hôpitaux militaires" in Article I of the Convention and the commentary on those words quoted by Dr. Pearce Higgins in his second Memorandum.

2. The reference to members of the land forces in Articles 11 and 17 of the Convention.

3. The use of the words "de porter secours aux blessés, malades et naufragés," in Article I, which, it may be contended, are applicable to the giving of assistance by bringing personnel and supplies to the place where they are needed, as well as to rendering medical aid on board the ship itself.

4. The provisions of Articles 4 and 8 of the Convention, which prohibit the use of hospital ships for military purposes and for committing acts harmful to the enemy. The nature of the acts which it is intended to prohibit is indicated in the commentary in "Correspondence respecting the Peace Conference, 1899 (Miscellaneous, No. 1 (1899), C.-9534)," pp. 69 and 71, where the following passages occur :—

P. 69. "L'idée essentielle est que les bâtiments auront un caractère exclusif-ment hospitalier, par suite ne pourront rien porter qui ne soit pas destiné aux blessés ou malades et à ceux qui les soignent, qui puisse être utilisé pour des actes hostiles."

* * * * *

"Il va sans dire que l'affectation hospitalière donnée à un navire et communiée à l'adversaire ne pourra être modifiée pendant la durée de la guerre.
Autrement des abus seraient possibles; on donnerait le caractère hospitalier à un navire pour le faire parvenir en sécurité à un endroit déterminé et là on le transformerait en bâtiment destiné à des opérations hostiles."

P. 71. "Il faut qu'il soit bien entendu que ces navires ne serviront à aucun autre but, qu'ils ne pourront, sous aucun prétexte, être directement ou indirectement utilisés pour une opération militaire quelconque; informations à recueillir, dépêches à transmettre, combattants, armes ou munitions à transporter."

The Law Officers will also consider whether the title of the Xth Hague Convention
"pour l'adaptation à la guerre maritime des principes de la Convention de Genève" implies that the main object of the Convention is to give assistance to those who suffer in naval warfare, or whether the title is sufficiently explained on the ground that the main object of the Convention is to confer upon hospital ships immunity from capture and other incidents of naval warfare.

GENERAL.

15

The Law Officers are requested to advise :—

1. Whether, having regard to the Geneva Convention of 1906 and to the Xth Hague Convention of 1907 and to the principles of International Law, it is legitimate to convey on a hospital ship protected by the provisions of the Xth Hague Convention—

- (a.) Sick and wounded who belong to the land forces and have become casualties on land;
- (b.) Persons not belonging to the staff of the hospital ship, but belonging to the Army Medical Service, and intended to form, or to form part of, the staff of land hospitals;
- (c.) Persons not belonging to the staff of the hospital ship, but intended to be conveyed as reliefs to the staff of other hospital ships;
- (d.) Medical supplies, such as drugs, which are of a kind capable of use both at sea and on land, but intended, in fact, for use either upon other hospital ships or in hospitals and medical units on land;
- (e.) Medical supplies, such as ambulances or equipment for land hospitals, capable of being used only on land.

2. Whether, having regard to the Geneva Convention of 1906 and to the Xth Hague Convention of 1907 and to the principles of International Law, there is authority for recognising a class of hospital ships distinct from those protected by the Xth Hague Convention and analogous to mobile medical units and convoys of evacuation; and, if so, whether it would be legitimate to carry on such hospital ships the persons and supplies mentioned in (a), (b), (d), and (e) of the preceding question.

3. Generally upon the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. We are of opinion that the first question in all its parts should be answered affirmatively. Article I of The Hague Convention, 1907, clearly defines military hospital ships, and so long as a ship falls within that definition—so long, that is, as it is constructed or adapted by the State specially and solely with a view to carrying aid to the wounded, sick, or shipwrecked, and provided that no provision of the Convention is violated (e.g., by the use of the ship for military purposes, contrary to Article 4)—we think that the ship is entitled to the protection conferred by the Convention. In our opinion the Convention applies to the sick and wounded of the land forces as well as to the sick and wounded of the naval forces. The title, "Convention for the Adaptation to Maritime War of the Principles of the Convention of Geneva," seems to us to import that all ships, &c., which are exclusively employed in the amelioration of the condition of the wounded, &c., are to be immune from capture and other incidents of naval warfare.

2. It does not appear to us that there is authority for the view that there are two classes of hospital ships—one class protected by The Hague Convention and the other by the Geneva Convention. We refer to our answer to the first question.

3. The matter seems to be one of expediency, the question being whether the inconvenience and risk of carrying R.A.M.C. personnel and supplies by ordinary transports are outweighed by the risk that if hospital ships are used for the purpose the enemy may refuse to recognise the status of hospital ships. Upon this question we only observe that, if Germany thinks it will be to her advantage to refuse recognition to hospital ships, she is likely to act without reference to the question whether they are used for the purposes under consideration.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.

Law Officers' Department,
April 2, 1917.

[169752]

No. 4^B.

[Board of Trade.]

[File 148846/17.]

[August 8, 1917.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Branson.

THE following is copy of a Memorandum prepared in the Board of Trade, with copy of the draft Defence of the Realm Regulation referred to therein:—

Control of transfer of British interests in mines to foreigners.

1. The Board of Trade have considered the Memorandum of the Foreign Trade Department circulated by Lord Robert Cecil, pointing out the danger that valuable mining properties abroad, at present owned by British subjects, may pass under alien and even enemy control, and suggesting the advisability of securing by law that the approval of His Majesty's Government must be obtained for the transfer to foreigners of the controlling interests in such property wherever situated.

2. The matters dealt with in the Memorandum have already engaged the consideration of the Board of Trade, who concur generally in the observations contained therein. The attention of the Board has hitherto been specially directed to steps for counteracting the activities of German organisations in the manner indicated in the last two paragraphs of the Memorandum, viz., by the establishment of one or more British commercial organisations within the Empire, in close touch with similar organisations in Allied countries. They have, however, also considered the question of legislation for the purpose indicated above.

3. The Board of Trade, however, are convinced that such legislation would present great difficulties, and would be regarded as very controversial in view of the vast extent of the British interest in foreign countries which would be in danger of reprisals if a permanent policy of restricting control of mineral properties to British subjects were embarked upon. In any case, it would be impracticable to enact such legislation at the present time before the investigations of such Committees as the Balfour of Burleigh Committee on Industrial Policy after the War have been received. (As a matter of fact, the Board of Trade understand that this Committee is distinctly unfavourable to such a policy.)

4. The practical question, therefore, narrows itself down to the possibility of dealing with the matter provisionally during the war period by a Defence of the Realm Regulation. Such a Regulation, confined, however, to certain classes of mineral property within the United Kingdom, is already in force. (Copy annexed.) It would be a simple matter to extend this Regulation to mineral properties wherever situated. If, therefore, the War Cabinet approve, I should propose that a Regulation should be made for this purpose.

5. The question remains as to the extent to which the proposed Regulation would in practice be capable of enforcement. In the case of the existing Regulation, the Stock Exchange require a declaration as a condition of transfer of mining interests that such transfer is not for the benefit of foreigners (similar to a declaration already required by the Stock Exchange respecting transfers of shares of all kinds to or for the benefit of enemies). If the Regulation were extended as proposed, the transferee would of course be frequently out of the British jurisdiction, and it would not be possible to enforce on him any penalty for a false declaration, and it would depend upon the law of the country in which the property is situated whether a transfer obtained by means contrary to British law would be invalid.

6. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the Board of Trade are advised by a broker possessing special experience in mining transfers, whom they have consulted confidentially, that the suggested Regulation would operate as a considerable deterrent to transfers of mining interests to or for the benefit of aliens; while, if confined to the war period, it would not interfere seriously with legitimate business, provided that hard cases were dealt with by the Board of Trade power of licensing.

7. The present Regulation is confined to certain classes of mines, but it would appear worth consideration whether it ought not to be extended to oil properties.

8. It is not to be denied that difficult questions of policy are likely to arise under the extended Regulation. If the British owner of an interest in a mine in South America has a tempting offer from an American Company, and the Board of Trade refuse a licence, he is likely to demand that we should compensate him or take over his interest. If the restriction were a permanent one this demand would probably be irresistible. His Majesty's Government would therefore have to be prepared either to acquire mineral interests abroad on a large scale, or to consent to licence transfers to aliens—by which in some case they would no doubt incur considerable odium. On the other hand, the price at which they could acquire any particular interest would of course tend to be appreciably lower if the Regulation were made, than if, as at present, they had to compete on equal terms with the foreign bidder.

As the Regulation will operate only during the war period it is possible that the demand for compensation or State purchase could be resisted, but it is not certain that such resistance would be successful.

9. The Board of Trade would be glad of early instruction from the War Cabinet as to whether the present Regulation shall be extended, as above suggested, to certain classes of mines and oilfields wherever situated.

REGULATION 30 BB.

A person shall not, without the consent of the Board of Trade, transfer, or agree to transfer, to or for the benefit of an alien or a foreign-controlled company, any interest in any mine to which this Regulation applies, or any share, stock, debenture, or other security issued by any company owning such a mine, or accept or agree to accept such a transfer.

If a person acts in contravention of this Regulation he shall be guilty of a summary offence against these Regulations.

For the purposes of this Regulation the expression "foreign-controlled company" means any corporation—

- (a.) Where the majority of the directors, or persons occupying the position of directors, by whatever names called, are not British subjects; or
- (b.) Where the majority of the voting power is in the hands of persons who are not British subjects, or who exercise their voting powers directly or indirectly on behalf of persons who are not British subjects; or
- (c.) Where the control is by any other means whatever in the hands of persons who are not British subjects; or
- (d.) Where the executive is a foreign-controlled company, or where the majority of the executive are appointed by a foreign-controlled company.

The mines to which this Regulation applies are mines situated in the United Kingdom from which any ores of the following metals are extracted, that is to say, copper, lead, tin, tungsten, zinc, or any other metal which may hereafter be added by order of the Board of Trade.

The following is a copy of the Memorandum of the Foreign Trade Department circulated by Lord Robert Cecil, which is mentioned in the Board of Trade Memorandum:—

Base Metals.

There is a danger of valuable mining properties at present in British ownership in neutral countries passing under the control of American groups whose interests are in reality centred in Germany through their affiliation to the great German Metal Combine.

At present no powers exist to prevent British companies from selling their interests in such properties to any neutral.

In view of the importance of conserving as far as possible such interests as we do at present possess in the world's resources of base metals, and of the avowed intention of the Germans to make good, by the purchase of mining properties in neutral countries, the loss of the raw materials for which they were formerly dependent on the British Empire, it is desirable that some control over the sale by the British companies of their mining properties abroad should, if possible, be established.

An account of the present situation with concrete instances of transactions which it is desirable to check will be found in the accompanying Memorandum.

The sanction of the War Cabinet is asked for the preparation of a measure giving His Majesty's Government power to prohibit the alienation to foreigners of mining properties abroad owned by British subjects unless the consent of His Majesty's Government has first been obtained.

The war has made public property a fact which, prior to 1914, was only perhaps realised by those directly connected with mining and smelting businesses, i.e., that German mining and smelting combines, chiefly with their seat at Frankfurt, have gradually secured such a chain of organisations in various countries that they practically dominate the base-metal industry of the world. The war appears to have scarcely affected this control with the exception, perhaps, of Australia, where stringent legislation has freed the metal industries of the Commonwealth from German domination. It appears incredible that, under present-day conditions, German companies are still in a position to acquire and control British-owned properties, but they are still attempting to do so (and in some cases no doubt have succeeded) through the German-American companies in the United States, with which they are closely affiliated, in which they hold capital, and are represented in many cases through interlocking directorates.

The accompanying chart,* which has been extracted from the "Report on Co-operation in American Export Trade," published in 1916 by the United States Government, shows very graphically the close connection existing between the Frankfurt companies and the German-American metal organisations of the United States.

The American Metal Company, with a capital of 700,000*l.*, is closely affiliated, as the chart shows, with the Metall-Gesellschaft of Frankfurt, with a capital of 900,000*l.*, and also with the Metallbank und Metallurgische Gesellschaft, also of Frankfurt, capital 2,000,000*l.*

It is said that a large part of the stock of the American Metal Company is held by the two German companies, and these latter are therefore understood to have a direct voice, if not a control, in its management.

There are other large German metal combines, such as Beer, Sondheimer, Aron Hirsch and Sohn, which have extensive ramifications in the United States, and it may be said, therefore, that the German metal companies, in spite of the state of war existing to-day, are free to pursue their endeavours, under the shelter of their affiliated American groups, to capture important British and other mining properties throughout the world.

The American Metal Company has been and is very actively engaged in buying up mining companies in the American Continent, and two cases have recently come to the notice of His Majesty's Government in which British owners have asked the Foreign Trade Department if there was any objection to their accepting favourable offers which they had received for their properties from the American Company. One of these properties was in Chile, of relatively small importance, but the other, situated in Mexico, was of greater value. It belongs to the Mazapil Copper Company (Limited), an English company with a capital of 500,000*l.*, and the offer received from the American Company amounted to some 1,300,000*l.* Both the properties in question consist of copper mines which it is of great importance to keep under British control owing to the comparatively poor resources of the British Empire as regards this metal. With regard to the offer received by the Mazapil Copper Company, His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington reported that the sale should be prevented by every available means, as by its acquisition the American Metal Company would practically complete their hold on the production of base metals in the northern districts of Mexico.

A letter lately intercepted by the Censor states that recent German activities in Mexican mines have as an object "to replace into German hands those metals which they were getting before the war from the British and their Colonies."

In order effectively to counter the schemes of the German organisations to dominate the world's base metal supply, it would appear to be necessary to oppose it by a similar combination of the large base metal interests throughout the Empire, and it is understood that the Board of Trade is at present considering the steps to be taken to secure such a fusion of interests. With such a combination it would not only be possible to check the German activities, but a British combine of the magnitude contemplated would have sufficient power in capital and output to compete successfully with the American organisations, and would be in a position to offer at least equal prices for the acquisition of important new properties, and be able to keep a staff of engineers in different parts of the world reporting on opportunities for the investment of the capital resources of the combine. It is only by such an organisation that Great Britain and her Colonies will be able to check and defeat what threatens to become a

* Not reproduced.

German domination and the consequent fixing of prices of the world's base metal supply.

In the meantime it is obviously of the greatest importance to prevent British-owned properties passing out of British control into that of the German-American and other groups. His Majesty's Government, however, do not at present possess powers under which such sales can be prevented, and in the two cases cited above, all the action it was possible to take was necessarily confined to an urgent request to the directors not to accept, on patriotic grounds, what to them were undoubtedly very favourable offers.

It is certainly a matter of extreme urgency that this unsatisfactory situation should be remedied, with a view to creating a powerful British organisation for the future, and therefore that steps may be taken with the least possible delay to give His Majesty's Government the necessary power to secure by law that the approval of His Majesty's Government must be obtained for the sale or alienation to foreigners of any British-owned mining property or of the controlling interest in such property, wherever situated.

The Board of Trade desire to have the views of the Law Officers upon the above Memorandum of the Board of Trade.

The Law Officers and Mr. Branson are requested to consider same and advise if they find themselves in agreement with the views of the Board of Trade as expressed in the Memorandum, and whether the best course of dealing with the situation will be by a Defence of the Realm Regulation as suggested, and, if so, to be good enough to outline the scope of the Regulation.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. G. A. H. Branson.

We perfectly understand the object which the Board of Trade desires to attain, but we are of opinion that it cannot be attained by making a Regulation. The main difficulty, in our opinion, is that the rule making power conferred upon His Majesty in Council by the Defence of the Realm Acts is limited to legislating for the defence of the Realm. Regulations, therefore, are only valid if and as far as they are directed to this end. Regulation 30 BB as it stands would, in our opinion, be difficult, if not impossible, to bring within the powers of the Act, for it prevents the transfer of an interest even to an alien who is an ally. A Regulation designed not for assisting in the prosecution of the present war, but to prevent the acquisition by Germans of control of mines which they could exercise to our detriment only after the conclusion of peace would, in our opinion, be clearly ultra vires. If, however, it can be quite clearly shown that there is a present and substantial danger of mining interests getting into enemy control through sales to aliens (Allies or neutrals) and of their being used during the war to stop or hamper our supplies of metal for war purposes, then, in our opinion, a Regulation to prevent such sales may be justified; and, if so, Regulation 30 BB should be amended by making the last paragraph read "mines wherever situated" instead of "mines situated in the United Kingdom."

It should be borne in mind that the power to make Regulations is for exercise in the United Kingdom only (except in reference to navigation), and the Regulation would not make it an offence for anyone in any other part of the Empire to sell his interest to an alien.

(Signed) FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.
G. A. H. BRANSON.

*Law Officers' Department,
August 8, 1917.*

[—]

No. 4^c.

[Treasury.]

[August 16, 1917.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Offences by Allied Troops in Great Britain:
Jurisdiction.

THE Treasury Solicitor has received the following minute from the Director of Personal Services (War Office):—

“Treasury Solicitor (through C2).

“The position with regard to the maintenance of discipline among American troops now in this country urgently requires consideration, and it is desired that the matter should be referred to the Law Officers for their opinion at the earliest possible date. The American military authorities are pressing for a definite decision as to the position, which might at any time become one of some difficulty.

“The facts are simple, viz., that there is now in this country a considerable number of American soldiers, under the command of their own officers, all of them subject to American military law. They are not, of course, subject to our military law, and could not therefore, it is presumed, be arrested by our military police nor tried by our military Courts, even if it were desirable to do so. In any case, it may, we think, be accepted that the American authorities could not dispense with the administration of their own military law by their own Courts and personnel.

“The question therefore arises how far any arrest or trial of such soldiers by American military authorities, or any retention of them in confinement, if found guilty by an American military Court, can be justified, as the law of this country now stands; and if they cannot be so justified, what steps should be taken in order, as quickly as possible, to legalise any such action, either by a regulation under the Defence of the Realm Acts or, if necessary, by legislation.

“In considering this question, perhaps, the Law Officers would also consider the position of individual American officers and soldiers who may be in this country, but may not for the time being form part of an organised body of troops, and also the case of individual officers and soldiers of the Allied forces generally who may find themselves in this country, either on duty or on leave, who may commit offences either against their own military code or against the civil law of this country.

“In particular, it is desired to know whether in such cases the civil or military authorities in this country, in whose custody such individual American or Allied officers or soldiers may be, would be justified in handing them over to their respective military authorities, and whether such authorities could hold them in custody in this country, and try them before a Court legally constituted under their military law.

“In this connection we refer to the conventions which have been entered into between this country and France and Belgium respectively, copies of which are enclosed* and marked 1A and 1B.

“We are anxious to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers with regard to the American troops in this country at the earliest possible moment, and if the further questions as to individual officers and men raise questions which would require longer consideration, we should be glad to receive an opinion on the main question first, and that the other questions should be answered in due course.

“In the event of a regulation under the Defence of the Realm Act being considered to be necessary, we understand that a meeting of the Council will be held on the 22nd instant, and that there will probably not be another for several weeks thereafter; we hope therefore that it would be possible to lay any necessary regulation before that meeting.

“A. M. HENDERSON SCOTT, Lieutenant-Colonel,
“(for D.P.S.)”

August 8, 1917.

* Not printed.

Observations by Treasury Solicitor.

Copies in the original French of the conventions with the French and Belgian Governments referred to in the minute are herewith.

The question may be a different one as regards, in the first place, organised bodies of troops or armies in this country; and, in the second place, sporadic individuals who may be here on leave or otherwise. So far the only experience we have had in this country has been with regard to the latter class, and although it has been recognised that the deficiencies of the law might create difficulties, no difficulty has, in fact, arisen.

The first state of things has, of course, arisen with regard to the British army in France and Belgium. There is not at present any large organised body of American troops in this country, but there are some such organised bodies undergoing training, and it is possible that a very much larger number, amounting perhaps to 60,000, may be present later on.

It would be clearly impossible for the American officers properly to train their troops if they have no power of exercising over them their own military law, and it seems to be necessary therefore, if the English law does not permit of it, that legislation should be passed for the purpose.

The substance of what is required would appear to be that the American officers should have full powers of discipline in accordance with their own military law over their men, not only in their own camps but wherever they may be in this country. It may not be possible for them to carry out their military law to the full in this country; for instance, regular sentences of imprisonment could not be carried out here, the men would have to be sent back to the United States, but such powers of discipline as can be exercised here appear to be necessary. It would also seem to be necessary, in order to deal with individual officers and soldiers who may from time to time be absent from their command, whether as deserters or on leave or otherwise, that the English military authorities and also the civil police should have certain auxiliary powers limited to the arrest and detention of American officers and soldiers so far only as may be necessary for the purpose of handing them over to their own military authorities.

The details of these matters would be best settled by arrangement between the British and American authorities, and it may be thought desirable that whatever legislation is proposed should leave a certain elasticity for the purpose of dealing with detail. It may also be desirable that if legislation is necessary, as appears to be the case, it should also apply to any individual officers or soldiers of the Allied forces who may, for the time being, be in this country, whether they form part of an organised force or not.

It is understood that one such case at least has arisen where it was thought desirable to hand back an Allied officer to his own authorities in his own country rather than deal with him here.

At the same time, the general scheme of what is proposed would, it is imagined, not go so far as to exempt American officers and soldiers from the ordinary civil law of this country. It will be left as a matter of discretion to the civil authorities whether they would not hand the officer or soldier over to his own military authority rather than deal with him by civil law, and there is, of course, a question whether an organised foreign force, invited to a friendly country in war time for the purposes of war, whether it be for defending the country, as in the case of the English army in France, or for training purposes with a view to taking part in the war, as will be the case with the American troops, has certain extraterritorial rights and is entitled to exercise those rights independently of the sovereignty of the country in which it happens to be. Up to a certain extent common sense requires this to be so, but the exact limits will be hard to define, and precedents or authority of a legal character have not been discovered by the Treasury Solicitor.

It is therefore suggested that, in order to put the matter beyond question, legislation of some kind is desirable. This might take the form either of an Act of Parliament setting out the conventions with the various Allied Governments or stating in general terms the purposes of the proposed legislation, leaving the matter to be elaborated in detail by Order in Council. But this may involve delay, and the military authorities particularly wish to be advised whether, as an emergency measure, provision for the purpose desired cannot be made by a Defence of the Realm Regulation, which could delegate to the Army Council, for instance, the power of making orders for the purpose of giving detailed effect to the regulation. The regulation might, for example, provide that the Army Council should have power to make orders for the purpose of subjecting foreign Allied troops in this country to their own systems of military discipline, and for arresting and handing them over to their own military authorities for that purpose (including a power to send them out of this country for that purpose).

1917

22

GENERAL.

It may be, perhaps, added that the position of American troops under training in this country cannot be distinguished from that of our own troops, who, as the Law Officers are aware, are considered to be on active service, and indeed are subject to be called upon for actual fighting at any moment in case, e.g., of an invasion or an air raid; there would also appear to be no distinction whatever between American troops in this country under training and British troops who are under training at the base in France, of whom there are large numbers.

The Law Officers are requested to advise the War Department as to the power of the American military authorities to enforce discipline over their officers and men in this country, and whether any, and what, legislation is necessary or desirable for that purpose, and generally on the case.

Dear Attorney-General,

Treasury, August 14, 1917.

On my return after a few days absence I find that a case has been submitted to the Law Officers on the subject of the maintenance of discipline among American troops in England. It occurs to me that possibly a reference to the American view, as stated in Winthrop's "Military Law," may possibly be of assistance.

Colonel Winthrop was Deputy Judge Advocate-General in the United States Army, and the book was published in 1886.

At page 96 he writes in regard to the principle of extra-territoriality:—

"Such jurisdiction extends also to offences committed by our officers or soldiers within the lines or in the neighbourhood of our armies, when in the transit, by the permission of its Government, through the domain of a foreign nation with which we are at peace. Thus, on the principle of international law known as 'extra-territoriality,' under which, when the armies of one nation are privileged to enter or pass through the territory of another friendly nation, the laws of the former are deemed to continue to apply to its forces equally as if the same were within their own country. Such, for example, would be the legal status of our troops when permitted by the Government of Mexico to cross the frontier in carrying on hostilities against Indians."

At (3) a note is appended as follows:—

"This privilege is extended to armies in their permitted transit through foreign territory, and includes the right of exercising military discipline on the officers and soldiers. . . . When the transit of troops is allowed it is apt to be specially guarded by treaties." (Woolsey, International Law, 64; Vattel, III 7 sec. 130. And see "The Exchange," 7 Cranch 139; Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U.S. 515.)

The note to the preceding paragraph on the same page is as follows:—

"Wherever our army or navy may go beyond our territorial limits neither can go beyond the authority of the President or the legislation of Congress. (Chase C.J. in Ex Parte Milligan, 4 Wallace 141. And see V. Opinions, Attorney-General 58; Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U.S., 515, 516.) In the latter case the law was applied to offences committed by soldiers of our army when in occupation of insurrectionary districts during the late war, and it was held that (as in the case of any army lawfully marching through the territory of a foreign country—see post) our army was then exempt from amenability to the local courts, and subject only to the jurisdiction of its own military tribunals."

The author has evidently made an exhaustive study of and refers extensively to English authorities, but there is nothing to indicate that he has found anything in them inconsistent with his statement as given above.

Yours very truly,
J. P. MELLOR.

GENERAL.

23

P.S.—I do not of course suggest that the above extracts are directly in point on the question whether the municipal law admits the operation of the rule in this country.

J. P. M.

The Right Hon. the Attorney-General, K.C., M.P., 4, Elm Court, Temple, E.C. 4.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

The questions involved in this case raise issues upon which it is not possible to cite judicial decision. But upon principle we are of opinion that the matter stands as follows: Organised bodies of American troops in this country are, by the doctrine of extraterritoriality, within the limits of the quarters occupied by them, subject to their own system of discipline and their own laws, and may be dealt with by their own military authorities and be arrested, tried, and punished accordingly. Outside the limits of their quarters they are liable to be dealt with by the English criminal courts for any offences against the English criminal law, but could not be apprehended for any purely military offence such as desertion, absence without leave, &c., either by their own or the English military police, or by the ordinary police, nor could they in any case legally be handed over to their own military authorities to be dealt with. This observation applies to officers and soldiers forming part of an organised body of troops while outside the limits of their quarters, as well as to individual officers and soldiers not forming part of an organised body in this country.

In our opinion legislation of some kind is necessary, and the principal question appears to be whether what is desired can be effected by a Regulation under the Defence of the Realm Acts, or whether a special Act of Parliament is necessary. We think that it can be effected by a Regulation. The matters to be dealt with arise from the existence of a state of war, and are connected with the public safety and the defence of the realm, and the necessary provisions are essentially of a temporary kind.

It appears to us that the best way of dealing with the matter would be to make a Regulation giving power to the Army Council in wide and general terms to make and revoke or vary Orders from time to time for subjecting Allied troops in this country to their own systems of military discipline, and for arresting and handing them over to their own military authorities either in this country or abroad, in case of any alleged military or criminal offences, whether such offences are contrary to English law or not. The Army Council could then make the necessary Orders after consultation and in agreement with the authorities concerned.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.

Law Officers' Department, August 16, 1917.

UNITED STATES.

[228064]

No. 5.

[File 12268/1917.]

[November 28, 1917.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the Law Officers of the Crown, and has the honour to state that Mr. Balfour would be greatly obliged if he could be favoured with their opinion on the questions raised in the enclosed memorandum. The matter is one of considerable urgency, as the United States Government are anxious that the Convention in question should be signed if possible by the end of the month.

Foreign Office, November 26, 1917.

Convention
with the United States under the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act.

[399]

H

UNITED STATES.

Memorandum.

A Convention under the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act is under negotiation with the Government of the United States. The draft of the Convention as proposed by the United States, which it is hoped His Majesty's Government will be able to accept subject to a few minor alterations with which it is unnecessary to trouble the Law Officers, is enclosed. It will be seen that the Convention applies to all British subjects in the United States, and its effect would be that under Proviso A of section 1 of the Act above referred to, British subjects who are not domiciled in the United States, and before proceeding there were ordinarily resident in some part of the Empire other than Great Britain, would be entitled to receive certificates of exemption.

Since this United States draft was received the Government of Canada, who are about to introduce legislation rendering liable to military service the subjects of Allied Powers resident in Canada, have intimated their desire to conclude an arrangement with the United States imposing mutual liabilities to military service on United States citizens in Canada and Canadians in the United States. They propose that the negotiations should be conducted at Washington through His Majesty's Ambassador in consultation with the Canadian authorities.

The proposed arrangement seems eminently desirable, as unless some such arrangement is made a large proportion of the Canadians in the United States would receive certificates of exemption and escape military service. But in order to carry it out it appears to be necessary that Canadians in the United States should be excluded from the operation of the proposed Convention under the Act above referred to. The question however arises whether in view of Proviso A of section 1 of the Act Canadians can be so excluded from the Convention. The draft of an article which it is desired to insert in the Convention with this object is enclosed. It should be explained that the persons whom the Canadian Government suggest should be covered by the special arrangement between them and the United States Government are persons born or ordinarily resident in Canada; but it appears necessary that persons who though born in Canada are ordinarily resident in some part of the British Empire where compulsory military service is not in force (such as Ireland) should be dealt with under the Convention, and thus be entitled to obtain exemption in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and the proposed article has been drafted accordingly.

The Law Officers are therefore requested to advise as to (1) whether in view of the terms of Proviso A of section 1 of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, a provision can be inserted in the proposed Convention excluding Canadians from its operation; and (2) whether the proposed draft article is apt for the purpose.

A somewhat similar point arises in connection with article 4 of the draft Convention. Under the law of the United States providing for compulsory military service, foreigners who have taken the first step to become naturalised United States citizens are liable to military service as if they were already naturalised. It is therefore necessary that they should be excluded from the operation of the agreement, since their liability to serve depends not on any agreement between His Majesty's Government and the United States Government, but on the laws of the country in which they are. It is conceived that in these circumstances the terms of the Act cannot be regarded as preventing His Majesty's Government from assenting to this provision.

The Law Officers are requested to advise whether this provision can be accepted by His Majesty's Government.

Under the draft Convention, British subjects in the United States, who though within the limits of age for military service in this country are above or below the corresponding limits under United States law, will not be liable for military service. The United States Government have intimated that they are not prepared to render such persons liable for service, but suggest that they might be deported to this country. It appears, however, doubtful whether even if provision were made for the granting of certificates of exemption in cases where such persons were entitled to them under the terms of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, such a procedure would be consistent with the Act.

The Law Officers are requested to advise whether in view of the terms of the Act it would be possible to adopt some procedure for deportation in such cases, if an arrangement to that effect could be made with the United States Government.

UNITED STATES.

Draft Convention.

1. All male subjects of Great Britain in the United States and all male citizens of the United States in Great Britain who at any time after the date on which this agreement comes into operation are within the age limits for the time being specified for compulsory military service under the laws of the United States or Great Britain respectively shall, unless they return to Great Britain or the United States respectively within the periods laid down in this agreement for the purpose of military service in their own country, be subject to military service, and entitled to exemption therefrom under the laws of the country in which they are, in all respects as if they were citizens or subjects thereof.

2. Citizens of the United States in Great Britain and subjects of Great Britain in the United States who are subject to military service in accordance with article 1 and who desire to enter the military service of their own country must make application to enter such service in such manner, if any, as may be prescribed by the laws of the country in which they are, and must leave Great Britain or the United States as the case may be for the purpose of military service in their own country within sixty days from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this agreement, or within sixty days from the date of attaining military age under the laws of their respective countries, or within sixty days from the date on which any certificate of exemption issued under article 3 becomes inoperative (unless sooner renewed) or within sixty days from the date on which any application for such certificate of exemption is refused (unless sooner allowed) as the case may be.

3. The Government of the United States and His Britannic Majesty's Government may through their respective diplomatic representatives grant certificates of exemption from military service to citizens of the United States in Great Britain and subjects of Great Britain in the United States respectively upon application, or otherwise, within sixty days from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this agreement, or within sixty days from the date when such citizens or subjects attain military age under the laws of their respective countries. Persons holding such certificates shall, so long as the certificate is in force, not be liable to military service in the country in which they are. Such certificate may be special or general, temporary or conditional, modified, renewed or revoked, in the discretion of the Government concerned.

4. Subjects of Great Britain in the United States who have declared or shall during the life of this agreement declare their intention to become citizens of the United States and who being within the age limits specified for compulsory military service under the laws of the United States are liable for military service in the United States are excluded from the operation of this agreement.

5. Persons who possess both British and American nationality shall be regarded for the purpose of this agreement as possessing exclusively the nationality of the country in which they are resident at the date of the exchange of ratifications of this agreement.

6. His Britannic Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States will respectively, so far as possible, facilitate the return of citizens of the United States and subjects of Great Britain who may desire to return to their own country for military service, but shall not be responsible for providing transport or the cost of transport for such persons.

7. No citizen or subject of either country who under the provisions of this agreement enters the military service of the other shall by reason of such service be considered after this agreement expires or after his discharge to be under any allegiance to the United States or to His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland as the case may be.

8. This agreement shall come into operation on the date on which ratifications thereof are exchanged, and shall remain in force until either country shall cease to be a co-belligerent in the present war, whereupon any citizen or subject of such country entered into military service hereunder shall be immediately discharged from such service.

Proposed Draft Article.

A special arrangement being in contemplation as to British subjects born in or ordinarily resident in the Dominion of Canada, this Convention will not apply to British subjects in the United States ordinarily resident in Canada, nor to British subjects in the United States born in Canada, unless they are ordinarily resident in some part of the British Empire other than Great Britain or Canada.

UNITED STATES.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

A (1.) We do not see any objection to a provision excluding Canadians from the operation of the Convention with a view to their being dealt with under an arrangement between the United States and the Canadian Government. The Act does not, in our opinion, require that the Convention should apply to all British subjects in the United States. Such exceptions from the operation of the Convention may be made as may seem desirable to the contracting Governments.

(2.) The proposed draft article is in our opinion apt for the purpose.

B. We do not see any objection to the acceptance by His Majesty's Government of article 4 of the draft Convention.

C. We think it doubtful whether any arrangement for deportation would secure the desired result without fresh legislation. How far deportation from the United States is or may be made legal depends on American law or American legislation, and not on any arrangement between the two Governments. The difficulty is that the Military Service Act 1916 (section 2) applies only to persons who, since the 14th August, 1915, have been or for the time being are ordinarily resident in Great Britain, and we incline to the view that persons sent here with the object of rendering them liable to military service would not be ordinarily resident here within the meaning of the Act.

F. S.
G. H.

*Law Officers' Department,
November 28, 1917.*

1918

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office. May 1919.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(11230.)

LAST COPY.

004

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1918.

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked I^a, &c.

PRIZE LAW.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
I^a	Law Officers and Mr. A. Pearce Higgins [Procurator-General]	Feb. 27, 1918	Goods stored in Copenhagen under the terms of the agreement between His Majesty's Government and the United Steamship Company, dated May 20, 1915	1
I^b	Law Officers and Mr. A. Pearce Higgins [Procurator-General]	Mar. 16,	Ditto	5
2	Law Officers..	Oct. 4,	German "safe-conducts" to neutral vessels sailing outside the "barred zone"	6

VARIOUS.

(Arranged according to Countries.)

CHINA.

3	Law Officers..	Sep. 28, 1918	Leasehold property held by enemy subjects in British concessions in China	9
---	----------------	---------------	---	---

UNITED STATES.

4	Law Officers..	July 1, 1918	Convention with the United States under the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, ..	12
---	----------------	--------------	---	----

URUGUAY.

5	Law Officers..	Nov. 19, 1918	Dispute between the Rambla Company of Montevideo (Limited) and the Government of Uruguay ..	15
---	----------------	---------------	---	----

GENERAL.

5^a	Law Officers.. [War Office]	May 15, 1918	Question of the treatment of interned enemy civilians, and whether they can be regarded as "prisoners of war"	20
----------------------	--------------------------------	--------------	---	----

(iii

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1918.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

APP—LIE.

A.

"Appam," 2.
Army. See Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, 1916.
"Aurora," 7.

B.

Blockade, "barred zone." See Vessels.

C.

Cargoes released under Storage Agreements with Shipping Companies: status as Prize, question of sale, 1-6.
China, enemy leases in British concessions. See Jurisdiction in China.
Colonies: position in United States of Colonial subjects under Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, 1916, 12-14.

E.

Enemy civilians. See Prisoners of war.
Enemy property. See Jurisdiction in China.

H.

"Hellig Olav," 2.
Hiram, 7.
Hudson v. Guestier, 3.

I.

Indian Foreigners Ordinance No. III of 1914, 20-22.

J.

"Julia," 7.
Jurisdiction in Clûna: enemy leases in British Concessions, 9-12.

L.

"Leonora," 8.
Liebmann, 20.

MIL—ZAV.

M.

Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, 1916: exemption of Colonial subjects in the United States, 12-14.
"Morso," 3.

P.

Prisoners of war: status of interned enemy civilians, 20-22.

R.

Rambla Company of Montevideo (Limited), 15-19.
Robinson v. Metcalfe, 21.

S.

Safe-conducts. See Vessels.
Schofenius v. Goldberg, 20.
Storage Agreements. See Cargoes.

U.

United States. See Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, 1916.
United Steamship Company, Copenhagen, 1-6.

V.

Vessels, neutral, outside "barred zone": German "safe-conducts," 6-9.

W.

Weimann & Company, 2.

Z.

"Zamora," 7.
Zavalla, The, 3.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office. May 1919.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1918.

PRIZE LAW.

[40668]

No. 1^A.

[Procurator-General.]

[File 3703/18.]

[February 27, 1918.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.

HEREWITH are sent:—

1. Copy of the agreement between His Majesty's Government and Captain Cold, the representative of the United Steamship Company of Copenhagen, dated the 20th May, 1915.
2. Copy of Sir Maurice de Bunsen's letter of the 14th March, and the report of the Law Officers of the Crown, dated the 12th April, 1916.
3. Memorandum by Dr. Pearce Higgins, dated the 1st January, 1916.

Goods stored in Copenhagen under the terms of the agreement between His Majesty's Government and the United Steamship Company, dated May 20, 1915.

The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel is desired upon the question whether goods which have been seized in vessels owned by the United Steamship Company, and then permitted to be carried to Copenhagen to be dealt with in accordance with the terms of the agreement made by the company with His Majesty's Government, dated the 20th May, 1915, may be sold in Copenhagen without the consent of the consignor or consignee, and the proceeds remitted to this country for the purpose of proceedings being taken against the proceeds in the Prize Court.

The question was before the Law Officers of the Crown when asked to advise on certain matters submitted by the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in March 1916, but in view of the answers returned to previous questions the present question did not then arise. A copy of Sir Maurice de Bunsen's letter and of the Law Officers' report is sent herewith.

The object of the agreement with the United Steamship Company was to avoid the necessity of discharging in this country large cargo vessels and liners belonging to the company, which entailed immense delay to the vessels and consequent loss to their owners. It was accordingly arranged that instead of the vessels being sent to a port of discharge in this country they should be allowed to proceed to Copenhagen, the United Steamship Company undertaking to retain possession of any goods to which His Majesty's Government took exception, and to return them to the United Kingdom upon demand. There are certain special provisions with regard to the goods consigned to Denmark with reference to guarantees against export.

[1311]

B

To enable the agreement with His Majesty's Government to be carried out, a clause was added to the bill of lading under which the United Steamship Company accepted the goods for carriage, which provides as follows:—

"In case of seizure of the within goods by a belligerent nation the shipowners or the master shall be entitled, but not obliged, to enter into an agreement with the Governmental authorities who have seized the goods, to the effect that the goods after reaching a subsequent port or the port of destination shall be returned to the place of seizure or elsewhere, or shall be stored at the port of destination or elsewhere, as directed by or arranged with the Governmental authorities; and further to be dealt with in such manner as the said authorities may direct or as may be arranged with them without any restriction at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods; thereafter neither the shipper, the owner of the goods, nor consignee shall have any right to demand delivery of the goods from the shipowners, nor shall they have any claim of any kind against the ship or her owner on account of the said goods or on account of anything which may be done by the shipowners in pursuance of any such agreement. In every such case the liability and obligations of the shipowners according to bill of lading shall cease at the port of seizure, the shipowners having a lien on such goods for the freight as per bill of lading, and for all expenses incurred, including the additional freight from the port whence the goods were forwarded to a port in a belligerent country or elsewhere as above described."

The contention, which is put forward on behalf of the British Government, is that in all cases in which goods are stored under this agreement, the Crown is the captor and as such entitled to exercise all rights resulting from the capture.

Under the above agreement large quantities of goods have for a long time been stored in Copenhagen, but owing to the restricted shipping facilities and to reasons of policy resulting from German naval activity, it is found impracticable for the goods to be returned to this country at the present time, and if the Prize Fund is to secure the benefit of the valuable consignments lying in Copenhagen, it is very desirable that they should be sold, and the proceeds returned to this country to be lodged in the Prize Court.

In a considerable number of cases the consignees of the goods (or the present holders of the shipping documents which have been freely transferred), have consented to the sale of the goods in Copenhagen and to the deposit of the proceeds, but in many other cases, especially in those where condemnation is probable, the consignees (or the shippers) will not consent to the goods being sold, and the question thus arises whether they can be sold, notwithstanding the owners' refusal to consent.

It will be appreciated that it is not practicable to institute proceedings while the goods are lying in Copenhagen, as the British Government has consistently during the present war maintained the view that a prize of war cannot be condemned while lying in a neutral port. This view was represented in the case of the "Appam," which was taken by a German prize crew from the "Moewe" into a port of the United States, and successfully upheld in the United States Courts.

It is essential, therefore, before Prize Court proceedings can be instituted, that either the goods or the money representing them shall be brought within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court: and the question arises how this can best be done. The value of the goods is very great, and in many cases condemnation is assured, if the jurisdiction of the Prize Court is once established.

It is material in this connection to observe that the effect of the agreement between the British Government and the United Steamship Company has been considered recently by the Danish Courts in two cases in which the United Steamship Company was sued by the consignees for delivery of cargoes discharged from their vessels in Copenhagen and withheld under the terms of the agreement. In one case—E. L. Weimann and Co.—the consignees of certain cases of pork shipped to them in the steamship "Hellig Olav," sued the United Steamship Company for delivery of the goods or compensation therefor. Judgment was given with costs in favour of the Company by the Court of First Instance, and this judgment was affirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court in the following terms:—

"It is unnecessary in this case to determine whether the legality of the seizure and withholding of the goods referred to in this appeal has been proved in respect of the law of warfare at present in force. According to the facts cited in the present case, the defendant shipping company, in accordance with ordinary principles of the laws of property, as well as according to the rules of the Maritime Code, especially paragraphs 54 and 57, was entitled in the interests of all concerned to make the agreement cited in the case (between His Majesty's Government and the United Shipping Company). As accordingly the fact that the goods, in accordance with this agreement, were brought to Denmark cannot give the plaintiff any legal claim against the company to have the goods delivered, the judgment is to be upheld in accordance with the company's contentions."

In the second case, Axel Boden's Handels A/B, of Stockholm, the consignees of certain bags of cocoa beans shipped to them in the steamship "Morsø," sued the United Steamship Company for the delivery of the consignment. In giving judgment against the plaintiffs, the Commercial and Maritime Court of Copenhagen held that it was not within its jurisdiction to determine whether the policy of His Majesty's Government agreed or did not agree with the principles of international law. The goods were de facto seized and must be considered so, notwithstanding that His Majesty's Government released them temporarily for return later to the United Kingdom. It was further found that the Danish judicial authorities could in no wise prevent the defendants from carrying out to the full the terms of their agreement with His Majesty's Government. On appeal to the Supreme Court judgment was again given in favour of the United Steamship Company in terms similar to those quoted above.

From these decisions it will be seen that the Danish Courts regard the goods as seized as prize, and His Majesty's Government as being in the position of captors.

It is not anticipated that the Danish Government will raise any difficulty in regard to the course suggested, as they have taken no objection hitherto to the arrangements made with the United Steamship Company; and the sale of the goods locally would be of great advantage to the Danish consumers, and relieve the shortage of commodities existing in Denmark.

It is submitted that in storing the goods in Denmark the United Steamship Company are acting as agents of His Majesty's Government, and by reason of their position as captors His Majesty's Government are entitled to exercise full control over the disposal of the goods within the limits defined by international law, subject to the right of any party aggrieved to apply for redress in the Prize Court. Prizes carried to neutral ports, and remaining there, are still deemed to be under the control of the captor, whose possession is considered as that of his Sovereign (cf. Hudson v. Guestier, 4 Cranch 293). The sale of the goods before condemnation, moreover, by one acting under the possession of the captor, would not divest the Prize Court of jurisdiction (cf. The Zavalla (1862), Blatchford P.C., 173). It is suggested therefore that His Majesty's Government may direct the Steamship Company to sell the goods which they have stored, and give the company instructions as to the manner in which the sale shall take place, and the persons to whom sales shall be effected, and generally determine the conditions of sale, and that in doing so the Crown would be exercising the rights and powers of a captor, and in no way infringing international law or Danish neutrality. No doubt as a matter of form the sale could be carried out by the United Steamship Company without the interposition of His Majesty's Government being openly disclosed.

The Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel are referred to the passage in Halleck's "International Law," Vol. II, p. 437, where it is stated:—

"There are cases where from the existing circumstances the captor may be excused from the duty of bringing the prize within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, and may sell or otherwise dispose of the property before condemnation. Where the commander of a ship of war cannot spare a sufficient prize crew to man the captured vessel, or where the orders of his Government prohibit him from doing so, he may lawfully sell or otherwise dispose of the captured property in a foreign country, and may afterwards proceed to adjudication in a Court of the United States."

If therefore there is cargo seized as prize, which is in a condition that it cannot be sent to the port of the Prize Court, it is submitted as law that the cargo may be sold in the nearest port, and the proceeds remitted to the Prize Court.

"If neutral goods are not in a condition to be taken to the port of adjudication, they may be sold or destroyed, as the case may be." (Oppenheim, "International Law," Vol. II, p. 242.)

PRIZE LAW.

It is submitted that this rule is not restricted to the sale of perishable goods, but is applicable in any case where there are physical disabilities, at whatever stage supervening, to bringing in the goods to a port of the Prize Court.

The Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel are therefore requested to advise on the following questions in regard to the disposal of goods which have been seized as prize in vessels owned by the United Steamship Company and permitted to be carried to Copenhagen, and which are now stored there under the terms of the agreement of the 20th May, 1915 :—

- 1. Can His Majesty's Government direct the Steamship Company to sell the goods, and if so to sell them in such a manner and to such persons as His Majesty's Government approve? Is the company bound to conform to such directions?
2. If the answer to the preceding question is in the negative, can the goods be sold by the company and His Majesty's Government jointly?
3. Can such sale be made without the consent of the consignee or owner?
4. In the event of the United Steamship Company requiring the delivery of the bills of lading or an indemnity against claims by the holders as a condition for the delivery of goods stored under the agreement with His Majesty's Government, would His Majesty's Government be justified in giving such an indemnity in view of the decision of the Danish Court that the consignees in Denmark cannot compel the United Steamship Company to give delivery of the goods to them.
5. Generally.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. A Pearce Higgins.

Before answering the questions on which our opinion is asked we may first state our view as to the position of the goods referred to under the agreement of the 20th May, 1915, and the bills of lading which contain the clause, copy of which is set forth in the case submitted to us.

The agreement of the 20th May, 1915, makes no provision for the sale of the goods in the place where they are stored, and without a new agreement we do not think that this can legally be done. But if the shipping company is willing to modify the agreement of the 20th May, 1915, by undertaking, if called upon by His Majesty's Government, to sell the goods on such terms as shall be agreed on in lieu of storing or returning them to this country, we think there would be no objection to this course. The sale would not be effected by the shipping company as agent for His Majesty's Government, and His Majesty's Government would only have a right of action against the company if the latter failed to comply with their request.

We do not think such a course would be a violation of the principles contended for by His Majesty's Government in the "Appam" case; the goods have been carried forward for the convenience of the shipowner, and are sold for his convenience and for that of the neutral State. Adequate guarantees must be required that the proceeds of the sale shall be remitted to England, and that none of the goods sold shall be exported from Denmark or be used to release an equivalent amount of goods of a similar character for export.

We answer the questions submitted to us as follows :—

Question 1.—Can His Majesty's Government direct the steamship company to sell the goods; and if so, to sell them in such a manner and to such persons as His Majesty's Government approve? Is the company bound to conform to such directions?

Answer 1.—No; but by making an agreement with the shipping company on the terms laid down above the sale can be effected by the latter in such manner and to such persons as His Majesty's Government approve.

Question 2.—If the answer to the preceding question is in the negative, can the goods be sold by the company and His Majesty's Government jointly?

Answer 2.—No.

Question 3.—Can such sale be made without the consent of the consignee or owner?

Answer 3.—The consent of the owner or consignee of the goods is necessary unless some such agreement as indicated above is reached.

PRIZE LAW.

Question 4.—In the event of the United Steamship Company requiring the delivery of the bills of lading or an indemnity against claims by the holders as a condition for the delivery of goods stored under the agreement with His Majesty's Government, would His Majesty's Government be justified in giving such an indemnity in view of the decision of the Danish Court that the consignees in Denmark cannot compel the United Steamship Company to give delivery of the goods to them?

Answer 4.—We are unable to give an opinion of the question which may arise in Danish law in relation to the sale of the goods, but the decisions of the Danish Courts set forth in the case, relating however not to sale but non-delivery, suggest a doubt.

Question 5.—Generally?

Answer 5.—Generally. We think that the agreement of the 20th May, 1915, is defective in its character, and we advise that the supplementary agreement should be carefully drawn and signed by the shipping company before any steps are taken in regard to the proposed sales. It would also be well to take the opinion of the legal adviser to His Britannic Majesty's Legation at Copenhagen in reference to the fourth question, and as to the legal position in Danish law of buyers from the shipping company in relation to the owners or shippers of the goods.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.
A. PEARCE HIGGINS.

Law Officers' Department,
February 27, 1918.

[49541]

No. 1^B.

[Procurator-General.]

[File 3703/18.]

[March 16, 1918.]

Supplemental Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.

HEREWITH are sent :—

Case for the opinion of the Law Officers and Counsel, dated the 14th February, and the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel thereon, dated the 27th February, 1918.

Since this matter was before the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel it has been ascertained that there are still considerable quantities of goods stored in Copenhagen under the terms of the agreement between His Majesty's Government and the United Steamship Company which were seized in the company's vessels in the year 1915 and permitted to be carried to Copenhagen to be dealt with in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

An examination of the bills of lading in use during that period show that the special clause in the bill of lading then in use by the Steamship Company was less wide in its terms than those contained in the bills of lading used in the year 1916 and onwards, which was set out in the previous case.

The clause in the bill of lading in use in the year 1915 contained a special clause in the following terms :—

"Consignees of the within goods are under the obligation to furnish Det Forenede Dampskibs Selskab at Copenhagen promptly and on demand a written declaration, together with, if required, a banker's guarantee for double the value, such declaration to certify that the within goods are for consumption in country of destination shown in this bill of lading, and will not be re-exported. Failure to provide such a declaration or banker's guarantee gives the shipowner the right to withhold delivery of the goods or discharge them at any place, whereupon each and every liability of the shipowner shall cease. For goods to Denmark these declarations must be provided with guarantee given by the Merchants' Guild or the Danish Chamber of Manufacturers in Copenhagen."

[1311]

C

Goods stored in Copenhagen under the terms of the agreement between His Majesty's Government and the United Steamship Company, dated May 20, 1915.

PRIZE LAW.

It will thus be seen that the power contained in the later bills of lading enabling the company to deal with the goods "in such manner as the authorities may direct or as may be arranged with them without restriction" is not found in the bill of lading of 1915, and as it is considered that this omission may affect the basis upon which the opinion of the 27th February, 1918, was given, it is thought that the questions previously put should be resubmitted in specific relation to goods seized and carried in the year 1915.

The Law Officers and Counsel are therefore requested to advise whether the answers returned to the questions put in the previous case are applicable to goods which were carried to and stored in Copenhagen in the year 1915 under the terms set out in the bill of lading above mentioned, or if not, whether any steps can be taken to enable His Majesty's Government to arrange for their sale without the consent of the owners.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. A. Pearce Higgins.

We are of opinion that by international law, if the shipping company sell the goods in Copenhagen and transmit the proceeds to this country, proceedings in prize can be taken in respect thereof. We therefore answer the question submitted to us in the affirmative.

We have, however, already advised that it is a question of Danish law whether the shipowner can sell in Denmark so as to give a good title.

Whether it will be practicable to make such a new agreement between His Majesty's Government and the shipping company as suggested in our former opinion will depend on the opinion of the Danish adviser to His Majesty's Government at Copenhagen, which we have already advised should be taken.

His opinion if thought desirable can be communicated to us.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.
A. PEARCE HIGGINS.

Law Officers' Department.
March 16, 1918.

[197245]

No. 2.

[File 35656/1918]

[October 4, 1918.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 28, 1918.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Minister of Blockade, to transmit to you herewith the papers detailed in the accompanying list, and to request that you will favour him with your opinion on the following point:—

German
"safe-conducts" to neutral vessels sailing outside the "barred zone."

The German Government have recently adopted a system of issuing so-called "safe-conducts" to neutral vessels sailing outside the "barred zone," i.e., the area within which all shipping is liable to be sunk without warning. The issue of such safe-conducts appears, in part at any rate, to have been adopted in consequence of the issue on 24th April last, of a new German Prize Regulation, providing that a neutral vessel is to be regarded as sailing in the interest of the enemy belligerent, and therefore to be treated as an enemy vessel, when the State whose flag the ship is entitled to fly has concluded an agreement with an enemy State for the cession of tonnage, or when the bulk of the neutral State's mercantile fleet engaged in trading sails for the benefit of the enemy. This regulation will be found at the end of Paper (A), which includes also some earlier amendments to the Prize Regulations, for convenience of reference.

In existing circumstances this regulation would apply to Norwegian, Danish, Swedish, and Dutch shipping, and it would appear from a statement issued by the Dutch Minister for Foreign Affairs (Paper (B)) that one object of the issue of these safe-conducts was to protect neutral vessels which would otherwise be liable to destruction or condemnation under the regulation above referred to, subject to certain conditions being accepted. In addition to this, however, it would appear that the effect of the safe-conduct is to guarantee a free passage to the vessel carrying it, subject to the conditions being complied with, and therefore to free it from the risk of being sent into port for examination or sunk at sea if visited by a German submarine. Inasmuch as the safe-conducts are only granted in respect of voyages outside the so-called "barred zone," and it is only within that zone that, in theory at any rate, neutral vessels are liable to be sunk at sight, it does not appear that the safe-conduct can be described as a protection against being sunk without visit and search, though it is no doubt possible that neutral shipowners may regard it in that light. The text of two forms of safe-conduct, which are the only ones at present in the possession of His Majesty's Government, will be found at pages 6 and 7 of the "German-Norwegian Safe-Conduct Agreement" (Paper C).

PRIZE LAW.

The conditions attached to the issue of such safe-conducts, so far as they are at present known to His Majesty's Government will be found in the following papers:—

Paper (C), Norway; (D), Holland; (E), (F), and (G), Denmark; (H), (J), and (K), Sweden. It is understood that certain Spanish ships are receiving safe-conducts, although the Spanish Government do not recognise the system, but it is not known on what conditions these safe-conducts are issued. It is, of course, possible that there may be other conditions attached which have not come to the knowledge of His Majesty's Government; but it will be seen that generally speaking the ostensible object of the conditions is to subject neutral shipping to much the same measures of control as His Majesty's Government have been able to apply by means of the Bunker conditions and similar measures. The distinction between the two cases would appear to be that while His Majesty's Government have been able to obtain control in return for facilities which they were perfectly at liberty to grant or refuse, the German Government propose to attain it by a threat, none the less effective though not openly made, of the illegal condemnation or destruction of the ship (not necessarily the destruction without warning) if their conditions are not accepted.

The attitude which the Allies have so far adopted towards these German measures will be seen from the communication (Paper (L)) which their representatives have been instructed to make to the neutral Governments concerned. I am to invite your attention to the sentence which states that: "The Associated Governments observe that enemy control through such a device, or otherwise, may operate to deprive vessels accepting the same of their neutral character, and the Associated Governments accordingly reserve the right to deal with any vessel which has subjected herself to enemy control as the circumstances in each case may warrant."

In these circumstances the Minister of Blockade desires to be advised as to the position under Prize Law, as administered in the British Prize Court, of neutral vessels sailing under an enemy safe-conduct in the circumstances above described. The French Government have issued a decree (Paper (M)) which renders such vessels liable to condemnation, but it is understood that this is only to be regarded as a weapon for use if required, and that at present it is not intended to act under it.

The Manual of Naval Prize Law by Mr. Godfrey Lushington which was issued in 1866 contains on p. 54 a statement that "The Commander will be justified in treating as an enemy vessel . . . (3) any vessel sailing under a licence of the enemy Government," and this statement has been repeated with only verbal alterations in all subsequent editions. In the original Manual the authorities given for this statement were the three American cases of the "Aurora" (8 Cranch 203), the "Hiram" (8 Cranch 444), and the "Julia" (1 Gall 594). A reference to these cases, however, will show that they do not support the proposition so far as it applies to neutral ships. They were all cases of American ships condemned by the American Prize Court for sailing under a British licence, and although there are statements in the decisions which, if taken apart from their context, may appear to have a wider application, it is quite clear that all three ships were condemned on the ground of trading with the enemy, and that the decisions only established that the acceptance of a licence from the enemy by a belligerent merchant ship amounts to trading with the enemy, and renders her liable to confiscation in the Prize Court of her own country. The question therefore is whether, apart from this statement in the Naval Prize Manual, a neutral vessel could be condemned in the British Prize Court on the ground that she carries (a) an enemy safe-conduct; (b) an enemy safe-conduct given on the conditions now attached by the German Government to their issue. On this point I am to invite your attention to two memoranda (Papers (N) and (O)) by Sir A. H. Dennis and Dr. Pearce Higgins. There is also the further question, if you should be of opinion that in the existing state of the law condemnation could not be obtained on the above grounds, whether it would be possible to issue an Order in Council which would have this effect, based on the principle of reprisals, which would be considered by the Court to be in accordance with International Law under the doctrine laid down in the "Zamora." I am to invite particular attention to the observations in Sir A. H. Dennis's memorandum (Paper (N)) on this point; and you will, no doubt, consider whether it is possible to base a Reprisals Order in Council on the system of control which the German Government are endeavouring to establish by the issue of safe-conducts, in view of the fact that very similar control (so far as the published conditions go) is at present exercised by His Majesty's Government. It is also necessary to take into consideration the desirability of issuing such an Order in Council at the present time, especially in view of the fact that the legality of the Order in Council of the 16th February, 1917, which has been upheld by the Prize Court in the case of the "Leonora," will shortly come under the consideration of the Privy Council.

PRIZE LAW.

I am, therefore, to request that you will take the accompanying papers into your consideration, and will favour the Minister of Blockade with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether the mere fact of carrying a safe-conduct issued by the German Government is sufficient, in the existing state of the law, to render a neutral ship liable to condemnation in a British Prize Court.
2. Whether the fact of carrying a German self-conduct issued on the conditions (so far as these are at present known) attached to such safe-conducts would, in the existing state of the law, render a neutral ship liable to condemnation. In this connection I am to invite your special attention to the provisions against carrying passengers of Allied nationality, and I am to say that it is understood that in one instance the German authorities have objected to the carriage by a ship holding a safe-conduct of goods from the United States to Uruguay on the ground that the latter country had severed relations with Germany.
3. Whether (if your answer to the first and second questions is in the negative) an Order in Council based on the principle of reprisals rendering neutral ships liable to condemnation in such circumstances would be upheld by the Prize Court.
4. As to the acts of the enemy Government which could best be relied upon as justifying a retaliatory measure.
5. Whether in your opinion the issue of such Order in Council would be desirable at present, especially in view of the position of the Order in Council of the 16th February, 1917.
6. Whether there are any particular facts which it would be desirable to prove in a suit for the condemnation of such a neutral ship—(a) if an Order in Council is issued; (b) if it is not.

The Minister of Blockade would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

It may at any time be necessary to decide at short notice upon a course of action in relation to the carriage of safe-conducts by neutral vessels, and the Minister of Blockade would, therefore, be grateful if he could receive your opinion at an early date.

I have, &c.,

GERALD SPICER.

List of Papers.

- (A.) German Prize Regulations.
- (B.) Statement issued by Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs. [102341/T/18.]
- (C.) German-Norwegian Safe-Conduct Agreement. [140635/C & T/18.]
- (D.) Despatch from Sir W. Townley, No. 2223 Commercial, September 3, 1918. [155305/C & T/18.]
- (E.) Guarantee to be given by owners and masters of Danish ships. [99575/C & T/18.]
- (F.) Despatch from Sir R. Paget, No. 1236 Commercial, July 1, 1918. [119995/C & T/18.]
- (G.) Further guarantee to be given by owners and masters of Danish ships. [134957/C & T/18.]
- (H.) Two memoranda issued by Swedish Foreign Office. [136251/C & T/18.]
- (J.) Declaration to be given by Swedish consignees. [133250/C & T/18.]
- (K.) Aide-memoire by Swedish Minister for Foreign Affairs. [146867/C & T/18.]
- (L.) Communication by Associated Governments to Neutral Governments. [148379/C & T/18.]
- (M.) French Decree. [150039/C & T/18.]
- (N.) Memorandum by Sir A. H. Dennis. [147758/C & T/18.]
- (O.) Memorandum by Dr. Pearce Higgins. [147758/C & T/18.]

PRIZE LAW.

Report of the Law Officers of the Crown.

There is no clearly relevant authority upon the points submitted to us; but they would appear to be governed by admitted general principles.

We answer the questions put to us as follows:—

1. We do not think that the mere fact of carrying a safe-conduct issued by the German Government is sufficient, without reference to the circumstances under which and the conditions on which the safe-conduct is granted, to render a neutral ship liable to condemnation. But, in our opinion, the fact of carrying such a safe-conduct justifies seizure, and raises a presumption that the ship is acting in furtherance of the interests of the enemy State so as to render her liable to condemnation.

2. We think this question should be answered in the affirmative, on the ground that by accepting the safe-conduct, subject to the conditions disclosed in the case, the neutral has wrongfully, and to the prejudice of a belligerent, acquiesced in an encroachment upon his neutral duty, has virtually placed his ship under the control of the German Government in furtherance of German views and interests, and is directly aiding the Germans in their policy of indiscriminate terrorisation at sea.

3 to 5 do not arise, but we may observe in relation to both 3 and 5 that, on the whole, we prefer to rely upon the general principles of existing law rather than upon an Order in Council which would not, in our view, strengthen the position, and which is open to some tactical objection.

6 (a) does not arise.

6 (b). We cannot suggest any particular facts which it would be desirable to prove other than the circumstances under which and the conditions on which the safe-conducts were issued.

6 (c). We have nothing to add.

FREDERICK SMITH,
GORDON HEWART.

Law Officers' Department,
October 4, 1918.

CHINA.

[165171.]

No. 3.

[File 14/1918]

[September 28, 1918.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 30, 1918.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Assistant Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you the accompanying papers as to the possibility of enacting legislation under the China Order in Council for the purpose of vesting in the custodian of enemy property leasehold property held by enemy subjects in the British concession at Canton. The point of difficulty is whether such action would exceed the limits of the jurisdiction conferred upon His Majesty by the treaties with China.

2. British jurisdiction in China is mainly derived from articles 15, 16, and 17 of the treaty of the 26th June, 1858 (Paper A): they give to the British authorities jurisdiction in all questions arising between British subjects; criminal jurisdiction over British subjects, and a kind of friendly jurisdiction in disputes between British and Chinese. Upon that foundation, modified no doubt by custom and usage, reposes the whole edifice of British extraterritorial jurisdiction in China.

3. The jurisdiction is exercised in accordance with the China Order in Council of 1904 (Paper B) and subsequent amending orders issued under "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890." The extent of the jurisdiction is set out in article 5 of the Order. By article 6 British jurisdiction in China is to be exercised in accordance with that Order and not otherwise.

[1311]

D

Leasehold property held by enemy subjects in British concessions in China.

4. The origin and nature of the British concession in China will be found explained in detail in the accompanying report (Paper C) on the foreign concession and settlements in the treaty ports of China. The concession at Canton, which is situated on an island known as Shameen, originated in a perpetual lease granted by the Chinese Government to the British Government, of which the text will be found at p. 23 of Paper C. Information with regard to the Shameen will be found on p. 13. The position in respect of this and many other similar concessions in China is that no rights other than bare sovereignty are reserved to the Chinese Government except the payment to the Chinese exchequer of a small annual sum, usually equivalent to the land tax originally due to that exchequer from the territorial authorities.

5. In a British concession the land leased by the Chinese Government to the Crown is granted out by way of sub-leases in suitable lots to British subjects. These Crown leases are the foundation of the title of the individual lotholder. A lotholder is, speaking broadly, in much the same position as the owner of leasehold residential or business premises in this country; the Crown being in the position of the ground landlord.

6. The fundamental idea of a foreign concession in China is that the land should be held by the subjects of the Power to which the area was granted and that the local regulations for its administration should be settled by that Power. In general, therefore, in a British concession the leases are not granted to persons other than British subjects, but by assignment or otherwise the property not infrequently gets into the hands of foreigners. Where, however, concession lots are transferred to foreigners the latter have to make a written declaration endorsed by their own authorities engaging to be bound by the regulations made or to be made under the sanction of the Government holding the concession. The Shameen Land Regulations of 1908 will be found in paper (D), and I am to draw your attention to section 2. The phraseology employed in the corresponding section of the Land Regulations of 1871 was slightly wider and stipulated that the lotholders should "obey all regulations . . . for the peace order and good government of the said settlement." (See Paper (E), section 16.)

7. Some of the lots on the Shameen were at the outbreak of the war held by enemy subjects, and it is as to the treatment of this property that the question now before you has arisen. Steps were taken at an early date by His Majesty's consul-general at Canton to place under drastic control the property so held by enemy subjects. A copy of these directions will be found in enclosure 1 of Paper (F). It will be seen that though the control prevents any injury of enemy action to British interests during the war, it does not in any way affect the continuance of the enemy ownership of the property or interfere in the relations between landlord (His Majesty's Government) and tenant (enemy subject). A strong feeling, however, exists at Hong Kong, and among British subjects in China, and has been reflected in the House of Commons, in favour of liquidating these enemy properties and thus eliminating German influence from the concession for all time.

8. The Assistant Secretary of State is disposed to think that such action is desirable if it can be taken. Before deciding, however, whether to authorise the liquidation of these properties he is desirous of ascertaining whether the action proposed is feasible.

9. By article 9 of "The China Order in Council, 1904," civil jurisdiction is to be exercised on the principles of and in conformity with English law for the time being in force. The British courts therefore apply in cases coming before them the English Trading with the Enemy Acts, subject to such modifications as may be necessitated by local circumstances (see article 31). In addition, Trading with the Enemy Regulations have been issued as King's Regulations under article 155 of the Order in Council. A copy of these Regulations is enclosed. (Paper G.)

10. Lord Robert Cecil is advised that if these enemy leases on the Shameen are to be liquidated the most appropriate method of procedure would be to apply by way of King's Regulations, and subject to any modifications which may be necessary for adapting it to the local circumstances, section 4 of "The Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916." This section enables the Board of Trade to vest in the custodian any property belonging to or held or managed for or on behalf of an enemy subject. No difficulty arises in cases where enemy property is held or managed by a British subject, as there can be no question as to the power to pass local legislation binding on British subjects. These enemy leases, however, are not held or managed by British subjects, and so far as regards property belonging to enemy subjects the proposal raises immediately the question whether the British powers of legislation in China are wide enough to validate regulations as to property belonging to foreigners.

11. It is possible, that even though King's Regulations of the kind proposed would not be good as regards enemy property generally in China, they would be good if restricted to enemy property in British concessions. It may be urged that as these enemy landowners undertook before the land was transferred to them to obey the regulations for the settlement, regulations applicable only to the Shameen would be binding upon them and their property, and that the lotholders would come within article 5 (3) or (4) of "The China Order in Council, 1904."

12. I am to request that you will take the papers into your consideration and will favour the Assistant Secretary of State with your opinion whether King's Regulations under article 155 of the China Order for the purpose of vesting in the custodian with power of sale:—

(a.) Leasehold property belonging to enemy subjects—

- (1.) In China generally,
- (2.) In British concessions in China,
- (3.) In the Shameen,

(b.) Furniture and other effects owned by such enemy subjects in such leasehold property, would be within the legislative powers of His Majesty.

Lord Robert Cecil would be glad to be favoured at the same time with any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

EYRE A. CROWE.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Treaty with China: Tientsin, June 26, 1858.
- (B.) China Order in Council, 1904, and Amending Orders.
- (C.) Report on Foreign Settlements in China. Confidential 8747.
- (D.) Shameen Land Regulations, 1908.
- (E.) Canton (Shameen) Land Regulations, 1871.
- (F.) Sir J. Jordan's No. 184 of April 29, 1918.
- (G.) Trading with the Enemy Regulations, 1917. King's Regulation No. 1 of 1917.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 6, 1918.

With reference to my letter of the 30th August, relating to the property held by enemy subjects in the British Concession at Canton, I have the honour, by direction of the Assistant Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you a copy of a legal opinion forwarded to this Department by Colonel Yate, M.P. It does not appear that this opinion is really of assistance in connection with the points submitted to you because it seems only to establish the undisputed fact that any action based on the ejection of the German tenants would have to be brought in the British Court, while the real difficulty in the case is the question whether it is possible to legislate in such a manner as to enable such action to be legally taken under the law applied by that Court; but Lord R. Cecil considers that you should have the opinion before you when considering the questions submitted to you.

I am to add that Lord R. Cecil would be grateful to receive your opinion at your early convenience.

I have, &c.

EYRE A. CROWE.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

A.—1. In our opinion this question, as regards property in China generally, should be answered in the negative. Neither in the treaties with China nor in the Orders in Council does there seem to be anything to support the view that the Crown has power to legislate with regard to the property of enemy subjects in China generally, and it is not suggested that there is any usage under which such a power could be claimed.

2 and 3. As regards Shameen and other concessions where foreigners have made similar written declarations, we think that the question may be answered in the affirmative. From an international point of view we are of opinion that in the British concessions the Crown has power to exclude foreigners altogether or to legislate with regard to the terms on which they are to be admitted to the concession. By the Canton Land Regulations of 1871, article 16, no transfer of land to a foreigner is valid unless he previously undertakes in writing, with the official consent of his national authority, to obey all regulations by His Majesty's Minister for the peace, good order, and government of the settlement. The Shameen Land Regulations, 1908, contain a similar provision in article 2, the undertaking being to obey the Land Regulations, and all by-laws and rules thereunder, for the time being in force within the concession. By article 5 (3) of the Order in Council of 1904 the jurisdiction conferred by the Order extends to foreigners in the cases and according to the conditions specified in the Order and (4) to foreigners with respect to whom any Government, whose subjects they are, has, by treaty or otherwise, agreed with His Majesty for, or consents to the exercise of power or authority by His Majesty. And article 155 provides for regulations for the peace, order, and good government of British subjects in relation to matters not provided for by the Order, and to matters intended by the Order to be prescribed by regulation. We think that regulations for the purpose of eliminating German influence in British concessions such as those proposed are regulations for the peace, order, and good government of British subjects within the meaning of this article, and that they would be upheld by the British Courts, by whom any question as to their validity must be determined.

B. We do not see how regulations vesting in the custodian furniture and other effects owned by enemies can be justified. But we think that regulations providing that the effects shall be removed from the concession within a certain time, and, in default of such removal, be vested in the custodian and sold, would be valid.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.

*Law Officers' Department,
September 28, 1918.*

UNITED STATES.

No. 4.

[121250]

[File 136/1918.]

[July 4, 1918.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 1, 1918.

I have the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Balfour, to request the favour of your advice upon certain points arising under the Military Service Convention with the United States. I am to refer to your opinion of the 28th November last, a copy of which is enclosed for convenience of reference.

After the convention in its original form had been signed, certain amendments were introduced by the Senate, and a copy of the convention in the new form in which it has now been signed and approved by the Senate is enclosed. I am to invite your attention to the second and third provisos to article 1, the effect of which is to exclude from the operation of the convention British subjects who, before proceeding to the United States, were ordinarily resident in a place in the British Empire where compulsory military service does not exist, but brings such persons within the operation of the convention in the event of compulsory military service being established in the part of His Majesty's Dominions from which they came. You will observe that this proviso excludes from the operation of the convention all persons who would be entitled to exemption under Proviso (A) to section 1 of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, if the part of His Majesty's Dominions, from which they came is one where compulsory military service does not exist.

Convention with the United States under the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act.

Compulsory military service is understood to exist, outside Great Britain, in Canada, New Zealand, and Newfoundland. The case of Canada has been dealt with in a separate convention. Persons, however, who before proceeding to the United States were ordinarily resident in New Zealand or Newfoundland will come under the operation of the convention, and will be liable to military service unless they are exempted by Lord Reading, and the first point on which Mr. Balfour desires the benefit of your opinion is whether, in the event of the Government of New Zealand or Newfoundland desiring that such persons should be compelled to serve under the convention, the proviso to section 1 of the Act above referred to prevents this being done, or whether it renders it necessary that such persons, if not domiciled in the United States, should receive certificates of exemption from Lord Reading. Such persons would not be compelled to serve without the concurrence of the Dominion Government concerned, and Mr. Balfour finds it difficult to believe that the effect of an Imperial Statute can be to prevent a Dominion Government from taking advantage of the convention to render natives of the Dominion who are in the United States liable to serve.

A similar question will arise in the event of compulsory military service being subsequently introduced in other parts of the Empire. In the case of Ireland no difficulty would arise, owing to the provisions of section 5 of the Military Service No. 2 Act, 1918, and as regards other parts of the Empire Mr. Balfour conceives that your answer to the first question would cover this case also, unless you are of opinion that there is any distinction in this connection between the position of the self-governing Dominions and that of the Crown Colonies. A further point, however, arises under this head. British subjects who before going to the United States were ordinarily resident in some part of the Empire where compulsory military service does not at present exist will not be within the scope of the convention, and therefore, strictly speaking, need not be given certificates of exemption; but it will be on every ground convenient, if not essential, that they should be given such certificates, in order to make their position clear, as well as to comply strictly (in the case of persons not domiciled in the United States) with Proviso (A) to section 1 of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, and Mr. Balfour therefore proposes to approve a proposal made by Lord Reading that this should be done. All certificates of exemption which will be issued under the convention will be expressly stated to be temporary, and liable to withdrawal at any time. Mr. Balfour desires to be advised whether, in view of the provision of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act above referred to, there would be any objection, in the event of some other Dominion or Colony enacting compulsory military service, and desiring it to be applied under the convention to British subjects ordinarily resident in such Dominion or Colony, to withdrawing such temporary certificates with this object.

A similar question may arise in Italy, as it is possible that an agreement may be made providing for the reciprocal liability to military service of Italians in Canada and Canadians in Italy. A certain number of Canadians have received certificates of exemption in Italy under the provisions of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act, which certificates are also expressed to be temporary and liable to withdrawal, and the question will arise whether, in the event of an agreement of the nature above referred to being entered into, these certificates can be withdrawn so as to make the holders liable to service under the agreement in question. It is also possible, though not likely, that a similar question may arise in France, where the certificates given have not been expressly stated to be temporary.

I have therefore to request that you will be good enough to take the enclosed papers into consideration, and to favour Mr. Balfour with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether there is any objection under Proviso (A) to section 1 of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act or otherwise to British subjects in the United States who before proceeding thither were ordinarily resident in New Zealand or Newfoundland being compelled to serve under the convention, should the Government of the Dominion from which they come desire this to be done, or whether the provision above referred to renders it necessary that such of them as are not domiciled in the United States should receive certificates of exemption from Lord Reading.

2. Whether the position is the same in the case of natives of (a) a Dominion, (b) a Crown Colony, which adopts compulsory military service after the convention has come into force.

3. Whether certificates of exemption, which have been granted to persons who are not at present within the convention, because before proceeding to the United States they were ordinarily resident in a Dominion or Colony where compulsory military service does not at present exist, can be withdrawn in the event of compulsory military service being subsequently enacted in the Dominion or Colony in question.

[1311]

E

4. Whether certificates of exemption which have already been issued under Proviso (A) to section 1 of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act to Canadians can be withdrawn at the request of the Dominion Government (a) in Italy where such certificates are expressly stated to be temporary and liable to withdrawal at any time; (b) in France where they are not so stated.

Mr. Balfour would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

It is necessary to send instructions to Lord Reading on the above points as soon as possible, as the convention is expected to come into force shortly, and Mr. Balfour would therefore be grateful to receive your opinion at your earliest convenience.

I have, &c.

LOUIS MALLETT.

List of Papers.

1. Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, November 28, 1917.
2. Convention with the United States, June 3, 1918.

Report.

1. We think that under section 1 (a) of the Military Service (Conventions with Allied States) Act (7 and 8 Geo. V., cap. 26) British subjects in the United States who, before proceeding thither, were ordinarily resident in New Zealand or Newfoundland, and who prove that they are not domiciled in the United States, are entitled to a grant of exemption from Lord Reading. The words of the proviso are clear . . . "such Ambassador or Minister shall grant such exemption in any case where a British subject proves that he is not domiciled in the contracting country, and that before proceeding to the contracting country he was ordinarily resident in some part of His Majesty's dominions other than Great Britain," and we do not think that it is possible to construe the proviso as being limited to parts of His Majesty's dominions in which compulsory military service does not exist. Our opinion is therefore that the provision referred to renders it necessary that such of the persons in question as are not domiciled in the United States should receive certificates of exemption from Lord Reading, even though the Government of the Dominion desire that they should be compelled to serve.

2. The position is, we think, the same in the case of either a Dominion or a Crown Colony which adopts compulsory military service after the convention has come into force.

3. We think not. The persons in question are, in our opinion, entitled to permanent exemption under section 1 (a), and this right can be taken away only by further Imperial legislation.

4. We think not. Any arrangement which may be made between Canada and Italy will be subject to the provisions of section 1 (a), and, in so far as it may be repugnant to such provisions will, in our opinion, be void.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.

*Law Officers' Department,
July 4, 1918.*

[211265]

No. 5.

[File 20844/1918.]

[November 19, 1918.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 6, 1918.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Balfour, to transmit to you herewith the papers noted in the accompanying list, relative to the differences existing between the Rambla Company of Montevideo (Limited) and the Government of Uruguay.

Dispute between the Rambla Company of Montevideo (Limited) and the Government of Uruguay.

The company hold a contract with the Government for the construction of a sea embankment (referred to hereafter as the "Rambla") at Montevideo, and the dispute between the two parties arises on the question as to whether the Governments have been within their rights in requiring the company to make large alterations in the plans originally presented by the company without offering corresponding monetary compensation.

The case may be stated shortly as follows:—

The contract for the works was signed in September 1910 by representatives of the Uruguayan Government and of the late Lord Grimthorpe. The contract, as will be seen from the annexed translation thereof (Paper (A)) provides for the construction of the Rambla by the "Undertaking" (implying apparently the association or company to be formed for the purpose by Lord Grimthorpe). The main features of the structure are laid down, and the undertaking is required to present final plans within a specified period. To meet the cost of the work the Government undertake to give their guarantee to an issue of bonds amounting to 7,000,000 dollars; the sum, whatever it should be, by which the estimates for the work exceed 7,000,000 dollars, is to be covered by the undertaking itself, which is required to complete and pay for the proportion of the work corresponding thereto before applying the guaranteed bonds. Ultimately the entire cost is to be recovered by the sale of the land reclaimed from the sea by means of the Rambla, the surplus of the proceeds remaining after redemption of the guaranteed bonds to be shared between the Government and the undertaking.

The contract having been duly ratified by law, Lord Grimthorpe proceeded to form a company (the "Rambla Company") as authorised in the contract, and the company so formed entered into agreement with a firm of contractors for the execution of the work, and submitted plans to the Uruguayan Government.

With regard to the plans, Lord Grimthorpe's contract contained an article (article 3) providing that, "If the Executive Power does not accept the definitive plans which the undertaking has to submit for its approval, or introduces into it modifications which the latter will not accept, the contract shall lapse through this fact without any indemnity to the undertaking." Lord Grimthorpe had at first refused to accept this article, but had ultimately agreed to its insertion on verbal assurances being given to him by the Ministers of Finance and Public Works that the Government were benevolently disposed towards the enterprise, and would never make any but the most friendly and reasonable use of the right thus given to them. Lord Grimthorpe took note of these assurances in a letter to the President, which was verbally acknowledged with renewed assurances of good faith.

Relying, however, upon article 3 the executive authorities introduced a series of modifications in the plans. The company accepted a number of important changes, and presented the revised plans for approval. The estimate for these revised plans considerably exceeded 7,000,000 dollars, and the company proceeded to issue shares to cover this excess, for which they were responsible under the terms of the contract. This was done after they had first obtained an informal assurance from the Minister of Public Works that the plans would be accepted without further substantial alteration.

Nevertheless in October 1912 the President issued a decree accepting the plans but ordering fresh additions thereto of so extensive a nature that the excess portion of the cost, to be borne by the company was increased by 275 per cent.

The company had no means of raising this additional sum, and appealed to His Majesty's Government for assistance in view of the Uruguayan Government's action, which they characterised as a virtual repudiation of the contract.

The British and French Representatives at Montevideo, acting on instructions from their respective Governments, then presented a note to the Uruguayan Government (see Paper (B)) setting forth the company's grounds of complaint, and suggesting certain financial arrangements for meeting the situation in a manner satisfactory to both parties.

No answer was returned till September 1912, when the Minister for Foreign Affairs informed the two Representatives that the Uruguayan Government held themselves justified by their contract in insisting on modifications to any extent regardless of the financial consequences to the company. He pointed out that if the company did not acquiesce a means of settling the difference was provided for in article 15 of the contract itself, which runs as follows:—

"Any differences arising between the State and the company with regard to the interpretation of the contract shall be decided by arbitrators, of whom one shall be nominated by each party and the third selected by the company from among the members of the High Court of Justice (of Uruguay)."

The representatives replied by a further aide-memoire (see Paper (C)), in which they challenged the point of view maintained by the Minister for Foreign Affairs on various grounds, including—

- (1.) The assurances of goodwill given by the Government at the time of the making of the contract, and their promise to make none but a reasonable and friendly use of article 3;
- (2.) That "modifications" could not be interpreted as to meaning a complete transformation of the whole project, which was what the Government had demanded;
- (3.) That the theory implied in the Minister for Foreign Affairs' contention, namely, that the Uruguayan Government could demand from British and French shareholders the expenditure of unlimited sums of money, was inadmissible.

At a verbal discussion which ensued between the British and French representatives and the Uruguayan Ministers, the latter persisted in the argument that they had not exceeded their rights under article 3, and maintained that the modifications demanded by them had been of a reasonable nature. The record of the proceedings at this meeting will be found in Paper (D).

The arrangements for a settlement which had been proposed in the first communication from the British and French representatives to the Uruguayan Government having fallen through, the Government offered to submit the dispute to arbitration under article 15 of the contract. This proposal the company rejected, and in support of their attitude in the matter they communicated to the Foreign Office a copy of a joint opinion (Paper (E)), which they obtained from Sir R. Finlay and Mr. A. B. Hall, setting forth the view that—

- (1.) The Company had a right to demand compensation from the Uruguayan Government; and
- (2.) That the provisions of article 15 of the contract did not apply to the present dispute, and that, failing an amicable settlement, recourse should be had to arbitration by an independent tribunal.

The Foreign Office thereupon suggested to the company that an attempt should be made to persuade the Uruguayan Government to agree to arbitration by an international arbitrator, and, on the company assenting to this proposal, instructions were sent to His Majesty's Minister at Montevideo to address himself to the Uruguayan Government accordingly.

The Uruguayan Government, on learning that a proposal for international arbitration was about to be made, hastily presented a reply to the note which had been addressed to them in October 1912 by the two representatives. In it they took their stand upon the actual wording of the contract, and declined to admit that any verbal assurances by members of the Government, even if such had been given to Lord Grimthorpe, could invalidate the clear and precise stipulations of the various articles. They complained of the attitude adopted by Lord Grimthorpe himself, and gave their reasons for maintaining that the proper course for the company to pursue was to submit their grievances to arbitration by a special tribunal constituted in accordance with article 15 of the contract. A translation of this communication will be found in Paper (F).

The British and French Ministers refrained from entering into a further discussion of the points raised by the Uruguayan Government in the above-mentioned note, but at once communicated to the Government the proposal that the whole dispute should be submitted to international arbitration.

The Uruguayan Government (who, being at that time engaged in negotiations for a European loan, had strong motives for adopting a conciliatory attitude) abandoned their previous standpoint, and concurred in the Ministers' proposal. They further suggested that the arbitrator should be the President of the United States of America.

A draft agreement for referring the dispute to President Wilson was drawn up by the Foreign Office, and after receiving the approval of the Rambla Company was presented to the Uruguayan Government (see Paper (G)). On a request from the latter, that the issue between the parties should be defined more specifically than had been done in this draft, a preamble to the draft was inserted by the company's firm of solicitors, Messrs. E. Salaman and Co., in which they set forth the company's complaints against the Government and the nature of their claim (Paper (H)).

A counter-draft was drawn up by the Uruguayan Government in June 1914, containing their own case as well as certain countercharges against the company (Paper (I)).

A lengthy exchange of correspondence then ensued upon the wording of the terms of reference and discussion on this point was still in progress when, in April 1918, a general Treaty of Arbitration was signed between Great Britain and Uruguay, a similar treaty being concluded between Uruguay and France. These treaties, which follow broadly the lines of similar international agreements, involve the treatment of Uruguay on the same footing as any other civilised sovereign State; that is to say, that the republic receives the benefit of the principle which obtains in the relations between civilised States, that there can be no recourse to diplomatic intervention in a dispute between the State and a foreign subject, unless the latter has already exhausted his legal remedies.

The Uruguayan Government made it clear before signing the treaty that they intended to apply this principle in connection with the Rambla claim by withdrawing from the agreement as to arbitration by President Wilson, which had been brought about through diplomatic action on the part of the British and French Governments.

The British and French Governments acquiesced, being deterred by important considerations of national interest from insisting on making the Rambla case an exception to the provisions of the treaty, and thereby imperilling the negotiations for the conclusion of the treaty itself.

Mr. Balfour thereupon caused Messrs. Salaman to be informed of the situation which had arisen, and of the causes which had impelled His Majesty's Government to enter into a treaty which deprived the Rambla Company of their right to have their case against the Uruguayan Government decided by President Wilson. It was explained to the company that in the altered circumstances satisfaction of their claim must be sought first by an appeal to such legal remedies as were open to them by Uruguayan law.

Messrs. Salaman have replied that their clients cannot consent to adopt this course, and demand that, notwithstanding the new treaty, their case should be made the subject of an international arbitration. In their letters on the subject (Papers (J), (K), and (L)), they reiterate the arguments advanced by them in 1913 in support of the contention that article 15 of the contract is not applicable to the present dispute, and they declare that the dispute lies outside the competence of the Uruguayan Courts, which, they submit, have no powers to decide a claim for breach of contract or other injury brought by the subject of a foreign Power against the local Government.

The matter has been discussed verbally between Mr. Salaman and the legal adviser to this Department, and the record of the conversation will be found in Paper (M). At the same time Mr. Balfour has ascertained, with regard to the alternative methods of settling the dispute by the means provided by Uruguayan law (viz., trial by the local Courts or submission to the special tribunal mentioned in article 15 of the contract), that the Uruguayan Government propose the adoption of the latter course.

In these circumstances it has become necessary to form an opinion as to whether the company have open to them legal remedies which must be exhausted before further diplomatic intervention can be exercised on their behalf, or whether, as contended by Messrs. Salaman, there exists no proper provision for a local settlement of their claim.

Mr. Balfour would therefore be glad to be favoured with your opinion on the following two questions:—

1. Having regard to the circumstances out of which the dispute has arisen, can it be considered that the terms of article 15 of the contract between Lord Grimthorpe and the Uruguayan Government are too restricted to enable the company to put forward their whole case in submitting to arbitration as provided therein.
2. Are any grounds apparent on which His Majesty's Government would be justified in maintaining that the case is not within the competence of the Uruguayan Courts having in view the provisions of Uruguayan law, referred to and relied on by Messrs. Salaman, as to the necessity of contracts being carried out in good faith.

Mr. Balfour would be grateful, at the same time, to receive any other observations on the question of the Rambla Company's claim which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.
(Signed)

LOUIS MALLET.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Messrs. Salaman to Foreign Office, September 2, 1918.
- (B.) Mr. O'Reilly to Foreign Office, June 20, 1912.
- (C.) Mr. O'Reilly to Foreign Office, October 17, 1912.
- (D.) Mr. O'Reilly to Foreign Office, November 19, 1912.
- (E.) Messrs. Salaman to Foreign Office, March 19, 1912.
- (F.) Mr. Robertson to Foreign Office, May 1, 1913.
- (G.) Foreign Office to Mr. Mitchell Innes, November 11, 1913.
- (H.) Messrs. Salaman to Foreign Office, February 4, 1914.
- (I.) Mr. Mitchell Innes to Foreign Office, June 4, 1914.
- (J.) Messrs. Salaman to Foreign Office, February 1, 1918.
- (K.) Messrs. Salaman to Foreign Office, April 5, 1918.
- (L.) Messrs. Salaman to Foreign Office, July 20, 1918.
- (M.) Foreign Office Memorandum, August 31, 1918.

Report.

In our opinion the dispute in question is a dispute as to the meaning of the contract, and is therefore a dispute which is covered by article 15 of the contract.

Even if this were not so it would appear to be covered by article 16, under which the dispute must be determined in the Courts of and according to the laws of Uruguay.

We are further of opinion that upon an arbitration under article 15 the whole of the matters which the company are entitled to urge can be put forward and dealt with. As the view we take differs from that expressed in the opinion given on the 18th March, 1913, by Sir Robert Finlay and Mr. Hall, we think it advisable to state the grounds which have led us to the conclusions indicated above.

The contract of November, 1910, was in the nature of a preliminary contract, which might or might not become finally binding on the parties.

We summarise the relevant provisions:—

Under Article 1.—The undertaking binds itself to construct a Rambla in accordance with the definite scheme which shall be presented for the approval of the Government within six months following the date of the contract.

Under Article 2.—The Government guaranteed 7,000,000 dollars, with a proviso that if this sum should be insufficient the undertaking would provide the necessary additional funds.

Article 3 provides that the undertaking shall deposit 100,000 dollars as a guarantee and a like sum on the definite plans being approved. The clause further provides that if the Executive Power shall not accept the definite plans to be submitted by the company, or introduce modifications which the company does not admit, the contract shall lapse, without any indemnity to the company but the deposit shall be returned.

Article 10 provides for the division of the proceeds of the surplus lands. Such surplus is to be applied:—

1. In repaying the Government the 7,000,000 dollars;
 2. In repaying the undertakers the cost of construction;
- but the Government is not to be liable to the company if the sales should not produce sufficient to cover the expenses (of constructions, &c.). The surplus (if any) is to be divided equally between the Government and the company, with a proviso that if the difference which the company have to meet under article 5 exceeds 1,000,000 dollars the Government's share of the surplus is to be one-sixth and not one-half.

The arbitration clause is as follows:—

"Article 15. Any disputes which may arise between the State and the undertaking by reason of the interpretation of the contract shall be decided by arbitrators; one to be appointed by each party and a third shall be chosen by the undertaking amongst the members of the High Court of Justice."

And by—

"Article 16. The undertaking submits itself in all respects to the laws of the country and to the decisions of the judicial authorities."

Having regard to these conditions, it is clear that the cost of the proposed work was never defined with any certainty, and that it was contemplated by all parties that it might exceed 7,000,000 dollars by at least a sum of more than 1,000,000 dollars. In other words, the cost was left at an indefinite figure. The contract further contemplated that the alterations, &c., in the plans which were to be submitted after the date of the contract, might be such that the undertakers would not accept them, and the undertakers were accordingly entitled to refuse to carry out the work, and, in that event, to repayment of the deposit.

It would therefore appear to be plain that, having regard to these provisions, very wide powers were given to the Government under the written terms of the contract. It cannot, in our view be established that the alterations made were in excess of these powers or were made malá fide.

In our opinion, the verbal assurances given to Lord Grimthorpe by the Ministers of Finance and Public Works are so vague as to be almost meaningless, and more over, the statements, such as they are, attributed to these Ministers are apparently denied by them.

We think, therefore, that the contract between the parties must be construed from the terms of the written agreement alone. So construed, it appears to us that the dispute is one as to the meaning and effect of the contract, and therefore a dispute which is within the arbitration clause of the contract.

We are therefore of opinion, for the reasons stated above, that there are no grounds on which His Majesty's Government would be justified in maintaining that the case is not within the competence of the tribunal mentioned in article 15 of the contract or of the Uruguayan law.

For the above reasons we answer the questions put to us as follows:—

1. No. But the arbitral tribunal cannot give redress. It can only declare the rights of the parties. It must be assumed that, as in any other civilised State, if the award is favourable to the company an action upon it would lie in the local Court.
2. No. But if the local Courts refused redress in the event of an award favourable to the company, the matter could and probably ought to be reconsidered by the Foreign Office.
3. Our general observations have been very fully made. We need only add that the Rambla Company have only themselves to blame if they made a bad bargain. The transaction was an ordinary commercial one and they were fully cognisant of all the facts.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART.

Law Officers' Department,
November 19, 1918.

(20)

GENERAL

[98875]

No. 5^A.

[War Office.]

[File 13239/1918]

[May 15, 1918.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

HEREWITH are sent :—

1. Copy of correspondence and memoranda.
2. Copy of minutes.
3. Copy of Royal Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War.
4. Copy of Act and Ordinance No. III of 1914.

Question of the treatment of interned enemy civilians and whether they can be regarded as "prisoners of war."

From the annexed correspondence, memoranda, and minutes the Law Officers will see that a question has arisen as to how interned enemy civilians can be treated and whether they may be regarded as "prisoners of war." The point was raised, as will be seen, by a telegram from the Indian Government of the 9th December, 1917, which asked whether civilian male enemy subjects of military age held in military charge under the Indian Foreigners Ordinance No. III of 1914 (a copy of which is herewith) are prisoners to whom the provisions of the annex to The Hague Convention No. IV of 1907 and the Royal Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War are legally applicable. In particular the Indian Government desire guidance with regard to restrictions on correspondence (see telegram of the 4th January, 1918), and wish to be advised at an early date whether civilian prisoners of war include all enemy subjects whose profession was not that of arms at the time of their internment and include also those who, by reason of being of military age, were potential soldiers or sailors (see telegram of the 4th February, 1918).

In the bundle of correspondence and memoranda herewith will be found two memoranda prepared by the War Department, which summarise and discuss The Hague Convention and its annex. The first points out that that convention does not deal with the case of subjects of one belligerent resident in the territory of the other, and arrives at the conclusion that enemy male civilians of military age in this country are not technically prisoners of war within the meaning of the convention, and that whether they may be treated as such for certain purposes is a question not of law, but of policy. The second memorandum discusses possible restrictions upon and privileges of such persons, on the assumption that they are not covered by the convention, but must be treated "in accordance with the principles of customary international law," and arrives at the conclusion that they are entitled to at least the privileges of prisoners of war, but ought not to be interned, except for the public safety, and cannot be compelled to work. In the bundle of minutes, there will be found a discussion of the subject between the Judge Advocate-General and the Director of Special Intelligence. The Judge Advocate-General refers to Rex v. the Superintendent of Vine Street Police Station, ex parte Liebmann (1916), 1 K.B. 268, and suggests that, although The Hague Convention does not expressly deal with or provide for the case, the persons in question are entitled to be treated as prisoners of war, and that the provisions of The Hague Convention and the Royal Warrant, which was made pursuant to that convention, may legally be taken as a guide and applied so far as applicable to civilians; while the Director of Special Intelligence refers to Schaffinius v. Goldberg (1916), 1 K.B. 284 C.A., and suggests that the true view is that they are not prisoners of war in the sense of The Hague Convention; that only such measures may properly be taken in regard to them as are necessary to secure the public safety; that it is doubtful whether among enemy subjects any distinction can be made between enemy male civilians of military age and others, and that whether the former can be treated for all or particular purposes as prisoners of war is a matter of policy.

The Judge Advocate-General, as appears from his minute of the 17th January, 1918, in paragraph 2 (a), also desires to be advised with regard to regulation 14 (B) of the Defence of the Realm Regulations whether persons interned under that regulation (whether of enemy, neutral, or British nationality) can be dealt with for the purpose of trial and punishment for offences under the Royal Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War, in spite of the fact that it is expressly provided that an escape, or attempt to escape, or a breach of the rules is an offence against the regulations. In other words, are there these two alternative methods of dealing with them, or is it necessary to apply to them the more cumbrous procedure of trial under the regulations? This point is, of course, one of English law and is apart from the question of the manner in which enemy subjects can be treated under international law.

GENERAL

21

With regard to the general question, reference may be made to Robinson v. Metcalfe (1917), 33 Times L.R. 542, where the Court had before it the question whether a male British subject of military age who had been detained in Germany for some twelve hours on the 6th August, 1914, and then allowed to leave the country was "a prisoner of war, captured, or interned by the enemy" within section 8 of "The Military Services Act, 1916" (sess. 2). It was assumed in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice that the man "when detained would have the status of a prisoner of war and not that of a civilian," and it was held that the temporary detention was merely for the purpose of determining whether he was to be made a prisoner of war, i.e., that he was only detained for enquiry. The question argued in the case was whether, on the words of the Act, there was only one class of person exempted—"prisoner of war captured or interned"—or three classes: a prisoner of war, a person captured, and a person interned. No question such as that now under discussion was before the Court, but the decision, so far as it goes, seems to show that the expression "prisoner of war" has not been regarded as a term of art, the definition of which is to be gathered solely from the terms of The Hague Convention.

It may be added to the considerations put forward in the minutes referred to that it is to be observed that by the preamble of Convention IV of 1907 the provisions of that convention were merely intended to serve as general rules of conduct for belligerents in their relations with each other and with their populations, and it was declared "that in cases not included in the regulations . . . populations and belligerents remain under the protection and the rule of the principles of the law of nations as they result from the usages established between civilised nations, from the laws of humanity and the requirements of the public conscience," and that by article 1 the regulations annexed were intended as a guide to the instructions to be issued to armed land forces. The provision of article 2 requiring all the belligerents to be parties to the convention may, it is conceived, be treated as of no importance for the present purpose. The articles relative to prisoners of war seem clearly to be directed only to persons captured in actual hostilities by an army.

It will be seen that alternative forms have been suggested for the questions to be put to the Law Officers, and that it was finally agreed that the question should be in general terms, as is set out in question 1 hereunder; but the Law Officers will, no doubt, take into consideration in their answer the questions suggested by the Judge Advocate-General and the Director of Special Intelligence.

The Law Officers are requested to advise—

1. Whether (i) civilian enemy subjects or (ii) civilian male enemy subjects of military age interned under (a) regulation 14 (B) of the Defence of the Realm Regulations, (b) the Royal prerogative, and (c) Indian Ordinance No. III of 1914 are prisoners of war to whom the provisions of the annex to The Hague Convention No. IV of 1907 and the Royal Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War are legally applicable.

2. Whether, as a matter of English law, persons interned under regulation 14 (B) of the Defence of the Realm Regulations can be dealt with, for the purpose of trial and punishment for offences, under the Royal Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War as an alternative to dealing with them as guilty of offences under the regulation.

3. Whether (as is asked by the Indian Government in their telegram of the 4th February, 1918) civilian prisoners of war include all enemy subjects whose profession was not that of arms at the time of their internment and include those who, by reason of being of military age, were potential soldiers or sailors.

4. Generally on the case.

With reference to the case at present before the Law Officers on this point, further enquiry has been made as to what are the actual restrictions imposed on persons interned in India, with a view to ascertaining whether there was in India anything corresponding to the English Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War, a copy of which is before the Law Officers. The reply from the India Office is that that warrant applies to India; the India Office and the Government of India were consulted when it was drafted and it contains numerous references to India, and the warrant empowering the Commander-in-chief in India to convene and confirm military courts for the trial of prisoners (see Appendix (A) of the Royal Warrant) was sent direct to India by the War Office in September 1914.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. In our opinion the provisions of the annex to The Hague Convention No. IV of 1907 do not, as a matter of international convention, apply to any interned civilians, but it is open to the Government to apply these or analogous provisions to civilian enemy subjects of any age interned either under the Royal prerogative or under the Indian Ordinance No. III of 1914 without any breach of international law. The Royal Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War applies to all such interned enemy civilians as are subjects of nations which are parties to The Hague Convention. Persons interned under regulation 14 (B) are legally subject to the like restrictions and may be dealt with in like manner, except so far as the Secretary of State may relax such restrictions.

2. Persons interned under the regulation can be dealt with, for the purpose of trial and punishment for offences during internment, under the Royal Warrant for the Maintenance of Discipline among Prisoners of War, whether they are, as an alternative, liable to be dealt with as guilty of an offence under the regulation or not. Whether they are liable to be dealt with as guilty of an offence under the regulation appears to depend upon the question whether their offence constitutes failure to comply with some provision of the order of the Secretary of State.

3. We think that the expression "civilian prisoners of war" includes all interned enemy subjects whose profession was not that of arms at the time of their internment, although, being of military age, they may be potential soldiers or sailors. The words must, however, be construed with due regard to the context.

4. We do not think that we can usefully add anything further.

FREDERICK SMITH.
GORDON HEWART

Law Officers' Department, May 15, 1918.

1919

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(11612)

LAST COPY.

3

Nothing mutilated or removed. Admin.

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1919.

1919

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked I^a, &c

PRIZE LAW.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
I^a	Law Officers, Mr. Raeburn and Dr. Pearce Higgins [Procurator-General]	Apr., 1919	Valuation of ships placed in the Prize Court and requisitioned by the Crown	1
I^b	Law Officers .. [Admiralty]	Aug. 15,	Title to enemy ships in United States ports on the outbreak of the war	6
I^c	Law Officers, Mr. Raeburn and Dr. Pearce Higgins [Procurator-General]	Aug. 20,	Valuation of ships placed in the Prize Court and requisitioned by the Crown	7
1	Law Officers ..	June 12,	Disposal on conclusion of peace of parcels and letter mails detained by His Majesty's Government during the war	8

VARIOUS.

(Arranged according to Countries.)

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

2	Law Officers ..	Apr. 22, 1919	Disposal of war material by the Governments of Austria and Hungary	13
---	-----------------	---------------	--	----

CHINA.

3	Law Officers ..	Aug. 9, 1919	China (Companies) Amendment Order in Council, 1919	14
---	-----------------	--------------	--	----

GENERAL.

4	Law Officers ..	May 27, 1919	Question of revoking the safe-conduct granted to Captain Kiesewetter	15
5	Law Officers ..	Aug. 15,	Transportation of passengers of German nationality by the Royal Holland Lloyd Steamship Company's vessels	16
6	Law Officers ..	Aug. 19,	Restricted immigration of aliens into the United Kingdom. Question of compatibility with provisions of commercial treaties between Great Britain and other countries of measures on lines of article 22 (b) of Aliens Restriction Order	18

232—[3996]

a

(iii)

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
6 ^a	Law Officers, Mr. Parr and Mr. Hills [Inland Revenue Department]	Sept. 19, 1919	Position of foreign sovereign Powers in relation to British income tax	20
7	Law Officers ..	Nov. 4,	Communication to His Majesty's Consul-General, Rotterdam, of list of German naval personalities to be surrendered under Treaty of Peace. Notification by foreign shipping companies of German adult male passengers outward bound from Europe	22

TURKEY.

8	Law Officers ..	Aug. 7, 1919	Trial and punishment of Turkish offenders ..	23
9	Law Officers ..	Dec. 23,	Administration of Justice at Constantinople ..	26

(iv)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1919.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ALI—HUN.

A.

Aliens. See Immigration.
Austria: disposal of war material by, 13, 14.

B.

Banks: deposits of Siamese Government in London banks; liability to income tax, 20, 21.

C.

"Chile," 2.
China (Companies) Amendment Order in Council, 14.
Companies in China. See China (Companies).
Constantinople: administration of justice, 26-28.
" : Inter-Allied Courts, 26-28.
Consuls: communication to British Consul-General, Rotterdam, of list of German naval personalities to be surrendered under Treaty of Peace, 22.
Courts: British military, in Turkey; jurisdiction, 23-26.
" Inter-Allied, at Constantinople, 26-28.

D.

Deposits. See Banks.
Dominions, British: position in relation to British income tax, 20, 21.
" Düsseldorf," 1.

E.

Enemy vessels. See Vessels.

F.

"Frederick VIII," 10.

G.

"Germania," 3.
Germany: German male passengers outward bound from Europe; notification by foreign shipping companies of names, 22.
" : nationals; transportation on vessels of Royal Holland Lloyd Steamship Company, 16, 17, 22.
" : naval personalities to be surrendered under Peace Treaty; communication of list to British Consul-General, Rotterdam, 22.
Governments: foreign; position in relation to British income tax, 20, 21.

H.

Hague Convention VI: valuation of ships detained under, 1-8.
Hungary: disposal of war material by, 13, 14.

IMM—PRI.

I.

Immigration: into United Kingdom; compatibility of article 22 (b) of Aliens Restriction Order with provisions of commercial treaties, 18, 19.
Income tax, British: position of foreign Sovereigns and sovereign Powers, 20, 21.
" : position of British Dominions and Commonwealths, 20, 21.
" : liability of Siamese Government to income tax on interest on deposits in London banks, 20, 21.

J.

Jurisdiction: British military courts in Turkey, 23-26.
" : of Inter-Allied Courts at Constantinople, 26-28.
" : over Turkish offenders, 23-28.
Justice: administration of, at Constantinople, 26-28.
" : trial and punishment of offenders in Turkey, 23-26.

K.

Kiesewetter, Captain: revocation of safe-conduct, 15, 16.
" Kristianiafjord," 10.

L.

Letter mails. See Mails.

M.

Mails: parcel and letter mails detained during war; disposal, 8-13.
Military Courts. See Courts.
Munitions: disposal of, by Austria and Hungary, 13, 14.

N.

Navy, German: personalities to be surrendered under Treaty of Peace; communication of list to British Consul-General, Rotterdam, 22.

O.

Order in Council. See China (Companies).

P.

Parcel mails. See Mails.
Prize Court. See Vessels.

(v)

REQ—TUR.

R.

Requisitioned vessels. See Vessels.
Royal Holland Lloyd Steamship Company, 16, 17, 22.

S.

Safe-conduct: for Captain Kiesewetter; question of revocation, 15, 16.
Siam: liability of Government to income tax on interest on deposits in London banks, 20, 21.
Sovereigns: foreign; position in relation to British income tax, 20, 21.

T.

Treaties, commercial: compatibility of Aliens Restriction Order, article 22 (b), 18, 19.
Trial of Turkish offenders, 23-26.
Turkey: jurisdiction of British military courts, 23-26.
" : trial and punishment of offenders, 23-26.
" : administration of justice at Constantinople, 26-28.
" : proposed Inter-Allied court at Constantinople, 26-28.

UNI—WAR.

U.

United Kingdom: immigration into. See Immigration.
United States: enemy ships in United States ports at outbreak of war; title, 6.

V.

Valuation. See Vessels.
Vessels: placed in Prize Court and requisitioned by the Crown; valuation, 1-8.
" : enemy, in United States ports at outbreak of war; title, 6.
" : transportation of German nationals in Royal Holland Lloyd Steamship Company's vessels, 16, 17, 22.
" : notification by foreign shipping companies of names of German male passengers outward-bound from Europe, 22.

W.

War criminals. See Navy, German.
" : materials. See Munitions.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1919.

PRIZE LAW.

[70321]

No. 1⁴.

[Procurator-General.]

[File 9529/19.]

[April, 1919.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.

HEREWITH are sent:—

Print of the 7th Interim Report of the Oversea Prize Disposal Committee.

Letter from the Secretary of the Committee to the Procurator-General, dated the 8th November, 1918.

Transcript of proceedings in the Privy Council in the case of "Germania," "Tiberius," "Osnabrück," "Melbourne," "Sumatra," and "Berlin."

Print of Judgment.

Case laid before the Solicitor-General and Mr. Raeburn with opinion, dated the 25th February, 1918.

List of ships under requisition with particulars.

Printed list of detained ships prepared by the Oversea Prize Disposal Committee.

Valuation
of ships placed in the Prize Court and requisitioned by the Crown.

The question upon which counsel's advice is sought is as to the basis of the valuation to be applied to ships which were placed in the Prize Court and requisitioned by the Crown, and what date should be fixed for such valuations.

Shortly after the outbreak of war a number of German ships were captured either in port or on the high seas and were placed in the Prize Court.

As soon as the shortage of shipping was apparent, which was towards the end of 1914, applications were made to the Prize Court under order 29 of the Prize Court Rules to requisition ships in the custody of the Marshal. These ships were in two categories—

1. Ships seized as prize in respect of which a decree of condemnation would be asked for.
2. Ships in the custody of the Marshal in respect of which the "Chile" order either had been made or would be asked for.

With regard to—

1. This class of case may almost be disregarded, as nearly all the ships which were requisitioned before trial in the early days of the war have now been brought before the Court, and decrees of condemnation have been made.

In a recent case—steamship "Düsseldorf," a German ship captured off the coast of Norway—an order was made by the Registrar on the 12th September, 1918, giving leave to requisition the vessel, which was to be appraised by the Marshal. A commission of appraisement was issued and the appraisers valued the vessel at 57,480*l.* as on the 18th September, 1918, the date on which the ship was taken over from the Marshal. Similarly the four German ships which were captured off the Dutch coast in July 1917 were all appraised as at the date they were taken over under the order giving leave to requisition them.

2. Ships under detention by virtue of decrees of the president made pursuant to The Hague Convention No. 6, i.e., an order as in the "Chile."

The "Chile" order, as counsel will remember, is the form settled by the President as being the proper decree to be made where ships came within The Hague Convention No. 6, and were therefore, according to that convention, merely liable to be detained on condition of restoring them after the war. The form of order was not final, as it was thought better to preserve liberty to apply in case the enemy should not consider himself bound by this convention. The actual form of the order, which will be found at page 48 in vol. i in "Lloyd's Reports of Prize Cases," is as follows:—

"The President . . . pronounced the said sailing ship 'Chile' to have belonged at the time of seizure thereof to enemies of the Crown, and as such to have been lawfully seized by the officers of His Majesty's Customs at the port of Cardiff as good and lawful prize and as droits and perquisites of His Majesty in his office of Admiralty, and therefore, upon the application of Mr. Attorney-General for the Crown, ordered the said ship to be detained by the Marshal until further order is issued by the Court. All questions of costs reserved. Liberty to apply."

The Hague Convention No. 6, article 2, while stating that such a ship may not be confiscated, provides that the belligerent may merely detain it on condition of restoring it after the war without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation. The French version of this article, which, as counsel is aware, is the authentic version, is as follows:—

"Le belligérant peut seulement le saisir moyennant l'obligation de le restituer après la guerre sans indemnité, ou le réquisitionner moyennant indemnité," a phrase somewhat inadequately translated by the words "paying compensation."

In requisitioning these ships the machinery provided by the rules of the Prize Court was followed.

The original rules which were in force from the beginning of the war until the 23rd March, 1915 (being the period during which most of the ships were requisitioned), only gave power to the Admiralty to requisition ships, but by the amendment which came into force on the 23rd March, 1915 ("Pulling's Manual," vol. iii, p. 510), power was given to requisition ships on behalf of the Crown.

Order 29 of the Prize Court Rules contemplates that whenever a ship is requisitioned she shall be appraised unless (Rule 3) it is made to appear to the judge on behalf of the Crown that the ship is required for the use of His Majesty's service forthwith, in which case the ship is forthwith released and delivered to the Admiralty without appraisement, and Rule 4 provides that where a ship has been requisitioned and whether or not an appraisement has been made, any party may apply to the Court to fix the amount to be paid in respect of the ship, and the sum so fixed shall be paid into the Court on behalf of the Crown.

Two new Rules 4 A and 4 B were added to Order 29 by Order in Council of the 30th September, 1914 ("Emergency Manual," vol. i, p. 366). Rule 4 A provided that in lieu of payment into Court the proper officer of the Crown may give an undertaking in writing to pay the appraised value of the ship or the amount fixed under Rule 4, and Rule 4 B, stated that a ship may be requisitioned temporarily.

The whole requisitioning Order was repealed and re-enacted with modifications by Order in Council of the 29th April, 1915, which came into force on the 23rd March, 1915 ("Emergency Manual," vol. iii, p. 508).

All the requisitioned ships which were subsequently condemned as prize became the absolute property of the Crown and are entirely outside the present case. The remaining ships, namely, those in respect of which a decree for detention had been made, were in most cases requisitioned temporarily under Order 29, Rule 4 B, but in a few cases were requisitioned permanently. In no case has any payment been made into Court by the Crown, but undertakings have been given under Rule 4 A. In a few cases the ships were appraised, the value taken being that of the value at the date of handing over, but in the majority of cases the requisition was under Rule 3 of the Order, i.e., the ship was requisitioned forthwith without appraisement, and in no case has the value of a ship been fixed as provided by Rule 4.

Council will see from the Seventh Interim Report of the Oversea Prize Disposal Committee, which is dated the 30th September, 1918, that the Committee wishes to requisition permanently the ships now under temporary requisition, and also that the value of the ships shall be fixed by the Court under Order 29, Rule 4. It is very desirable that this should be done before peace is signed.

It is suggested that these applications, which will be made to the Registrar on notice to the parties (if any) still on the record shall be supported by a valuation given by a ship valuer of standing in London who can make a valuation without necessarily inspecting the ship from the particulars given in Lloyd's Register and in other accessible records. The date taken by the valuer should presumably be the date of the order giving leave to requisition, or the date of handing over, or possibly the date of capture or seizure.

It does not necessarily follow that the value fixed by the Prize Court on requisition is the value of the ship for all purposes. The Prize Court is only concerned to fix the value of a ship with the possession of which it is parting, and it will presumably therefore take the value of the day of delivery to the Crown.

The rights of the owners of the ship are not, however, to be determined by reference to the Prize Court Rules, but by reference to The Hague Convention, and it may well be that the value of the ship which they are entitled to receive under that instrument is—theoretically, at any rate—different from that which the Prize Court has fixed as its interest in the prize.

From the point of view of the British Government it is presumably advantageous to keep the value to be accounted for to the owners as low as possible, and, while it will be difficult to resist the argument that the value to be fixed by the Prize Court is that on the date of requisition, it will be desirable to keep open the contention that the only value to be accounted for to the owners is the value of the ship on the day of seizure in an enemy port from which she could not sail for an indefinite period.

It is of course important that the proper basis of valuation shall be taken, and counsel is referred to the argument in the Privy Council in the case of the "Germania" and others, a transcript of which is herewith.

Counsel may remember that this was an appeal from New South Wales. Certain German ships which at the outbreak of war were found in the port of Sydney were ordered by the Prize Court of New South Wales, following the "Chile," to be detained until further order. Orders were then made that they should be temporarily delivered to the Admiralty without appraisement under Order 29, Rule 4 B, "Emergency Manual," vol. i, p. 367. Some months later the Court ordered that the ships be delivered to the Crown without appraisement, that is to say, they turned the temporary requisition under Rule 4 B into a permanent requisition under Rules 2 and 3. It was then referred to the Registrar to fix the amount to be paid by the Crown in respect of the values of these ships. The German masters who appeared applied for an adjournment to enable them to get evidence from Germany as to the values of these ships. This application was refused, and in effect the appeal to the Privy Council was from the refusal of the Registrar to adjourn the valuation until after the war.

Mr. Bateson, who appeared for the appellants in the Privy Council, argued that under The Hague Convention No. 6, article 2, a ship under detention should only be requisitioned on terms that the owner should be "indemnified."

Considerable discussion took place during the argument as to the meaning of the words "moyennant indemnité" in article 2 of The Hague Convention No. 6, but the appeal was dismissed without actually deciding this question.

A list is herewith showing the ships which have been requisitioned by the Admiralty and have not been condemned as prize.

As already stated, a number of these ships were requisitioned temporarily under Order 29, Rule 6, as amended by Order in Council, dated the 29th April, 1915 ("Emergency Manual," vol. iii, p. 510), but it is proposed to apply for an order to requisition the ships permanently under Rules 1 and 2 of Order 29.

The question whether under The Hague Convention No. 6 the owner is entitled as of right to the return of his ship, or only to compensation at the option of the belligerent who has requisitioned it, is one which may be open to doubt.

It is felt that in the circumstances, whichever may be the correct view, the position of the Crown will be strengthened by converting all temporary requisitions into unqualified requisitions under Order 29, Rule 2. This will at any rate remove the possibility of an argument for their return being based on the temporary character of the order of requisition.

The effect of an unqualified order under Order 29, Rule 2, will no doubt be of importance at a later date, and the question may be raised whether its effect is to transfer to the Crown an absolute title on the ship for all purposes or whether it only confers a right of user and enjoyment without transferring the title, which right will automatically come to an end at the declaration of Peace. If there is any risk of this happening it should be borne in mind when the Treaty of Peace is framed.

The Prize Court Rules themselves do not, of course, confer on the Crown any power which it has not already acquired aliunde, but it is submitted that the Crown should, if necessary, contend that The Hague Convention gives power to requisition absolutely and for all purposes, and that in acting under it the Crown has more extensive powers than it has in requisitioning the ships and goods of its own nationals.

Counsel is requested to advise:—

1. In the case of the vessels appraised, whether the Crown will be safe in taking the appraised value appraised under a commission of appraisement as fixing the value of the ship absolutely.

2. In case of vessels not appraised—

- (a.) What date should be fixed for the valuation—

- (1.) The beginning of the war;
- (2.) The date of seizure;
- (3.) The date of the decree ordering detention;
- (4.) The date of the order for requisition;
- (5.) The date when the ship was handed over pursuant to the order to requisition; or
- (6.) The end of the war.

- (b.) What basis of value should be taken, e.g.—

- (1.) The value to the owner;
- (2.) The market value—
 - (a.) The world market;
 - (b.) The allied market;
 - (c.) The "free" market, or the market subject to requisition;

- (3.) Whether the owner is in fact entitled to an indemnity (see 6th Hague Convention, article 2, "moyennant indemnité"). If so, what does the term imply?

- (4.) Whether the Crown is to account to the owner for all net profits made by ships while under requisition;

- (5.) Whether the value should be deferred from the date taken until the end of the war;

- (6.) Whether allowance should be made on the basis that the Crown is not bound to keep the ship and machinery in good condition.

- (c.) What procedure should be adopted in order to get the values fixed, or possibly the appraisements amended so as to make them in accordance with counsel's advice upon the previous questions (see Order 29, Rule 4).

- (d.) Whether in the case of any ships requisitioned in respect of which a final order for condemnation has not been made, such requisition will cease to be operative at the end of the war.

Opinion of the Law Officers, Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Dr. Pearce Higgins, with regard to Detained Enemy Ships under Requisition.

Before answering in detail the questions submitted to us we think it well to make a preliminary observation on The Hague Convention No. 6, 1907. The Prize Court has declined to decide expressly on the relationship between the 1st and 2nd articles, and we do not therefore propose to anticipate any decision which it may ultimately give should it be called upon for one.

Dealing now with the questions submitted:—

1. In the case of the vessels appraised, whether the Crown will be safe in taking the appraised value appraised under a Commission of Appraisement as fixing the value of the ship absolutely.

2. In case of vessels not appraised—

- (a.) What date should be fixed for the valuation—

- (1.) The beginning of the war;
- (2.) The date of seizure;
- (3.) The date of the decree ordering detention;
- (4.) The date of the order for requisition;
- (5.) The date when the ship was handed over pursuant to the order to requisition; or
- (6.) The end of the war.

- (b.) What basis of value should be taken, e.g.—

- (1.) The value to the owner;
- (2.) The market value—
 - (a.) The world market;
 - (b.) The allied market;
 - (c.) The "free" market, or the market subject to requisition;
- (3.) Whether the owner is, in fact, entitled to an indemnity (see The Hague Convention, No. 6, article 2, "moyennant indemnité"). If so, what does the term imply.

- (4.) Whether the Crown is to account to the owner for all net profits made by ships while under requisition.

- (5.) Whether the value should be deferred from the date taken until the end of the war.

- (6.) Whether allowance should be made on the basis that the Crown is not bound to keep the ship and machinery in good condition.

- (c.) What procedure should be adopted in order to get the values fixed, or possibly the appraisements amended, so as to make them in accordance with counsel's advice upon the previous questions (see Order 29, Rule 4).

1. No; see our next answer.

2. (a.) We are of opinion that the valuation should be fixed as at the date of seizure.

- (b.) We are of opinion that the value to be taken should be that which the vessel would have had in the world market at the date of seizure.

- (3.) We are of opinion that the term "moyennant indemnité" means that if the vessel is to be restored to the owner he is to be compensated on the basis of the value of the ship in the condition in which she would have been had she been laid up and not requisitioned. We think that the detaining power under this Convention, in case it does not requisition a ship, is only under a duty to protect it from damage by pillage, but is under no obligation to make any compensation for deterioration due to non-user.

- (4.) The owner has no claim for the freight earned by the ship if she has been requisitioned.

- (5.) We see no reason for deferring the valuation until the end of the war.

- (6.) See our answer under (3).

- (c.) An application should be made to the Court to fix the amount to be paid.

1919

6

PRIZE LAW.

(d.) Whether in the case of any ships requisitioned in respect of which a final order for condemnation has not been made, such requisition will cease to be operative at the end of the war.

(d.) We think not. The requisition will, in our opinion, continue until it is determined by an order of the Court.

April 1919.

G. H.
E. M. P.
W. N. R.
A. P. H. (except as regards 2 (d).)

[126901]

No. 1^B.

[Admiralty.]

[File 289/1919.]

[August 15, 1919.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

HEREWITH are sent:—

1. Copy telegrams.
2. Copy Executive Order of United States taking over German ships in American ports.
3. Memorandum by First Sea Lord.
4. Memorandum by the Economic Section of the British Delegation on Reparation—Enemy Merchant Shipping.
5. Memorandum by Dr. Pearce Higgins.

Title to enemy ships in U.S. ports on the outbreak
of war.

It is understood that the United States representatives at the Congress in Paris claim that the title to the enemy ships seized in United States ports has become legally vested in the United States Government under the Joint Resolution adopted by Congress and approved by the President on the 12th May, 1917, and an Executive Order dated 30th June, 1917.

No decree of condemnation by a Prize Court has been made in respect of these vessels.

It may be that for municipal purposes the transfer of the vessels is valid and effective, but greater doubt is felt as to the validity of the transfer in international law, and it is understood that the naval authorities desire to have the observations of the Law Officers upon this aspect of the question.

A memorandum on the subject by Dr. Pearce Higgins is sent with these papers.

The Law Officers are requested to advise whether a valid title to these vessels has been transferred to the United States Government in international law under the Joint Resolution and Executive Order without a decree of condemnation by a Prize Court.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

In our opinion a valid legal title to these vessels has been transferred to the United States Government under Resolution and Executive Order, and no decree of condemnation by a Prize Court is necessary to perfect such title.

Subject to any treaties, we think that a belligerent State may, if it thinks fit, lawfully seize and confiscate any enemy property found within its territories, and the intention to exercise this right cannot be evidenced more conclusively than by a Legislative Act. Prize Courts are the creatures of the Sovereign creating them, and can have no higher authority than the Sovereign Power itself. According to Maine ("International Law," p. 96), their object in the abstract "is to satisfy the conscience of the Sovereign that the captures made by its subjects are valid captures."

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
August 15, 1919.

PRIZE LAW.

7

[119310]

No. 1^C.

[Procurator-General.]

[File 9529/1919.]

[August 20, 1919.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Dr. Pearce Higgins.

IN the opinion* which is sent herewith, the Law Officers and Counsel advised in paragraph 2 (b) that the value to be taken should be that which the vessels would have had in the world market at the date of seizure.

Valuation
of ships placed in the Prize Court and requisitioned by
the Crown.

In view of the importance of the valuation proceeding upon correct principles, which will apply to detained enemy vessels throughout the Empire, further guidance is desired as to the considerations which should be taken into account in ascertaining the value of these vessels. The specific point upon which advice is sought is whether the vessels are to be valued as free ships, or whether they are to be valued as enemy ships lying in a belligerent port upon the outbreak of war.

If they are treated as free ships sold in a world market, their value will necessarily be higher than if they are valued as enemy ships.

It is desired to point out that it is not inconsistent with the opinion which has been given to treat the vessels as enemy vessels, and it is submitted that, in valuing a ship, the proper course is to take into account all the considerations which in fact apply to her at the moment at which the ship is to be valued. That is to say, that the vessel should be valued as she in fact is, an enemy ship lying in a belligerent port, immobilised for an indefinite period. She should be treated as a ship for which no neutral would bid, except on the footing that she could not be used until the conclusion of the war, because she could not be transferred to a neutral flag without the consent of the belligerent Governments, which they are under no obligation to give, and she would therefore remain liable to capture if sent to sea under a neutral flag.

The result may indeed be that only British or Allied subjects would bid for her, and that, in fact, would amount to a sale in a restricted market, but the price given for her in these circumstances would none the less be her true value in the world market, which would necessarily have been restricted by the prevailing conditions, so as to limit the potential buyers to firms of British or Allied nationality.

To treat the vessel as a free vessel is to bestow upon her gratuitously advantages and privileges which she does not in fact enjoy, and to put her on the same basis as a British ship is to value her under conditions which are entirely non-existent in the case of the ship being valued. The result would indeed be to give her a purely fictitious value, as it is obviously absurd to suppose that a German ship and a British ship of the same class and tonnage had the same value in the world market upon the 5th August, 1914; still less had they the same value at the somewhat later date of requisition, when no German ship was to be found at sea.

It was meant to raise this point by question 2 (b) (5) of the case upon which counsel wrote their opinion of the 17th April, 1919, but it is possible that in answering this question in the negative counsel did not have in mind all the considerations above stated.

In order to carry out the opinion of counsel three typical cases of detained enemy ships were taken before the President, who made an order for permanent requisition, but decided that the value which should be put upon these ships was the value at the date of the first requisition, not the value at the date of capture.

It should be borne in mind that the value at the date of requisition is not necessarily, although it may be, the value which has to be accounted for to the enemy owner under the Hague Convention. Whatever may be the value to which the enemy owner is entitled, the argument in favour of the value at the date of requisition being the restricted value contended for above seems to be very strong.

It is submitted that these very material considerations should be taken into account in valuing these vessels.

The Law Officers and Counsel are requested to advise as to the basis upon which these vessels should be valued, and the considerations which should be taken into account.

Solicitor's Department, Treasury,
July 1919.

* See No. 1A.

1919

8

PRIZE LAW.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. W. Norman Raeburn, K.C., and Dr. A. Pearce Higgins.

THE President has decided that the date of requisition is the date as at which the value is to be fixed.

We have already advised that the basis of such valuation is the value of the vessel in the "world market." It appears to us, therefore, that the world market must be taken as it existed at the date of requisition, that is to say, that enemy purchasers were excluded and that the only possible purchasers were subjects of the Allied States and neutrals. We see no reason to exclude neutrals as possible purchasers, or to assume that the Allied States would not give their consent to the transfer of the vessel to a neutral flag. Put shortly, we consider that the vessel should be valued just as if she were a British vessel put up for sale in a British market during the war, and subject to the same advantages or disadvantages in the eyes of a British, Allied, or neutral bidder.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
W. NORMAN RAEBURN.
A. PEARCE HIGGINS.

*Law Officers' Department,
August 20, 1919.*

[135538]

No. 1.

[File 4577/1919.]

[June 12, 1919.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 29, 1919.

I AM desired by Lord Curzon of Kedleston to request your opinion respecting certain questions which have arisen for solution with reference to the action to be taken by His Majesty's Government as regards large numbers of postal packets detained in this country.

As you will be aware, His Majesty's Government have, during the war, exercised the right of visit and search as regards mails. The exercise of the belligerent rights of His Majesty's Government in this respect has formed the subject of controversy with the Government of the United States and certain neutral Governments (a copy of correspondence on this subject is enclosed for convenience of reference), but, as you will observe, His Majesty's Government, acting in co-operation with the French Government, have maintained their right to search mails, and a very large number of postal packets have in fact been detained on the ground that their transmission to their destinations would have increased the material or financial resources of the enemy for the prosecution of the war, and they are at present stored in this country.

The detained postal packets in question fall into the following categories:—

1. Packets containing merchandise proper.
2. Packets containing currency, realisable securities, or documents which are in any way connected with the transfer of money or merchandise, and which have been declared absolute contraband (vide proclamations of the 12th April and 23rd November, 1916, of which copies are attached).
3. Packets containing wills, leases, birth and naturalisation certificates, or other forms of a legal nature.
4. Packets containing insurance and reinsurance documents, e.g., "bordereaux."
5. Ordinary commercial or financial letters.
6. Private letters.

Each of the above categories must be sub-divided as follows:—

- (a) Packets posted to or from enemy countries.
- (b) Packets posted to or from non-enemy countries, the actual contents of which were destined for or originated in enemy countries.

PRIZE LAW.

9

In the case of categories 1, 2, 4, and 5, there is a further sub-division:—

- (c.) Packets of which both the cover and contents were destined for or originated in non-enemy countries, but which were transmitted on enemy account or in enemy interest. These packets were detained either on internal evidence that their contents were ancillary to the transfer of money or the passage of merchandise to or from enemy countries, or on external evidence with regard to the enemy associations of the addressor, the addressee, or the parties interested (e.g., the fact that a blacklisted firm was concerned) where there was no evidence that the transactions involved were for neutral benefit only.

With regard to category (2) it should be observed that a large number of the packets falling thereunder were actually detained before the inclusion of their contents in the Contraband List by the Proclamation of the 23rd November, 1916. It should also be observed that a large number of packets were detained on the score, not of German, but of Austrian or other enemy interest, and that many of these were intercepted before the 10th January, 1917, the date upon which the Second Reprisals Order came into force. That Order, however, purports to be retrospective.

I am further to explain that the postal packets, with reference to which your advice is desired, have all been taken from what are known as "transit mails," but that the following different classes of mail are covered by this term:—

- (i.) Mails on board ships bound from one neutral country to another and ordered in by His Majesty's cruisers for the purpose of search, i.e., "Ordered Ships."
- (ii.) Mails on board vessels bound from one neutral country to another which either in the normal course of their voyage or for reasons of a navigational nature or in pursuance of an agreement with His Majesty's Government into which their owners had voluntarily entered (vide bunkering conditions of October 1915), called at a port in the United Kingdom, i.e., "voluntary ships."
- (iii.) Transit mails proper, i.e., mails between foreign countries despatched via United Kingdom and transmitted through this country by His Majesty's Post Office.

The treatment accorded to detained packets has been as follows:—

Packets found in the transit mails proper containing merchandise suspected to be either of enemy origin or for enemy destination have been transferred to the Customs, and dealt with under the Customs (War Powers) Acts, as goods imported from an enemy country or as goods "imported in contravention of the law relating to Trading with the Enemy" (vide Customs (War Powers) Act (No. 2), 1915).

Packets containing merchandise found in the mails of "ordered" or "voluntary" ships and packets found in transit mails proper, or in any other of the mails above enumerated and containing currency or containing securities or instruments of realisable value included in the list of absolute contraband have been placed in Prize in order that they might be dealt with either as contraband or as "goods" for enemy destination, or of enemy ownership or origin under the Reprisals Orders in Council of the 11th March, 1915, the 10th January, 1917, and the 16th February, 1917.

Packets, whether found in the ordinary transit mail or in any other of the mails above referred to, containing documents included in the list of absolute contraband but not in themselves of any realisable value (vide Proclamation of the 23rd November, 1916), have not actually been placed in Prize but an affidavit of seizure has in most cases been sworn in respect thereof, the effect of which has been to transfer them technically to the control of the Admiralty Marshal.

Packets of the nature described in categories 3, 4, 5, and 6 above have remained in the custody and control of the Censor.

The number of registered and unregistered postal packets referred to in the two immediately preceding paragraphs above is extremely large.

Some doubt may be felt as to the legality of the course pursued. In this connection I am to invite your attention to the Hague Convention No. XI, Articles 1

[3996]

C

Disposal on Conclusion of Peace of Parcels and Letter
Mails detained by
His Majesty's Government during the War.

1919

and 2. It will be observed that these Articles, if they accurately stated the law, and were strictly applied, might cause serious difficulty, particularly in the case of "Ordered Ships," the number of which, however, was not large.

I am to draw your attention to the manner in which this difficulty was dealt with in the enclosed correspondence. It has, as you will observe, been contended throughout, that the Convention, which deals solely with postal correspondence "found on the high seas," did not apply to the mails of any ship which "voluntarily" entered British territorial waters, and that it related only to "postal correspondence" in the strict sense of the term.

A further difficulty is caused by the Rome Postal Convention. It is, however, apprehended that this Convention has no application to packets which have not been "lost" in the ordinary sense of the word, but detained as the result of belligerent action in time of war. It would be desirable that you should deal with this point also, and it may be observed in this connection that if the indemnity for loss provided for in the Convention were applicable in respect of every registered packet detained by the Censor during the war and not released on the conclusion of peace, the sum payable would amount to about 1,500,000*l.*

Enquiries are now being received as to the eventual disposal of these packets. Requests for release have been received, and it is anticipated that these will continue to be received in increasing numbers. In these circumstances your advice is requested as to what is the best course to pursue. It would seem that the action to be taken by His Majesty's Government to a considerable extent depends upon whether any claim could in fact be successfully maintained in respect of the detention of such postal packets.

It is therefore necessary to consider whether any claim of the kind could be enforced in any Court of Law and, if so, by whom and in what Court. The expense of enforcing a claim, whether in the Prize Court or in any other Court, is a factor to be borne in mind, but it must also be remembered that in some cases the indirect damage suffered by neutrals owing to the detention of a postal packet may have been very serious.

I am to point out that if only one case were brought, and it were held that the detention could not be justified and gave rise to a valid claim against His Majesty's Government or against any officer acting on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the position might become an exceedingly embarrassing one.

I am to suggest that the main question for consideration is what action ought to be taken by the competent departments of His Majesty's Government. There are four courses which might be adopted. The postal packets might be destroyed; or they might be permanently detained; or they might be detained until claimed; or they might be sent on to their destination with or without any explanation. In this connection I am to say that it is understood that the French Government are in favour (a) of destroying all non-registered matter, (b) of detaining sine die all registered matter which does not contain valuables, paying claimants in each case the indemnity provided for in the Rome Convention, and (c) of handing over to a sequestrator all letters containing valuables. The United States censorship authorities on the other hand, are understood to take the view that letters of commercial or unusual sentimental value should now be sent on.

Assuming the Convention of Rome to be inapplicable, it may be doubted whether the distinction between registered and unregistered letters is of material importance, except as regards the difficulty of tracing their seizure, which is much greater in the case of unregistered than in the case of registered letters, since the seizure of most of the latter has been recorded in the registered letter lists, which went forward to the postal administrations of the countries of destination.

A more important distinction is the one mentioned above, viz., that between packets containing letters proper and packets containing "goods," as to which, vide the case of the steamship "Frederick VIII" (No. 95), in which an order was made for detention under the Order in Council of the 11th March, 1915, of bonds and shares of enemy origin outward bound from Copenhagen to New York, and vide also the case of the steamship "Kristianiafjord" (No. 1570), in which an order signed by an addressor in a neutral country (United States of America) directing an addressee in a neutral country (Denmark) to make a payment to a person in an enemy country and to charge the same to addressor's account was condemned as contraband.

It would seem that packets seized previous to the 16th February, 1917, if dealt with under the Orders in Council, would have, in the absence of further legislation, to be eventually released to claimants, whereas those seized subsequently to that date would, if containing goods of enemy destination or origin, be liable to condemnation. You will no doubt bear this point in mind.

Your attention is further drawn to a distinction as regards the treatment of detained packets which arose after the entry of the United States into the war, and which, although it does not seem to affect the principles involved, is referred to here in order to make this statement of facts as far as possible complete.

During the period between the declaration of war by the United States and the establishment of a censorship in that country, the mails between the United States and Europe continued to be dealt with by the British censorship in precisely the same way as when the United States was still a neutral country, but a list of all packets, both registered and unregistered, detained during that period was supplied to the United States consul-general in London. A considerable number of such packets remain in the hands of the British censor and of the Admiralty Marshal.

The United States Government eventually decided to leave the censoring of the mails between the United States and Northern Europe to the British censorship, appointing a liaison officer to advise the latter, but from the moment the American censorship came into being packets in transit between the United States and other non-enemy countries, when detained by the British censorship, were no longer kept in this country, such packets being transferred to New York for disposal. It may be observed in this connection that transit mails to and from certain Associated countries, e.g., Japan, Brazil, Siam, have from first to last been dealt with on precisely the same lines as those passing between non-enemy (i.e., neutral) countries.

It should perhaps be added that there are a number of letters which the Procurator-General will wish to retain because they constitute, or may constitute, useful evidence in cases in the Prize Court.

I am to ask that you will be so good as to favour Lord Curzon with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether any action or other proceeding could be brought against His Majesty's Government, or any person acting for His Majesty's Government, in respect of the detention of packets in any of the above categories of mails?
2. Whether there is any distinction for this purpose between registered and unregistered letters?
3. What the nature of the proceedings might be, and in what Court?
4. Whether in the event of diplomatic claims being brought His Majesty's Government would, in your opinion, have a valid answer to such claims?
5. Whether letters, other than those containing merchandise, which have been detained under the various conditions set out above, can be regarded as "goods" within the Orders in Council of the 11th March, 1915, 10th January, 1917, and 16th February, 1917, and if so whether you think it advisable that all, or any, of the packets which remain in the hands of the Censor should be placed in the custody of the Admiralty Marshal so as to come under those Orders in Council.
6. Whether the Postal Convention of Rome has any application to packets detained as the result of belligerent action?
7. Whether in your view the best course to pursue would be that the packets should be (a) destroyed, (b) permanently detained, (c) detained until claimed, (d) sent on, and if the latter whether with or without explanation?

I am to add that Lord Curzon would be glad to be favoured at as early a date as possible with your views, and further, with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer on this subject.

I have, &c.
W. TYRRELL.

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

June 5, 1919.

WITH reference to the letter from this department of the 29th ultimo, I am directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to transmit to you herewith, for your information, a copy of further correspondence on the subject of the detention of postal packets by His Majesty's Government.

It will be observed that in the memorandum No. 136261 which was circulated to [3996]

C 2

the representatives in London of all neutral Governments, a copy of which is enclosed, it was stated that the privileges of mails that are protected by the Hague Convention would continue to be carefully observed.

As you will doubtless be aware, the policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to the treatment of such mails has not, however, been altogether in accordance with that statement, and Lord Curzon would be glad to learn what bearing, if any, the statement has upon the question of the liability or otherwise of His Majesty's Government in respect of claims arising from damages and loss caused by the detention of postal packets.

I have, &c.
W. TYRRELL.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1 and 3. In our opinion the detention of the packets is an act of State in respect of which, except in cases where the packets are put in the Prize Court, no action or other proceeding can be brought by any alien in any Court, either against His Majesty's Government or against any person acting for the Government. See Buron v. Denman (1848), 2 Ex. Rpts., p. 167. Where the packets are put in the Prize Court, a claim for damages may be made in the proceedings in that Court.

2. There is no distinction for this purpose between registered and unregistered letters.

4. This is a question of considerable difficulty. The first point seems to be whether and if so, how far, the Hague Convention No. XI applies. It might, we think, be validly contended that the Convention has no application because it was not ratified by Russia and certain of the other belligerent Powers, but we do not think it is desirable to insist on this contention, especially having regard to the terms of the memorandum to the United States Government of the 12th October, 1916. Upon the assumption that Convention No. XI is recognised as binding, it applies (see Article 1) to "the postal correspondence of neutrals or belligerents . . . found on board a neutral or enemy ship at sea." In our opinion it applies to letter mails on "ordered ships," but not mails on "voluntary ships" or "transit mails proper," and not to parcel mails or merchandise proper at all. We cannot suggest any valid answer (if the Convention is recognised as binding) to claims through the diplomatic channel, properly substantiated, in respect of letter mails in "ordered ships" in categories 3, 4, 5 and 6. This remark also applies to category 2 where the packets were detained before the inclusion of the contents in the contraband list, unless they are put in the Prize Court and dealt with under the Reprisals Order in Council. See "Frederick VIII" (1917) P., p. 43. Apart from the Hague Convention No. XI, we think a valid answer can be made to any claim on the lines of the memorandum of the 12th October, 1916, already referred to in the case of sub-divisions (a) and (b) of all the categories, though it is somewhat difficult to justify the detention of such documents as wills, leases, &c. (category 3). As regards sub-division (c), it is impossible to express an opinion without knowing the exact nature of the contents of the particular packets. We do not think, for instance, that the detention can be justified on the mere ground that a black-listed firm was concerned.

5. We do not think that any of the documents in categories 3, 4, 5 and 6 can be regarded as "commodities" or "goods" within the Orders in Council, or that any advantage is to be obtained by placing them in the custody of the Admiralty Marshal. All those in category 2 which are liable to condemnation as contraband should, however, in our opinion, be placed in the custody of the Marshal, even if they are not of a realisable value.

6. We think not. The words in the Convention (Article 15) are "lost, taken by robbery, or damaged" (perdu, spolié ou avarié). (The Convention relates only to the parcel post.)

7. We think categories 3, 4 and 5 should be sent on, without explanation, as soon as peace is ratified,* and category 6 (private letters) should be detained with a view to their destruction after the lapse of a reasonable time, unless they are claimed in

* I.e., as soon as peace is ratified by Germany.

the meantime. (If any of the documents the Procurator-General desires to retain as evidence are in category 4 or 5, copies can be made of them, and the copies used in evidence.)

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
June 12, 1919.

Enclosures.

Parliamentary papers, Miscellaneous. Nos. 5, 9, 20, 23 and 28 (1916), and Miscellaneous, No. 2 (1917).
Proclamations (Contraband) of April 12 and November 23, 1916.
Bunkering conditions, October 1915.
Reprisals Order, No. 6, January 10, 1917.
Reprisals Orders in Council, March 11, 1915, and February 16, 1917.
Memorandum circulated to Neutral Representatives in London, September 23, 1915 [136261].
Sir A. Johnstone, No. 1827, Commercial, April 10, 1916 [60893].
Memorandum communicated by Norwegian Minister, May 3, 1916 [84846].

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

No. 2.

[62103]

[File No. 2138/1919]

[April 22, 1919.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen.

Foreign Office, March 21, 1919.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to transmit to you herewith copies of the papers noted on the enclosed schedule relative to a question which has been raised by the Italian Government as to the right of the Governments of Austria and Hungary to dispose freely of war material which was formerly the property of the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hungary.

2. You will observe that this question arose as the result of a note addressed by the Austrian Government to the representatives at Vienna of the neutral Powers charged with the protection of the interests of Austria-Hungary in the countries of the Allied Powers, protesting against the action of certain British and Czecho-Slovak officers who declared that the sale of such war material was illegal. The Government of Austria appears to have fixed upon this incident as an excuse to endeavour to induce the Governments of the Allied Powers to negotiate direct with them rather than through the intermediary of the neutral Powers charged with the respective interests of those countries.

3. I am to request that you will be so good as to favour Lord Curzon with your opinion on the points raised in the letter from the Treasury of the 12th March at your early convenience, as the matter is one of some urgency.

I have, &c.
GERALD SPICER.

Schedule.

1. Swedish Minister, January 16 [9499].
2. French Ambassador, January 27 [15333].
3. Italian Ambassador, February 19 [30737].
4. Treasury, March 12 [39870].
5. Article 19 of Armistice with Germany.
6. Armistice Convention with Austria-Hungary.
7. Financial clauses of Protocol to Armistice Convention, signed December 17, 1918.

Report.

The questions raised in the Treasury letter of the 2nd March, or the 12th March [39870], are whether a prohibition on the sale of the property in question can be claimed under "principles of common law," and whether the application of stipulations laid down in the Armistice Convention with Germany (see article 19) can be extended also to the German-Austrian Government without a further specific convention with that

Disposal
of war material by the Governments of Austria and Hungary.

Government. We do not think that there is any principle of "common law" (diritto naturale) under which such a prohibition can be claimed. In a sense, the goods of a debtor are the natural security of the creditor, but that does not prevent a debtor from selling and giving a good title to his goods. It is of course open to the Allies to declare that they will not recognise such sales, but it cannot be said that they are in any sense illegal. Nor do we think that the stipulations in the Armistice Convention with Germany apply to the German-Austrian Government.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
April 22, 1919.

CHINA.

[114538]

No. 3.

[File 15508/1919]

[August 9, 1919.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 22, 1919.

China
(Companies) Amendment
Order in Council,
1919.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to refer to the letter* addressed by the Solicitor-General to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the 25th October, 1915, in which that officer reports that in his opinion the draft Order in Council to be entitled "The China (Companies) Order in Council, 1915" may properly be submitted to the King for the approval of His Majesty in Council.

I am to state that in consequence of certain difficulties which have arisen in connection with the working of certain provisions of the original Order in Council and to which His Majesty's Minister at Peking has called attention it has been found necessary to prepare in consultation with the Colonial Office and the Board of Trade sundry amendments to that Order, which it is proposed to embody in an Amending Order to be entitled "The China (Companies) Amendment Order in Council, 1919."

A draft of the proposed Amendment Order is transmitted to you herewith.

I am therefore to request that you will take the draft Amendment Order into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Curzon with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper to be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

As it is desirable that the Amending Order should be passed with as little delay as possible, Lord Curzon would be grateful if he could be furnished with the expression of your opinion at your early convenience.

I have, &c.

VICTOR WELLESLEY.

Report.

In our opinion the terms of the draft Amendment Order† are fit and proper to be submitted to the King for the approval of His Majesty in Council.

In the last line but one of Article 6(2) the word "to" should, we think, be inserted between the words "by" and "with." See line 3 of Article 6(2).

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
August 9, 1919.

* Confidential 10,708, page 3.

† The text of the Order in Council is contained in the "London Gazette" of October 10, 1919 (Confidential No. 11328*).

GENERAL.

[130504]

No. 4.

[File 71213/1919.]

[May 27, 1919.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 19, 1919.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to request that you will favour his Lordship at your earliest convenience with your opinion on the following case:—

Question of revoking the safe-conduct granted to Captain
Kiese-
wetter.

2. The German Kapitänleutnant Wilhelm Kieseewetter, late commanding officer of the German submarine "U.C. 56," was found on the 6th instant at Falmouth on board the Netherlands steamship "Frisia" among a party of officers and crews from German submarines formerly interned in Spain, who were travelling from that country to the Netherlands under a safe-conduct for the journey issued by the French Embassy at Madrid and countersigned by a secretary of His Majesty's Embassy in the same capital. A copy of this document is enclosed.

3. Kapitänleutnant Kieseewetter also had in his possession documents, copies of which are enclosed herewith, showing that he had torpedoed the British hospital-ship "Glenart Castle" on the 26th February, 1918, and in view of this fact he was, under instructions from the naval authorities in London, removed from the "Frisia." He is now under detention pending consideration of the question whether he should be brought to trial for that infraction of the laws of naval warfare.

4. The circumstances in which the safe-conduct was given are not known to Lord Curzon, and he is making enquiry as to whether the document is genuine, and, if so, how it came to be issued and endorsed. The only form in which His Majesty's Government had agreed to the repatriation of officers and crews of German submarines from Spain consisted in assent given to a proposal made by the Spanish Government in December last to ship to Hamburg the German refugees in Spain, including the interned officers and crews of submarines. The agreement of His Majesty's Government to this proposal was given on certain conditions, one of which was that the "names of ships used for repatriation to Hamburg should be submitted beforehand for the approval of His Majesty's Government." It was understood that a Spanish ship would be used for the purpose.

5. It seems, however, to Lord Curzon that if the safe-conduct is genuine it cannot be disregarded by His Majesty's Government merely on the ground that His Majesty's Embassy had not authority to endorse it and so to make it binding upon them. It appears to his Lordship at the same time to be, at any rate, arguable that His Majesty's Government would be within their rights in revoking the safe-conduct in the case of this officer on the ground that he was included in its scope in ignorance of all the facts. There is authority (e.g., Calvo, "Droit international," section 2112, and Halleck, "International Law," vol. ii, 1893 edition, page 324) for the proposition that the general principles of the law of nations allow of a safe-conduct being, for good reason, revoked by the grantor. It is, however, stated in the British Manual of Military Law, 1914 edition, section 333, that if a safe conduct is revoked the bearer of it must be given an opportunity to withdraw in safety. If this rule is to be regarded as binding upon His Majesty's Government in all circumstances it would apparently make it impossible to keep Kapitänleutnant Kieseewetter in custody and bring him to trial.

6. It has been suggested to Lord Curzon that it may fairly be argued that the effect of the safe-conduct is only to relieve the persons to whom it was granted of liabilities in their capacity as enemies and that it does not exonerate them from liability, on account of any crimes which they may have committed, to arrest and detention by the British authorities in order that they may be charged with such crimes before a proper tribunal. Kapitänleutnant Kieseewetter was suspected of being guilty of having torpedoed the "Glenart Castle," but, as will be realised from what is stated above, the safe-conduct was not granted to him advisedly and in the consciousness of such suspicion, and it would certainly not have been granted to him if the facts disclosed in the documents which were found upon him at Falmouth had been known to, and present to the minds of, His Majesty's Government.

1919

16

GENERAL

7. Lord Curzon would be glad if you would take the facts set out above into your consideration, and would give him the benefit of your opinion whether it is open to His Majesty's Government to revoke the safe-conduct, so far as it applies to Kapitänleutnant Kiesewetter, and to detain this officer in custody for the purpose of bringing him to trial, either before a British court-martial or before such Court as may be appointed in pursuance of the terms of the Treaty of Peace to try persons charged with offences against the laws of warfare committed during the present conflict. The case will be submitted to the Peace Delegation in Paris for consideration from this latter point of view.

8. As will readily be appreciated, an early solution of the matter is eminently desirable, and Lord Curzon trusts that he may be favoured with your report with as little delay as possible.

I have, &c.
W. TYRRELL.

List of Papers.
Safe-conduct. 1
Documents re guilt.

Report.

On the assumption that the safe-conduct is genuine, we do not think that it is open to His Majesty's Government to detain the officer in custody for the purpose of bringing him to trial. There is no doubt as to the right to revoke a safe-conduct for good reason (e.g., if it is abused), though we doubt whether revocation would be justified by the facts in this case. But where a safe-conduct is revoked "good faith obviously requires that the grantee who has placed himself in the grasp of his enemy under a promise of immunity shall be allowed to withdraw in safety" (Hall, 3rd edition, page 542). We think that the Government must let this German go in accordance with the terms of the safe-conduct granted to him, which appears to contemplate Germany as his ultimate destination, and not to permit him to remain in Holland as an asylum. The Government will then rely on the provisions of the Peace Treaty for his being handed over by the German Government for trial.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
May 27, 1919.

[116790]

No. 5.

[File 104007/1919]

[August 15, 1919.]

Foreign Office to the Attorney-General.

Transportation of passengers of German nationality by Royal Holland Lloyd Steamship Company's vessels.

Sir, I AM directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to inform you that the agents in Rio de Janeiro of the Royal Holland Lloyd Steamship Company have enquired of His Majesty's Minister in that capital what the attitude of His Majesty's Government is towards the transportation of passengers of German nationality by their vessels.

2. The Director of Naval Intelligence, Admiralty, has concurred in a proposal, originally made by this Department, to reply that, in view of the ratification of the Peace Treaty by Germany, His Majesty's Government do not propose to interfere with German travellers on neutral ships unless they attempt to land in British territory, but he has suggested the additional proviso that such travellers are not persons whose surrender is required under article 228 of the treaty.

3. It does not appear to Lord Curzon that this suggestion could have any practical effect, either in preventing the conveyance of persons required under article 228 (unless it induced the steamship company to refuse all German passengers) or in facilitating their apprehension, unless the company or the British port authorities, or both, were in possession of the lists of such persons, which could not, of course, be communicated to them. But as the company's enquiry raises the question how best to prevent the escape of such persons from the ends of justice, his Lordship would be glad to be favoured with your views as to how it and similar enquiries should be answered. From the point of view just mentioned, the reply originally suggested by this Department appears inadequate, and it has now been suggested by Mr. Justice Peterson that it might be supplemented by requiring the steamship company to submit to His Majesty's Government beforehand the names of intending travellers by their vessels if males over the age of 21 years outward bound from Europe. This would give His Majesty's Government the opportunity of objecting to any particular passenger or of easily identifying and arresting him if he sailed and if the vessel conveying him came within their reach.

Foreign Office, August 12, 1919.

GENERAL

17

4. If such an arrangement were put into force, its detection might conceivably lead to the persons at whom it was aimed adopting in some cases assumed names for the purpose of escape. So long as it were not detected, its effect would probably be to prevent the transportation of persons likely to be arrested, for the object of the steamship company in making the enquiry is, no doubt, not so much to keep His Majesty's Government informed of their actions as to ensure that their vessels are not exposed in British ports to the risk of delay or interference at the hands of the British authorities, as they might be if they carried passengers likely to be apprehended. It would, further, possibly afford indications of the whereabouts and intentions of some of the persons who are wanted for trial.

5. If the Royal Holland Lloyd are willing to notify names in this way by arrangement with His Majesty's Government, it is probable that no difficulty would arise, but it is necessary, before making such a proposal, to consider how far such a policy could in this and other cases be maintained if objected to by neutral Governments, and Lord Curzon would therefore be glad to know your views both as to the expediency of the course suggested by Mr. Justice Peterson in this particular case and as to the steps, if any, which you would consider necessary and practicable under present international conditions with the view of impeding the emigration of persons required under article 228.

6. Lord Curzon would be glad to receive your observations on the matter at an early date, as the company's agents are pressing for an answer to their enquiry.

I have, &c.
GERALD SPICER.

Report.

I think that Mr. Justice Peterson's suggestion should be adopted, but, if the shipping company is unwilling to notify names in the way suggested, there is no means of compelling it to do so, and I do not know of any practicable steps that can be taken to impede the emigration of the persons in question until the German Government has been notified of the persons required. When that notification is made, an obligation will lie on the German Government itself to prevent the emigration.

GORDON HEWART.

Law Officers' Department,
August 15, 1919.

[3996]

D

1919

18

GENERAL

[106393]

No. 6.

[File 1876/1919].

[August 19, 1919.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 8, 1919.

Restricted
Immigration of Aliens into the United Kingdom.
Question of compatibility with provisions of commercial
treaties between Great Britain and other countries of measures on lines of Article 22
(b) of the Aliens Restriction
Order.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to request that you will favour him with your opinion on the question explained below concerning the compatibility with the provisions of the commercial treaties between Great Britain and other countries of measures to restrict the immigration of alien workers into the United Kingdom on the lines of article 22 (b) of the Aliens Restriction Order.

2. The article in question reads: "A person shall not take steps to obtain the services for work other than munitions work in the United Kingdom of aliens or any alien not in the United Kingdom, except with the permission in writing of the Minister of Labour, and subject to such special or general conditions as the Minister of Labour may impose." The article came into force in October 1916, and was originally adopted, Lord Curzon understands, to meet the agitation against aliens taking situations which British subjects had had to give up on joining His Majesty's Forces.

Apart from cases where there are objections on personal grounds to the respective employer or employee, the main principles followed in applying the order are: (1) That no alien shall, as a general rule, be allowed to enter the country for the performance of any class of services for which unemployed British labour is available; and (2) that employers shall not evade the payment of British rates of wages by securing alien employees willing to work for lower remuneration.

3. The number of persons affected by the article during the war has been comparatively small; up to April 1919, 4,373 persons had been allowed to enter the country under it, and approximately 1,190 had been refused admission. It is clear, however, that under peace conditions the problem will increase greatly in magnitude. Since the armistice the number of applications for permits has steadily risen and at present amounts to some 300 a week or 15,000 a year, of which rather more than two-thirds are being refused. It is the view of the Ministry of Labour that if it became known that the restriction imposed by the article had been removed there would be an even larger movement of alien labour towards this country than at present. There are now about 1,000,000 persons out of employment in the United Kingdom, and in view of the low wages which aliens will frequently accept, their competition would be a very serious factor in maintaining a large volume of unemployment among British workmen. For the next year or more, therefore, drastic restrictions would appear to be necessary to prevent the labour market from being flooded by aliens. The problem will, it is thought, become acute as soon as shipping facilities are available from countries able to supply cheap labour on a considerable scale, such as Poland.

4. The question of the maintenance or revocation of the article has accordingly been submitted to the Committee of Home Affairs of the War Cabinet, who, on the recommendation of the Aliens and Nationality Committee, decided on the 26th June that the article should, as a temporary measure, be maintained in force for a period of at least twelve months after the end of the war, but in a form so modified as to provide that an alien being desirous of entering the service of an employer in the United Kingdom should produce to the aliens officer at the port of arrival a permit in writing for his engagement issued by the Ministry of Labour to the employer.

5. In order to estimate the effect on the relations of this country with foreign States of the continuance of the policy in question after the restoration of peace, Lord Curzon feels that it is necessary to consider whether any foreign Governments may not have legitimate cause for protest on the ground that the provisions of their commercial treaties with the United Kingdom are infringed, and it is upon this point that his Lordship desires to be favoured with your advice.

6. For convenience of reference a copy is transmitted herewith of de Bernhardt's "Handbook of Commercial Treaties," and a summary of the relevant provisions of these instruments is also appended.

7. One group of the treaties, e.g., those with Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria, may, as is apparent, be excluded on the ground that they were determined by the outbreak of war, and it seems to Lord Curzon that His Majesty's Government might perhaps successfully resist complaints based upon certain others on the ground that the governing purpose of the treaties was specifically to secure to the other contracting parties the right to carry on trade in the United Kingdom, and that provisions, even though expressed in somewhat general terms, with reference to travel, residence, &c., must be read as having reference only to commercial travellers and traders. This contention is, however, by no means free from difficulty even in the case of treaties where it is fairly clear that the governing consideration is trade, for it may be urged with considerable force that labour is a saleable commodity, and that it is therefore a breach of the treaty to prevent a national of the other contracting party from selling his labour as freely as British subjects. The treaty with Bolivia is an example of a treaty of this kind.

GENERAL

19

8. The treaty with Switzerland of the 6th September, 1855, seems to Lord Curzon to present the most serious obstacle to the proposed policy. It appears to his Lordship difficult to read article 1 of that treaty in any way which would make what is now contemplated to be done consistent with the terms of the treaty. The meaning of that article would seem to be that Swiss citizens are to be allowed to come to the United Kingdom to reside and to exercise any profession or business. It seems difficult to narrow its meaning so as to exclude a labourer working for hire.

9. I am therefore to request that you will be good enough to take the matter into your consideration and will favour Lord Curzon with your opinion whether the measure contemplated could be reconciled with the obligations of His Majesty's Government to foreign Governments under the provisions of the commercial treaties now in force. His Lordship would be glad to receive also any general observations which you may be so good as to offer on the main subject.

I have, &c.

GERALD S. SPICER.

List of Papers.

"Handbook of Commercial Treaties,"
Summary of relevant Treaty provisions.

Report.

This question seems to us a difficult one. We do not think that a prohibition for employers in the United Kingdom to employ aliens, except under permit, constitutes a breach of any of the treaties. But if the prohibition takes the form of preventing an alien from landing and residing here without a permit, it is extremely difficult to contend that it is not a breach of such treaties as those with Switzerland and Bolivia. We think that these treaties require that subjects of the countries concerned should be permitted to land and reside here, and carry on their business, but not that they should be guaranteed the same opportunity of employment as British subjects.

We think that it would be better to extend the article in its original form, and then to apply section 1, sub-section 3 (a), of "The Aliens Act, 1905" (5 Ed. VII, cap. 13), and exclude as undesirable any alien whose only means of decently supporting himself and his dependants is the possibility of obtaining employment, unless his employment has been sanctioned by the permission in writing of the Minister of Labour. It would then be necessary for any foreign Government desiring to protest, to contend that the provisions of the Aliens Act of 1905 are a breach of treaty, a position it would be much more difficult to maintain.

GORDON HEWART,
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

*Law Officers' Department,
August 19, 1919.*

[140757]

No. 6^A.[Inland Revenue Department.]

[File 62641/1919]

[September 19, 1919.]

*Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.*Position of foreign sovereign Powers in relation to British
income tax.

COUNSEL is requested to advise generally as to the position of foreign sovereign Powers in relation to British income tax, regard being had to the following considerations:—

1. Taxation by way of direct assessment, under Schedules (A), (B), and (D).
2. Taxation by way of deduction, under Schedules (A), (C), and (D).
3. The private property of—
 - (a.) A foreign Sovereign;
 - (b.) The President of a foreign Republic or State, as distinct from his public property.
4. The property of the Government of a foreign sovereign Power. [This property is probably the same as the public property of the respective Sovereign or of the head of the respective State.]
5. Whether colonial Dominions and Commonwealths are to be treated as sovereign Powers, and, if so, whether as a distinct sovereignty or really as the British Crown.
6. If there is exemption from all income tax, then as to repayment of the tax for all years since it was first suffered by a sovereign Power.

THE SIAMESE GOVERNMENT: INCOME TAX.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. T. H. Parr and Mr. R. P. Hills.

1-4. In our opinion the Siamese Government is not liable to pay income tax in respect of the interest earned on the money deposited by it with banks in London. Assuming, as we must, that this money is the public property of the Siamese State, we consider that it is protected from taxation under the Income Tax Acts by the general principle of international law, which treats Sovereigns and the public property belonging to them as not being subject to the municipal laws of foreign States. This principle of international law is, in our opinion, recognised and adopted as municipal law by the Courts of this country:—

Halsbury's "Laws of England," vol. vi, p. 430, and note (f).
 Dana's "Wheaton's International Law," section 242.
 Oppenheim's "International Law," vol. i, p. 467.
 Moore's "International Law Digest," vol. ii, p. 591.
 Le Parlement belge, L.R., 5 P.D. 197.
 Parkinson v. Patter, 16 Q.B.D. 152.
 De Haber v. Queen of Portugal, 20 L.J. Q.B.D., at p. 496.
 Attorney-General v. Kent, 31 L.J. (N.S.), Ex. 391 (and see per Martin, B., on p. 396).
 Twycross v. Dreyfus, L.R., 5 Ch. Div. 605.
 Vavasseur v. Krupp, L.R., 5 Ch. Div. 351.
 Franco-belge 1898, 1 Ch. 190.
 South African Republic v. Compagnie.

We have considered the effect of rule 7 to Schedule (A), No. IV, in section 60 of "The Income Tax Act, 1842," and of rule 5 of Schedule (C) in section 88 of the same Act.

Both these rules apply in terms only to accredited Ministers of foreign States and not to foreign Sovereigns themselves.

The first of these provisions does not appear to be inconsistent with our view, and as regards the second, we do not think that the rule of construction contained in the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius avails to override stronger considerations based upon general principles and upon the whole tenour of the Income Tax Acts. We think that, if the Legislature had intended to compel foreign States to pay income tax in such cases, contrary to the principles of international law, it would have inserted clear words expressly enforcing the liability, and that in the absence of such words the liability does not exist. Moreover, international comity, which is in this respect the basis of international law, overrides the municipal enactments of the Income Tax Acts.

We think that the principle applies without distinction to the public property of any sovereign State, whether it be monarchical or republican, and that upon the present state of the authorities it should also be recognised as applying to the private property of a foreign monarch. Whether it should be rigidly applied to the private property of a temporary head of a State, such as a President elected for a term of years, with possibly a limited position as representative of his State, may be more doubtful, and this question can be reserved until a concrete case arises for decision, although the inclination of our opinion is that the private property of a President of a Republic is not to be regarded as governed by the same principles as those stated above.

We think, in any case, that it is undesirable to decide any other question than the liability to income tax of the particular property in question. It is obvious that so broad a principle of international law as that cited above may, in its application to the diverse and complicated conditions of modern property and of the taxation of that property, in the complex conditions of the modern State system, be subject to modification and qualification. The decided cases have been few, and the writers on international law state the principle in varying terms and with different limitations; such matters, for instance, as customs and tolls being sometimes treated as lying outside the rule. The operation of the principle concerns other departments of the State besides the Board of Inland Revenue, and we therefore confine our consideration of it to the particular matter of income tax.

The machinery of deduction at the source which is in force under the Income Tax Acts need, we think, cause no embarrassment in the application of the immunity so recognised. A company which has paid income tax on its profits will continue to recoup itself by deducting a proportionate share from each dividend which it pays, and any foreign Sovereign who receives dividends so diminished will apply to the revenue authorities for repayment. Again, if a bank is bound by the Income Tax Acts to deduct tax from interest and to account for the tax to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, a similar application for repayment would be made. Some special procedure should, we suggest, be devised for making such applications and receiving repayment so as to render it unnecessary for a foreign State to deal with the usual assessment authorities in such matters.

5. In our opinion the Colonial Dominions and Commonwealth are to be treated not as distinct sovereignties, but as the British Crown.

6. No time limit, such as the three years fixed by 23 & 24 Vict., cap. 14, sec. 10, applies. Any time limit must be arranged by diplomatic action.

GORDON HEWART.
 ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
 T. G. PARR.
 REGINALD HILLS.

*Law Officers' Department,
 September 19, 1919.*

1919

22

GENERAL.

[148642]

No. 7.

[File 104007/1919.]

[November 4, 1919.]

Foreign Office to the Attorney-General.

Sir,

Foreign Office, September 20, 1919.

Communication to
His Majesty's
Consul-
General,
Rotterdam, of list of German Naval Personalities to be surrendered under Treaty
of Peace.
Notification
by foreign shipping companies of names of German adult male passengers outward bound from Europe.

I AM directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to inform you that on the receipt of your report* dated the 15th ultimo steps were taken to inform the Royal Holland Lloyd Steamship Company, in reply to their enquiry as to the attitude of His Majesty's Government towards the transportation in their vessels of passengers of German nationality, that no objection was seen to such transportation provided that the names of intending passengers of enemy nationality, if males over the age of 21 outward bound from Europe, were submitted to His Majesty's Government beforehand.

The Director of Naval Intelligence has now proposed, in a letter of which a copy is forwarded herewith, that in this connection His Majesty's Consul-General at Rotterdam should be furnished with a list of the German naval personalities whose surrender will be required under article 228 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany. The list of such personalities forwarded by Commodore Sinclair in this letter is without doubt already known to you.

I am to request that you will be good enough to favour Lord Curzon with your views on the matter generally, and in particular on the questions (1) whether the communication of the list to His Majesty's Consul-General at Rotterdam is advisable, and (2) whether a notification to foreign shipping companies generally, requesting the submission of names of German male passengers over 21 years of age outward bound from Europe, or other similar action, would serve any useful purpose in view of the impending ratification of the Treaty of Peace with Germany.

I have, &c.

VICTOR WELLESLEY.

Report.

1. We can see no objection to the communication of the list when it is ready for disclosure to His Majesty's Consul-General at Rotterdam as proposed by the Director of Naval Intelligence. At present, however, the list has not been revised by us, and is of the most secret nature. We have taken careful steps in Paris to avoid the leakage of the names, or even categories, of the persons wanted, so as to prevent the escape by land or sea of persons who might be able to identify themselves as included in the lists.

2. We think that a notification to foreign companies generally, requesting the submission of the names of German male passengers over 21 years of age outward bound from Europe, might serve a useful purpose. We cannot see any harm in issuing such a notification for what it may be worth.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
November 4, 1919.

* See No. 5.

(23)

TURKEY.

[129560]

No. 8.

[File 1270/1919.]

[August 7, 1919.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen.

Foreign Office, July 10, 1919.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to request you to be so good as to favour him, with the least possible delay, with your opinion on the following matter:—

Trial and punishment of Turkish offenders.

After the conclusion of the armistice with Turkey on the 31st October, reports were continually received by the War Office of delays and obstructions put in the way of the fulfilment of its clauses by various individuals in the service of the Turkish Government.

In addition to these breaches of the armistice, it was represented that Turkish troops were pillaging stations and towns in areas outside Turkish territory to which the terms of clause 24 of the armistice with Turkey were not applicable. It was suggested to His Majesty's High Commissioner at Constantinople that disciplinary action in these cases should be taken by the Turkish Government against the individuals concerned, and in one particularly flagrant case where the retreating Turks were reported to have committed excesses against the population he was instructed to insist upon the Turkish Government issuing orders that the three officers responsible should be handed over to the commander of the British forces at Batoum for trial by British court-martial. It was also suggested that a formal demand should be made to the Turkish Government for the surrender to the British military authorities of persons against whom specific charges were brought of cruelty or criminal neglect to British prisoners of war.

In reply to these suggestions Admiral Calthorpe pointed out that the alleged offences were committed by individuals over whom the existing Turkish Government were unable to exercise efficient control. He expressed the opinion that in order to deal with the situation it would not be enough for him to press the Turkish Government to issue orders to these individuals, and suggested that he should be authorised to demand the immediate arrest and delivery to the Allied military authorities of all persons against whom there appeared to be a prima facie good case. It should be explained that in view of the apparent powerlessness of the Turkish Government to prevent the repetition of disorders, even in Turkish territory, no analogy could be drawn between the procedure to be followed in dealing with the Turkish Government and that adopted in dealing with the German Government. It was considered necessary to take such immediate steps as would result in dissuading Turkish officials from persisting in their course of action, and it was anticipated that if the Turkish Government were to concentrate their efforts rather on the apprehension for delivery to the British military authorities of certain individuals than on any attempt to enforce their wishes in an area which was not under their effective control, more satisfactory results were likely to be obtained.

Admiral Calthorpe was accordingly instructed to demand from the Turkish Government that they should immediately hand over either to himself or to the nearest Allied commander such Turkish officers or officials as he or the commander concerned considered should be surrendered for the following reasons:—

1. Failure to comply with armistice terms.
2. Impeding execution of armistice terms.
3. Insolence to British commanders and officers.
4. Ill-treatment of prisoners.
5. Outrages to Armenians or other subject races both in Turkey and Transcaucasia.
6. Participation in looting, destruction of property, &c.
7. Any other breaches of the laws and customs of war.

At the same time Military Courts were formed in Transcaucasia, Mesopotamia, and Syria for the trial of those Turks who had committed offences in occupied territory and in Transcaucasia.

[3996]

E 2

constitute breaches of any regulations in force in such territory. As a matter of policy, we think that all other offences should be reserved for disposal under the provisions of the Peace Treaty.

3. In our opinion, the surrender of these persons to the Allies for treatment by Allied Military Tribunals should be provided for in the Treaty of Peace.

4. Does not arise

5. There is no legal objection to the detention of these offenders. Such detention is an act of State, the propriety of which cannot be questioned in any court of law.

6. Yes, we think that the course proposed is both practicable and desirable.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
August 7, 1919.

[172545]

No. 9.

(File 3006/1919.)

[December 23, 1919.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

entlemen,

Foreign Office, December 10, 1919

Administration of Justice at Constantinople.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to request you to be so good as to favour him at your early convenience, in view of the urgency of the matter, with your opinion on the following question :—

In the Armistice terms with Turkey of the 30th October, 1918, there was no express provision entitling the Allies to occupy Constantinople and the adjacent region. Clause 7 of the terms is as follows :—

"The Allies to have the right to occupy any strategic points in the event of a situation arising which threatens the security of the Allies."

Admiral Calthorpe, who conducted the negotiations, in transmitting home the terms of the Armistice, made the following observations on clause 7 :—

"It will be observed that there is nothing in this clause, or elsewhere in the Armistice, which permits Constantinople to be occupied unless the security of the Allies is threatened."

"The Turkish Delegates endeavoured to obtain an exemption for Constantinople even in the above circumstances and were most obstinate on the point but finally gave way."

Since the date of this communication there has been no modification of the status of Constantinople, and the British High Commissioner, in a despatch dated the 6th September last, remarked that the contention always put forward by him to the effect that Constantinople was not in the occupation of the Allied troops still held good, and that were it not to do so, the good faith of the Allies would be liable to be impugned by the Turks. In fact, however, British forces under the command of General Milne have been in Constantinople since the time of the Armistice. This force with the French and Italian contingents is under the supreme command of the French General Franchet d'Esperey, the Commander-in-chief of the Allied Armies of the Orient. The offices of the British High Commission were established at the former British Embassy at Constantinople shortly after the Armistice.

The position being as above stated, a serious problem has arisen with regard to the administration of justice in Constantinople and the other regions within the sphere of the High Commissioner. Shortly before the declaration of war between Turkey and Great Britain, the Capitulations were declared by the Turks to be abrogated. The legality of this action by the Turks has never been admitted by His Majesty's Government, but the effect of this declaration and the subsequent war has been that the consular courts which administered civil and criminal justice between foreigners in Constantinople have ceased to function. Recently the former judge of the consular court held a court for the transaction of urgent business, but the period of the sitting of the court was not prolonged and Lord Curzon is advised that the legality of the learned judge's action cannot be upheld. His decisions, so far as they affect British subjects, must be validated by subsequent legislation or by a clause to be inserted in the Turkish Treaty. For over a year, however, there has been no appropriate jurisdiction over British subjects in civilian or criminal matters, either in respect of their relations between themselves, with other foreigners or with Ottomans. The Ottoman courts are understood to be functioning, but as it was thought to be undesirable in time of peace for British subjects to resort thereto, it is considered impossible to admit the jurisdiction of the Ottoman courts over British subjects at the present time when the Turks are still actually enemies. On the other hand, the need for a tribunal of undoubted jurisdiction is becoming more and more urgent every day. To meet the situation it was recommended to the High Commissioner on the 2nd April last that civil offenders who were British subjects should be dealt with by martial law, but Lord Curzon has been advised that unless Constantinople has actually been placed under the authority of the Allied Armies and can therefore be considered to be in actual military occupation, it is questionable whether the rule of martial law carried out by means of court-martial is valid in accordance with international doctrine. In this connection I am to draw your attention to articles 42 and 43 of The Hague Regulations, which are as follows :—

Article 42 says that "Territory is considered to be occupied when it is actually placed under the authority of the hostile army. The occupation applies only to the territories where such authority is established and can be exercised."

Article 43 provides that "The authority of the legitimate Power having actually passed into the hands of the occupant, the latter shall take all steps in his power to re-establish and ensure as far as possible public order and safety, while respecting, unless absolutely prevented, the laws in force in the country."

To alleviate the situation it was proposed earlier in this year to establish an inter-Allied tribunal in Constantinople as a temporary expedient. The Legal Advisers to the Peace Conference at Paris, who were consulted, were in favour of such a course. It was pointed out, however, by Mr. Balfour in his despatch of the 8th August last, that as a condition precedent to the establishment of such a tribunal, the High Commissioner must be satisfied, inter alia, that the Turkish Government consented to the creation of such a tribunal, and to its exercising jurisdiction over Ottoman subjects, to the extent proposed, i.e., in respect of all civil and commercial disputes between Allied subjects and Ottomans. At this time it was also proposed to revive the jurisdiction of the Consular judges up to the limits of their former powers in order that they might deal with crimes committed by British subjects against other British subjects or against Ottoman subjects or against foreign subjects of another Power, or vice versa. The Turks have not agreed to this proposal.

To sum up the situation, a quotation from a telegram from the High Commissioner of the 10th November last illustrates the position :—

"The situation is quite unparalleled. Ottoman Courts judge Ottoman subjects, and Allied troops are subject to Allied courts-martial. Beyond this no courts of law exist at the moment of writing. The Turkish Government are reluctant to adopt proposed temporary international tribunal, and even this would be a quite inadequate palliative. Criminal charges are dealt with in a rough and ready way by the Inter-Allied Police, but with no real legal sanction; offenders are often arrested and then released after a few days, as there is no prison accommodation and no tribunal which can deal with, say, a case of fraud. There are measures which it is most desirable to enforce in the public interest, such as the prevention of profiteering, or the speculation in roubles and shipping, passport or customs regulations. Whilst we can, more or less impose our decisions on the Porte, we have no legal authority over foreigners. This absence of law courts, tolerable as it was for a time, presents every day greater disadvantages."

Lord Curzon, therefore, would be glad if you would take these matters into consideration and favour him with your opinion on the following questions :—

1. Whether the circumstances in which the Allied forces are at Constantinople are, in view of the difficulty of contending that there is an actual military occupation, such as to justify a general system of martial law.

2. If the answer to (1) is in the affirmative, is it then possible to set up tribunals with a general jurisdiction over all cases criminal and civil irrespective of the nationality of the parties concerned?

TURKEY.

3. If the answer to (1) is in the negative, what steps can be taken by the High Commissioner to provide—

- (a.) For the safety and security of members of the Allied forces;
- (b.) For the trial and punishment of criminal offences committed (1) by British civilians; (2) by Ottoman subjects against British civilians; (3) by foreigners other than Ottoman subjects against British civilians;
- (c.) For the trial of civil litigation between (1) British subjects; (2) British subjects and Ottoman subjects; (3) British subjects and foreigners other than Ottoman subjects;
- (d.) Generally on the situation.

I have, &c.

H. MONTGOMERY.

List of Papers.

- (A.)—Armistice terms signed with Turkey.
- (B.)—Admiralty to Foreign Office, November 11, 1918.
- (C.)—Admiral Webb (Constantinople) to Foreign Office, April 2, 1919. (Telegraphic.)
- (D.)—Foreign Office to Admiral Calthorpe (Constantinople), April 12, 1919. (Telegraphic.)
- (E.)—Admiral Calthorpe (Constantinople) to Foreign Office, July 23, 1919. (Telegraphic.)
- (F.)—British Delegation, Paris, to Foreign Office, No. 1552, August 8, 1919.
- (G.)—Admiral Webb (Constantinople) to Foreign Office, September 6, 1919.
- (H.)—Admiral de Robeck (Constantinople) to Foreign Office, November 10, 1919. (Telegraphic.)

Report.

1. In our opinion this question must clearly be answered in the negative. A general system of martial law can only be established by an army in actual military occupation, and it is clear that the Allies are not in actual military occupation of Constantinople.

2. Does not arise.

3. The only course we can suggest is that pressure should be put on the Turkish Government to compel them to agree to the establishment of an inter-Allied tribunal to exercise jurisdiction in the various classes of cases mentioned. Such a tribunal would derive its jurisdiction from the Turkish Government and could be given jurisdiction over foreigners other than Ottoman subjects, as well as over British and Ottoman subjects. The Turkish Government might be coerced by a threat that if they did not consent to the establishment of the tribunal the Allies would occupy Constantinople, on the ground that the security of the Allies is threatened by the failure of the Turkish Government to maintain order and protect the persons and property of Allied subjects.

We have, &c.

GORDON HEWART.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
December 23, 1919.

P.S.—The additional papers received by us on the 31st ultimo do not appear to affect the opinion already given. They emphasise the necessity for the establishment of an inter-Allied tribunal. The telegram (No. 2145) from Admiral de Robeck is not quite easy to follow. It shows the urgency of the matter, but does not indicate what the step is which it is desired to take, though it appears to be some form of pressure to be applied to induce the Turkish Government to consent to the establishment of the tribunal.

GORDON HEWART.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
January 20, 1920.

1920

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(11810)

LAST COPY.

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1920.

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked I^A, &c.

PRIZE LAW.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
I^A	Law Officers, Mr. Raeburn, Mr. Bowstead and Dr. Pearce Higgins [Procurator-General]	Feb. 9, 1920	Detained enemy ships: applicability of sixth Hague Convention	1
I^B	Law Officers .. [Ministry of Shipping]	Mar. 31,	Ships sold by Germans to the Dutch during the war	10
I^C	Law Officers and Dr. Pearce Higgins [Procurator-General]	July 8,	Claim of French Government to share in prizes captured at Duala and Bonaberi, and in Cameroon River	16
I^D	Law Officers and Dr. Pearce Higgins [Procurator-General]	Dec. 31,	Detained Austrian ships: applicability of sixth Hague Convention	26

VARIOUS.

(Arranged according to Countries.)

AUSTRIA.

I^E	Law Officers and Mr. Austen-Cartmell	July 8, 1920	Austrian Treaty of Peace: rate of exchange for payment of debts	31
----------------------	--------------------------------------	--------------	---	----

CHINA.

1	Law Officers ..	Jan. 31, 1920	China (Kashgar) Order in Council, 1920 ..	32
2	Law Officers ..	June 3,	China Order in Council, 1920, and China (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1920 ..	33
3	Law Officers ..	July 14,	China (Amendment) Order in Council, 1920 ..	34
4	Law Officers ..	Oct. 13,	China (Amendment No. 2) Order in Council, 1920 ..	35

EGYPT.

5	Law Officers ..	May 5, 1920	Case of Cimitian v. Gout and Geary : demand for renewal of registration of British subjects ..	36
---	-----------------	-------------	---	----

(iii)

GENERAL.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
5 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Jan. 23, 1920	Mandates: questions connected with such of former German colonies as will be administered by the Self-Governing Dominions	38
5 ^B	Law Officers .. [Admiralty]	Feb. 21,	Control of Arms Convention, September 10, 1919 ..	41
5 ^C	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	July 13,	Acts of Canadian Parliament: suggested extra-territorial operation	42
5 ^D	Lord Chancellor and Law Officers [Cabinet Office]	Oct. 14,	Proposed Permanent Court of International Justice	45
6	Law Officers ..	Oct. 23,	Use of economic weapon of League of Nations (article 16 of the Covenant)	51
6 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Nov. 10,	Proposed amendment of British North America Act: powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canadian Parliament	53
7	Law Officers ..	Dec. 22,	Suspension, &c., of telegraph or radio-telegraph services throughout the British Empire; draft notifications	54
7 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Dec. 24,	Proposed amendment of British North America Act: control of Canadian aircraft outside the Dominion	56

GERMANY.

7 ^B	Law Officers, Mr. Austen-Cartmell and Mr. Branson [Board of Trade]	Feb. 24, 1920	Restitution in specie of British property in Germany under article 297 of Treaty of Peace	57
7 ^C	Law Officers and Mr. Austen-Cartmell [Clearing Office, Enemy Debts]	May 18,	British companies with branches in foreign countries: position under Treaty of Peace with Germany and Treaty of Peace Order, 1919 ..	59
7 ^D	Law Officers and Mr. Branson [Board of Trade]	Dec. 14,	Restitution in specie of British property in Germany under article 297 of Treaty of Peace	62
8	Law Officers ..	Dec. 24,	Private property of ex-Emperor William: position in regard to article 248 of the Treaty of Versailles	63

RUSSIA.

8 ^A	Law Officers .. [Russian Trade Committee]	June 4, 1920	Attachment of Russian gold or goods sent to United Kingdom	65
9	Attorney-General ..	Nov. 26,	Status and privileges of M. L. B. Krassin, Russian delegate in United Kingdom	66

(iv)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1920.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

AIR—DEN.

A.

Aircraft: Canadian; control outside Canada, 42-45, 56, 57.
Annexation: of Cyprus; claim to be British subject by virtue of, 36-38.
"Argo," 28.
"Ariel," 13, 14.
Arms Traffic: Convention of September 10, 1919; legislation for enforcement, 41, 42.

B.

"Baltica," 12-14.
"Benedict," 12.
Bonaberi: claim of French Government to share in prizes captured at, 16-26.
"Braunschweig," 10-15.
British North America. See Canada.

C.

Cameroon River: claim of French Government to share in prizes captured in, 16-26.
Canada: powers of extra-territorial legislation for Parliament, 42-45, 53, 56, 57.
" " Amendment of British North America Act, 42-45, 53, 56, 57.
" " control of Canadian aircraft outside Canada, 42-45, 56, 57.
Captures. See Prizes.
Censorship. See Telegraphs. Wireless Telegraphs.
"Chile," 1.
China: Order in Council, 33.
" " Amendment Order in Council, 34.
" " Amendment (No. 2) Order in Council, 35.
" " Consular and Marriage Fees Order in Council, 33.
" " Kashgar Order in Council, 32, 33.
"Christine," 13.
Cimitian, J.: lawsuit claiming renewal of registration as British subject, 36-38.
Colonies: German; Mandates. See Mandates.
Companies, British: with foreign branches; position under Treaty of Versailles and Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, 59-61.
Court of International Justice: establishment 45-51.
Cyprus, annexation of: claim to be British subject by virtue of, 36-38.

D.

"Dankebaar African," 12.
Debts: under Treaty of Peace with Austria; rate of exchange, 31, 32.
" " attachment of Russian gold or goods sent to United Kingdom, 65, 66.
"Denderah," 10-15.

DIP—JEM.

Diplomatic Privileges. See Privileges.
Dominions, British; power for execution of mandates for former German colonies, 38-41.
" " : proposed powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canada, 42-45, 53, 56, 57.
"Dordrecht," The, 25.
Duala: claim of French Government to share in prizes captured at, 16-26.

E.

"Edna," 13.
"Edward and Mary," The, 25.
"Eendijk," See "Braunschweig."
"Empress," 25.
"Endraught," 12.
Enemy vessels. See Vessels.
"Ernst Merck," 13.
"Erzherzog Franz Ferdinand," 27.
Exchange, rate of. See Debts.
Extra-territoriality: proposed powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canada, 42-45, 53, 56, 57.

F.

Fees, Consular and Marriage. See China.
"Fenix," 28.
"Ferd Laeisz," 21.
"Forsigheid," The, 25.
France: claim to share in prizes captured at Duala and Bonaberi and in Cameroon River, 16-26.

G.

Geary, Consul A. B.: lawsuit brought by J. Cimitian, 36-38.
"General Hamilton," 12.
Germany: vessels sold by Germans to Dutch during the War, 10-15.
" " private property of ex-Emperor William; position under Treaty of Peace, 63-64.
Gout, E. E. D.: lawsuit brought by J. Cimitian, 36-38.
"Grotius," The, 25.
"Guillaume Tell," 25.

H.

Hague Convention VI: applicability to detained enemy ships, 1-10, 26-31.
"Hercules," The, 25.

I.

"Island of Trinidad," 24.

J.

"Jan Frederick," 12.
"Jemmy," 12.

JOH—PRO.

"Johann Heinrich Burchard," 10-15.
"Juffrons Anna," 12.
Justice, Court of. See Court.

K.

"Karpas," 27.
Kashgar Order in Council, 32, 33.
"Koerber," 27.
Krassin, L. B., 66-68.

L.

League of Nations: use of economic weapon (article 16 of Covenant), 51, 52.
" " Mandates for former German colonies: power to enable Dominions to execute, 38-41.
"L'Étoile," 25.
"Limburgia," See "Johann Heinrich Burchard."
Lindo v. Rodney, 28-30.
"Lokken," 25.

M.

Mandates: for former German colonies; power to enable Dominions to execute, 38-41.
"Marianna Flora," 15.
"Marie Leonhardt," 28-30.
"Masatba," 13.
"Minerva," 12.
"Moedijk," See "Denderah."

N.

"Nassau," 10-15.
Nationality, British: claimed in virtue of annexation of Cyprus, 36-38.
" " lawsuit against Consul to compel registration as British subject, 36-38.
Netherlands: vessels sold to Dutch by Germans during the War, 10-15.
"Noydt Gedacht," 12.

O.

"Odessa," 28.
Orders in Council. See China.

P.

"Pellworm," 25.
"Perla," 27.
"Polnay," 30.
Privileges: of Russian Soviet Government Delegate in United Kingdom, 66-68.
Prizes: captured at Duala and Bonaberi and in Cameroon River; claim of French Government to share, 16-26.
Property: British in Germany; restitution in specie under Treaty of Peace, 57-59, 62, 63.
" " private, of ex-Emperor William; position under Treaty of Peace, 63, 64.

REG—ZAM.

R.

Registration: as British subjects; right to demand renewal, 36-38.
" " case of Cimitian v. Gout and Geary, 36-38.
"Resolution," The, 25.
Russia: attachment of gold or goods sent to United Kingdom, 65, 66.
" " status and privileges of Soviet Government Delegate in United Kingdom, 66-68.

S.

"Sabbia," 27, 29, 30.
"Sechs Geschwistern," 12.
"Soglasie," 13.

T.

Telegraphs: suspension, &c., of services throughout British Empire; draft notifications, 54-55.
"Tergeste," 27, 29, 30.
Treaty of Peace (Austria): rate of exchange for payment of debts, 31, 32.
" " (Germany): restitution in specie of British property in Germany under, 57-59, 62, 63.
" " " position of British Companies with foreign branches, 59-61.
" " " position of private property of ex-Emperor William, 63, 64.

V.

Vessels: enemy, detained in British ports; applicability of Hague Convention VI, 1-10, 26-31.
" " sold by Germans to the Dutch during the War, 10-15.
" " enemy; transfer to neutral flag or ownership during the War, 10-15.
" " captured at Duala and Bonaberi and in Cameroon River; French claim to share in, 16-26.
"Vigilantia," 12.
"Vrouw Margeretha," 12.

W.

"W. Leaat," 12.
"William Oswald," 10-15.
Wireless Telegraphy: suspension, &c., of services throughout the Empire; draft notifications, 54-56.

Z.

"Zamora," 8.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1920.

PRIZE LAW.

[T 1335]

No. 1^A.

[Procurator-General]

[File 115/1920]

[February 9, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.

HEREWITH are sent:—

1. Copy "Chile" Order.
2. Correspondence between the Foreign Office and the United States Embassy in 1914 with regard to the applicability of the Sixth Hague Convention.
3. Copy correspondence with the Foreign Office with regard to the disposal of detained enemy ships.
4. Agreement with United States, May 1919.
5. Memorandum by Dr. Pearce Higgins.

Detained
Enemy
Ships:
Applicability of
Sixth Hague
Convention.

With the conclusion of peace with Germany by the deposit of the ratifications of the Treaty of Peace, the question of the ultimate disposal of enemy ships detained in British ports becomes one of great importance.

Enemy ships have been detained under the form of order known as the "Chile" Order not only in the United Kingdom but in British ports throughout the Empire, and in the aggregate they represent a very large amount of tonnage and are of great value.

The immediate question for decision is whether, in the events which have happened, the Sixth Hague Convention is applicable. If it is applicable, the question arises whether the ships fall to be dealt with under the provisions of the Treaty of Peace. If, on the other hand, it does not apply, it is necessary to consider whether application can successfully and should be made to the Prize Court for a decree of condemnation.

It may be observed that these questions arise mainly in connection with German ships, as Austrian vessels were given days of grace and for the most part either departed or were dealt with under a private arrangement with the owners. There are a few Austrian ships which were prevented by force majeure from leaving and were detained under the common form of order. Turkey had not ratified the Convention, and Turkish ships are not, therefore, affected by it. No Bulgarian ships were detained. Germany is the country principally concerned in this question.

The Sixth Hague Convention provides as follows:—

Article 1.—"When a merchant ship of one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely either immediately, or after a sufficient term of grace, and to proceed direct after being furnished with a passport to its port of destination or such other port as shall be named for it."

"The same applies in the case of a ship which left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and enters an enemy port in ignorance of the hostilities."

Article 2.—"A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances of force majeure, may have been unable to leave the enemy port during the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which may not have been allowed to leave, may not be confiscated. The belligerent may only retain it under an obligation of restoring it after the war without indemnity, or he may requisition it on condition of paying an indemnity."

Article 3.—"Enemy merchant ships which left their last port of departure before the commencement of the war and are met at sea while ignorant of the hostilities cannot be confiscated . . ." (Provision as to restoration as in Article 2.)

Article 4.—"Enemy cargo on board the vessels referred to in Articles 1 and 2 is likewise liable to be detained and restored after the war, without indemnity, with the ship or separately."

"The same applies in the case of cargo on board the vessels referred to in Article 3."

Article 5.—"The present Convention does not affect merchant ships whose construction indicates that they are intended to be converted into ships of war."

Article 6.—"The provisions of the present Convention are only applicable between the Contracting Powers, and only if all the belligerents are parties to the Convention."

The following table shows the position with regard to signature and ratification of the Convention by the several belligerent Powers:—

1. Belligerents who were in a state of war on the 4th August, 1914:—

Signed and Ratified.—France, Great Britain, Austria, Belgium.

Signed and Ratified, subject to Reservations of Articles 3 and 4 (Paragraph 2, Ships met at Sea).—Germany and Russia.

Signed, but not Ratified.—Montenegro and Serbia.

2. Belligerents who subsequently entered the war:—

Signed and Ratified.—Brazil, Japan, Cuba, Guatemala, Hayti, Liberia (adhered), Nicaragua (adhered), Roumania, Portugal, Panamá, Siam.

Signed, but not Ratified.—Italy, Greece, Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, Uruguay, Turkey.

Neither Signed nor Ratified.—United States of America, China, Honduras.

On the outbreak of war with Germany, Great Britain intimated that she would be prepared to give days of grace to German ships, provided an intimation were sent from Germany within a fixed period of time that she would accord reciprocal treatment to British ships in German ports. The necessary intimation was not received within the time specified, and days of grace were accordingly not given by either belligerent (see Proclamation of the 4th August, 1914, "Manual of Emergency Legislation," vol. i, p. 138).

Correspondence ensued between the Foreign Office and the United States Ambassador in London in consequence of the German Government having purported to accept the British offer after it had expired. A copy of this correspondence is sent herewith.

On the 14th August, 1914, Sir E. Grey informed the United States Ambassador that His Majesty's Government would abide by the provisions of Articles 2, 4 (first paragraph) and 5 of the Convention, relative to the status of the Sixth Convention, provided the German Government also abided by those provisions, but that, inasmuch as the German Government was not a party to Article 3 of the Convention, the provisions of that article and of the second paragraph of Article 4, to which also they were not a party, would not be applied.

On the 25th August, 1914, a memorandum was received from the German Government through the American Embassy in London, in which the German Government asked if the British Government would hand back German ships and their cargoes at the end of the war or in case of requisition would give compensation, stating that Germany was ready to fulfil its treaty obligations, but, in view of the British Order in Council, must first require a similar promise from Great Britain.

To this memorandum Sir E. Grey replied on the 2nd September, 1914, in a note addressed to the United States Ambassador, which contained the following paragraphs:—

"In reply, I have the honour to inform your Excellency that, so far as enemy merchant ships and enemy cargoes are concerned, the procedure followed by His Majesty's Government is covered by the Sixth Hague Convention of 1907, which has been ratified by Great Britain. As regards German ships, I would refer your Excellency to my note of the 14th ultimo, in which the attitude adopted by His Majesty's Government was fully explained. . . .

"As stated in my note of the 14th ultimo, His Majesty's Government will grant to German ships the benefits of Articles 2, 4 (first paragraph) and 5 of the Convention, but not those accorded by Articles 3 and 4 (paragraph 2), to which Germany was not a party. The decisions of the Prize Court in such a case will proceed upon this basis."

The German Government presented a further memorandum, under date of the 2nd September, 1914, from Copenhagen, setting out its understanding of the arrangement, and Sir E. Grey acknowledged this memorandum on the 20th September, 1914, accepting generally the interpretation placed by the German Government on his previous notes.

It will be seen from this correspondence, of which a copy is attached, that, notwithstanding the fact that Article 1 of the Convention had not been applied and days of grace had not been given, the British Government expressed its intention at the beginning of the war of applying Articles 2 and 4 (first paragraph) and 5 of the Convention, provided Germany did the same, and the questions arise, first, whether, by reason of the events which have happened during the war, a new situation has been created which relieves the British Government from any obligation to give effect to the assurance then given to the German Government, and, secondly, whether the operation of the Convention or of any such undertaking by His Majesty's Government has been excluded by the Treaty of Peace.

It may perhaps be contended that the true meaning of the Foreign Office letters referred to above is that the British Government agreed to hold itself bound by Articles 2, 4 (paragraph 1) and 5 of the Sixth Hague Convention, so long as the Convention was, according to its own terms, applicable; for example, so long as all the belligerent Powers were parties to the Convention, or so long as Germany observed it; but when the Convention ceased to be applicable either by reason of Powers who had not ratified it joining in the war, or for some other reason, Great Britain ceased to be bound by it.

It may be urged against this reading of the correspondence that Sir E. Grey's letters were written after two, at least, of the non-ratifying Powers—Serbia and Montenegro—had entered the war,* and that he cannot, therefore, be supposed to have been making this reservation.

It must be conceded that there is force in this view, unless it can be said that Serbia and Montenegro were not maritime Powers, and that the application of the Sixth Convention was a matter on which their participation in the war should not be final. The intervention of Italy, Turkey and the United States, who were maritime Powers, was a more relevant circumstance, and might well be the determining factor.

This aspect of the question is not free from difficulty, and it is desirable to consider the other arguments upon which reliance can be placed in support of the view that the Convention is not legally binding on Great Britain.

The arguments can be summarised as follows:—

1. That all the belligerents were not parties to the Convention.
2. That Article 1, not having been applied, Article 2 did not come into force.
3. That Germany's flagrant breaches of The Hague Conventions, which it did not suit her to observe, relieves Great Britain of any obligation to observe the Sixth Convention.
4. That the effect of the Armistice was to override the Convention.
5. That the effect of the Treaty of Peace was also to override the Convention.

1. It will have been seen from the table given above that of the Powers involved in the war on the 4th August, 1914, when Great Britain declared war on Germany, four had signed and ratified the Convention; two had signed and ratified with reservations, and two had not ratified. Of the Powers subsequently entering the war, eleven had signed and ratified; seven had signed but not ratified, and three had neither signed nor ratified.

* Austria declared war on Serbia on July 28, 1914. Germany declared war on Serbia on August 6, 1914. Montenegro announced a state of war with Austria on August 7, 1914, and declared war on Germany on August 9, 1914.

At the date of the Armistice, the position was that of the belligerents fifteen had signed and ratified; two had signed and ratified subject to reservations; nine had signed but not ratified, and three had neither signed nor ratified. In the aggregate, therefore, seventeen belligerents had ratified with or without reservations, and twelve had not ratified the Convention.

It may be argued in these circumstances that in accordance with Article 6, the provisions of the Convention were not applicable, as all the belligerents were not parties to the Convention. Such a contention would raise the further question of the effect of the subsequent intervention of Powers, who had not ratified the Convention, in a war in which all the Powers theretofore engaged had ratified it.

On the 4th August, 1914, when Great Britain joined in the war, the position was still undeveloped. Germany was at war with Russia, Belgium, France and England, all of whom had ratified, but not with Serbia and Montenegro, who had not ratified. Austria was at war with Serbia and Montenegro, but not with Russia, Belgium, France or Great Britain. There were, therefore, two well defined groups of belligerents, which did not begin to overlap until Austria declared war on Russia on the 5th August, 1914, and Germany declared war on Serbia on the 6th August, 1914. France and Great Britain declared war on Austria on the 12th August, 1914, Turkey entered the war on the 5th November, 1914.

It might, therefore, be open to Germany to contend that on the 4th August, 1914, all the belligerents in the war in which she was engaged had ratified the Convention, and that at that moment it became binding upon each belligerent. After the declaration of war on Germany by Great Britain, the development of events was rapid, and the declarations of war by Austria on Russia on the 5th August, 1914, and Germany on Serbia on the 6th August, 1914, were the inevitable result of the general outbreak of hostilities, and formed part of the same transaction. Springing as they did from the same causes, and from the alliances between the principal combatant Powers, it would be a legal refinement to contend that they were to be regarded as separate wars, without effect upon the relations of the other group of belligerents.

2. An argument against the applicability of the Convention can be founded on the view that Articles 1 and 2 are mutually interdependent, and that where Article 1 has not been applied, and days of grace have not been given, Article 2 does not arise, and, therefore, merchant ships, which, owing to force majeure, have been unable to leave the enemy port, or which may not have been allowed to leave, do not become entitled to the immunity from confiscation which Article 2 purports to confer.

Apart from any special agreement which Germany can found on the Foreign Office correspondence in 1914, there is some force in this argument if the Convention must be read as a whole. The fundamental principle of the Convention is that it is desirable that days of grace should be given to ships in port, and it may be submitted that the words used in Article 2 "or which may not have been allowed to leave," are intended to be covered by the preceding words, which refer specifically to the period contemplated by the preceding article. Article 2 is not perhaps very happily expressed, and it is right to observe that the principal authorities are against this view, and consider that the words "which may not have been allowed to leave" make Article 2 applicable, notwithstanding that days of grace may not have been given under Article 1. The point should however be considered.

3. The Final Act of The Hague Conference, 1907, provides that the Conventions and the Declarations shall form so many separate Acts.

If, notwithstanding, it is open to the Crown to contend that the fourteen Conventions must be read as a composite body of law, and that a belligerent is not at liberty to disregard some of the Conventions when it is in its interest to do so, and at the same time claim from its opponents the benefit of other Conventions, there is an overwhelming case to be made against the German claim to be entitled to the benefit of the Sixth Hague Convention.

If, however, this provision is to be construed in a sense opposed to the above contention, it would seem to follow that retaliatory action, so far as the Conventions are concerned, can only be taken in kind. There is no rule of international law which so limits the right of a belligerent to take reprisals against an enemy, for the only restrictions seem to be that the reprisal must be commensurate with the offence and in accord with the dictates of humanity.

Retaliation based on the confiscation of these vessels as a reprisal against the lawless destruction of merchant shipping by Germany may be said to comply with the most exacting standards. It tends to counter and repair the actual damage inflicted by the enemy in his unlawful operations at sea, since it enables the wronged Power to replace the ships destroyed in breach of international law with ships of the enemy in his possession.

It violates no principle of humanity, for while inflicting financial loss it causes no physical suffering or loss of life to persons in the enemy country.

As a measure of punishment it falls far short of the crime which caused the death at sea of over 15,000 persons who were in no sense belligerents.

Moreover, there is hardly any article in the Regulations annexed to the Fourth Convention concerning the laws and customs of war on land, which Germany did not flagrantly disregard. The administration of the occupied parts of Belgium and France, the treatment of prisoners of war, the use of poison and poisoned arms, the murder of the wounded, the deliberate destruction of property, the bombardment of undefended towns, the pillage of towns, the devastation of the countryside, the deportation of the Belgian and French populations, and the requisitions effected in Belgium and France are a few notorious examples of the wholesale disregard by Germany of the articles of this Convention.

These can be proved beyond any question of doubt.

It is important to remember that Germany did not hold herself bound by the Eleventh Hague Convention (Restrictions on Capture in Maritime War). Her naval officers consistently destroyed mails on board enemy and neutral ships, which are declared inviolable by Article 1, not only by sinking the ships without first taking off the mails, but also by deliberately throwing overboard mails found on captured ships.

Moreover, in a note which the German Government addressed to the Government of Siam on the 5th July, 1917, before Siam entered the war she dealt specifically with Article 5 of the Eleventh Convention, which provides that such of the crew of an enemy merchant ship captured by a belligerent as are nationals of a neutral State are not made prisoners of war. The German note contained this paragraph:—

"This treaty stipulation, however, is not binding on any of the belligerent Powers in the present war, as, according to Article 9, the Convention finds application only if the belligerents are all parties to the Treaty; now, a large number of the belligerents, among them Russia and Italy in particular, have not ratified the Convention. Consequently, the Convention is not valid at all in the present war, so that no neutral Power is entitled to appeal to the stipulation of Article 5."

The terms of Article 9 of the Eleventh Convention, upon which Germany relied, are identical with the terms of Article 6 of the Sixth Hague Convention, and, if the argument of Germany is valid in respect of the Eleventh Convention, it is equally valid in respect of the Sixth Convention, and that Convention was, therefore, not binding on any of the belligerent Powers. The parallel is completed by the circumstance that Italy had also not ratified the Sixth Convention.

It is hardly necessary to dwell on the other grave breaches of international law committed by Germany, such as the sinking of ships, including passenger liners and hospital ships, without giving warning or making any provision for the safety of the passengers and crews. These will be present to the minds of the Law Officers and Counsel.

The action of certain of the Allied and Associated Governments may perhaps be cited as exemplifying their view of the applicability of the Convention. The United States did not sign or ratify the Sixth Hague Convention because the United States Government was of opinion that the Convention, in making the granting of days of grace optional casts doubt on a practice which had become obligatory, but it is to be observed that, although in time of peace they held this view, in time of war no days of grace were in fact granted to German ships in United States ports. On the contrary Congress by legislative act authorised the President to take over the property in all such vessels, and the Law Officers have advised that this was a valid transfer of the property.

This proceeding furnishes an apt illustration of the difference in some countries between the theory and practice of international law.

It is believed that Brazil followed the same course although a ratifying Power. No doubt, a similar course could be taken by the British Parliament, if it were thought necessary, but as the Prize Court has already held that the vessels in question were lawfully seized as prize, all that is necessary would be for further application to the Court for condemnation, if the Government should be advised that the Hague Convention in question was inapplicable.

Italy had not ratified the Convention, but in the earlier stages of the war issued a special decree making provision for its application. The decree also provided that enemy property might be confiscated to make good any injury caused by illegal acts of warfare, and, acting under this clause, the Italian Prize Courts have proceeded to the condemnation of enemy ships in port at the outbreak of war.

The Armistice.

4. In considering whether the Sixth Hague Convention is applicable, it is important to bear in mind the terms of the Armistice which brought active hostilities to a close. Under Article 30 of the Armistice "all merchant ships now in German hands belonging to the Allied and Associated Powers shall be restored without reciprocity in ports specified by the Allies and the United States." All British ships in German hands, with the exception of a few which had been requisitioned and sunk, were restored under this article. Nowhere, either in the Armistice or the Peace Treaty, is any mention made of The Hague Convention, nor does it appear from the reply of the Allies to the German Delegation that any claim was made by the latter for the application of the Convention in their proposed amendments to the terms of the Treaty of Peace submitted to them.

Moreover, the fact that the surrender of Allied merchant-ships under the Armistice was made without reciprocity may possibly be regarded as overriding The Hague Convention and depriving Germany of any claim to its benefit, though Germany might, perhaps, contend in reply, that the Armistice only required the ships to be handed over without immediate reciprocity, but did not determine or restrict their ultimate right to claim the return of the ships under the Convention.

The Treaty of Peace.

5. It was expected that the Treaty of Peace would make provision for the final disposal of these vessels, but it has been suggested that differences arose with the United States Government which prevented effect being given to this intention.

No direct reference is made to them in the Treaty of Peace, and if they are covered by its phrasing, it would seem to be by accident rather than by design. Annex III of the Reparation Clause provides for the surrender of all German merchant ships over 1,600 tons, one-half of those between 1,000 and 1,600 tons, one-quarter of the steam trawlers, and one-quarter of other fishing boats.

It may be that the ships which are detained and not condemned are technically still German ships. The ownership is, presumably, still in the original German owner, but they are not entitled to fly the German flag, for, apart from being captured ships, they have been requisitioned and given British registry and must of necessity fly the British flag.

It is difficult to see how they can have been registered and the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act complied with, unless the beneficial interest is in the King or the British Government.

Moreover, the annexe purports to relate to ships which Germany was in a position to hand over to the Allies when the Treaty was signed. The vessels detained in Great Britain do not fall within this category, since neither the owners nor the German Government had any control over them.

The terms of the annexe are difficult to apply to these vessels, and it would appear that the position may ultimately have to be accepted that they are not dealt with by the Treaty.

Upon this question the Law Officers and Counsel are referred to the letter addressed by the Procurator-General to the Foreign Office on the 12th June, 1919, and to the correspondence and memoranda in the same bundle concluding with Sir Eyre Crowe's letter to Earl Curzon of the 23rd October, 1919, in which the conflicting considerations are dealt with in greater detail.

It should be observed that, under paragraph 8, Annex III, of Part 8 of the Treaty, Germany waives all claims against the Allies in respect of the detention, employment, loss, or damage of any German ships or boats. This paragraph, however, is probably intended to refer to claims for damages for the period of detention and not to the ultimate disposal of the vessels themselves.

A more relevant article in the treaty is perhaps No. 237, which deals with the liquidation of German assets in this country. Paragraph (b) of this article provides as follows:—

"Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present Treaty, the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to German nationals or companies controlled within their territories," &c.

These words are wide enough to cover the detained enemy ships, and may fairly be regarded as superseding the terms of the Convention.

The Lloyd George-Wilson Agreement.

Within the last few weeks the Procurator-General has had brought to his attention an agreement, concerning the origin of which little or no information can be obtained.

It is a curious fact that no reference to this agreement is made in the despatch addressed by Sir Eyre Crowe to Earl Curzon on the 23rd October, 1919, a copy of which is in the bundle of Foreign Office correspondence, although paragraph 4 purports to deal with the question of the disposal of these vessels as between Great Britain and her Allies.

The explanation of the omission of any reference to the agreement is not known.

The agreement was made in Paris in May 1919, and is signed by Mr. Lloyd George and President Wilson, and provides that the Reparation Committee will take steps to prepare a list of all enemy ships in existence captured, seized, or detained by any Allied or Associated Government, and also all other enemy ships ceded under the Treaty of Peace. Having done so, the Reparation Committee will take such steps as will secure that each of the Allied and Associated Governments will retain as its own the complete title to and use of all ships captured, seized, or detained during the war as a war measure prior to the 11th November, 1918, and will own the same free from any of the other Allied or Associated Governments.

The agreement proceeds to make provision for securing contributions to the Reparation Fund from those Powers whose captures exceed their tonnage lost, with a view to compensating Powers whose losses exceed the tonnage captured by them.

This agreement is open to criticism.

It seems to have been based on the assumption that the title to and property in the detained enemy ships had already been transferred from the enemy owners to the Allied and Associated Governments, and that all that remained to be done was to apportion the vessels in proportion to losses. If, however, the transfer of the title was not effected by the Treaty of Peace, it is not clear how, in the case of England at any rate, where no legislative action has been taken as has been done in the United States, the title in the vessels has been transferred, and therefore how the agreement can become operative or what steps the Reparation Committee can take to secure to England the complete title to and user of all the ships detained in this country.

Germany is not a party of this agreement, and is not, of course, bound by it. So far, therefore, as Germany is concerned, it is of no assistance. So far as England is concerned, unless the ships can be regarded as British ships, it seems to be a premature attempt to award a prize which has not yet been secured. The United States, however, benefit with certainty by it, as they obtain recognition of their right to retain the very valuable ships which were seized in their ports and vested in the President by Legislative Act of the Senate on paying a sum of money into the Reparation Fund.

All that the agreement can be regarded as doing is to show that it was considered that the Allied and Associated Governments were in a position to apportion the ships, but whether this view is or is not correct is a matter with regard to which different opinions may be held.

The Effect of Requisition.

The question whether detained ships which have been requisitioned can be regarded as British ships vested in the British Government becomes in these somewhat uncertain conditions one of considerable materiality.

It has already been stated that all the detained ships have been requisitioned and given British registry.

PRIZE LAW.

The Sixth Hague Convention, Article 2, provides as follows:—

"Article 2.—The belligerent may only detain it under an obligation of restoring it after the war without indemnity, or he may requisition it on condition of paying an indemnity ('moyennant indemnité')."

It is to be observed that the two alternatives are clearly set out in this article. The belligerent can either detain and restore or requisition and pay an indemnity.

Applications to requisition the ships once they had passed into the custody of the Prize Court were made under the Prize Court Rules Order XXIX, as amended by the Order in Council of the 29th April, 1915.

This order does not of course create any power to requisition; it merely prescribes the procedure by which the power of requisition derived aliunde is to be exercised (the "Zamora," 2 B. and C.P.C., page 1).

In the case of enemy ships detained in this country in time of war there would seem to be a double right of requisition: first, the Sovereign Right of Angary, which must apply to enemy property with equal if not greater force than to neutral property (the "Zamora," supra, page 21, &c.); and, second, the somewhat more restricted right conferred by the Sixth Hague Convention quoted above.

If the exercise of these rights or either of them is to effect an absolute acquisition of the ship for all purposes, it would seem to follow that these detained ships have become British property, subject, if The Hague Convention is applicable, to an obligation to pay an indemnity.

The wording of the Convention itself clearly contemplates that the ship is taken absolutely and for all purposes. The two alternatives emphasise this: either the belligerent detains and returns the ship, or he requisitions it and pays an indemnity. It will be observed that the second alternative does not provide for requisition and either return or indemnity, which would have been necessary if that possibility were in contemplation.

A strong argument can therefore be put forward in support of the view that requisition under the Convention is a permanent and complete acquisition of the ship. There are, however, two points which should be mentioned against this contention—one is that some international jurists do not accept it as the true interpretation of the Convention.

The other is a point which arises under the Prize Court Rules.

Originally Order XXIX, referred only to the requisition of a ship without specifying any period of time during which the requisition should continue. A doubt arose whether, where the order was made in that form, the Crown could return a ship to the Admiralty Marshal when it no longer required the vessel. This led to the rule being amended by the Order in Council of the 29th April, 1915, paragraph 6 of which provided that where the Crown desired to requisition a ship temporarily, the Court might make an order for temporary delivery of a ship to the Crown and laid down the procedure to be followed in the event of the ship being returned to the custody of the Court.

It is submitted that there is no difference in principle between the two forms of requisition and that the so-called "temporary requisition" has the same legal effect, so far as the transfer of property and title is concerned, as the unqualified requisition, and confers on the Crown in addition a right to terminate the requisition and return the ship to the custody of the Court.

The effect of requisitions in this form is important, inasmuch as most of the orders were for temporary requisition. Two test cases were taken recently, and orders of temporary requisition were converted into orders of requisition under Order XXIX, Rule 1. If this conversion strengthens the legal position of the Crown, there would seem to be no reason why similar applications should not be made in all the other cases.

If there is any means by which these ships can be permanently secured, it is very desirable that the Government should avail itself of them, for in the present conditions the ships themselves are both on economic and financial grounds of far greater value than is represented by their appraised value at the date of requisition. From both points of view it would be preferable to acquire the ships, even if compensation had to be paid on that basis than to return the ships to the enemy owners, unless the effect of such restitution were to bring the ships within the reparation clauses of the Treaty (Annexe III) and render them liable to redelivery to the Allied and Associated Governments. This, however, seems doubtful.

Certain of the Colonial Governments wish to secure permanently detained ships in their ports, and if condemnation of the vessels cannot be obtained either by reason of the applicability of the Sixth Hague Convention or any other cause, it is very desirable to obtain orders of permanent requisition under Order XXIX, Rule 1, if such orders will result in securing to them an absolute title to the ships. The advice of the Law Officers as to the steps which it is open to the Colonial Governments to take to attain their object will be of great assistance to them on this question.

PRIZE LAW.

Detained Ships lost by Enemy Action while under Requisition.

A number of detained enemy ships have been lost as the result of illegal enemy action while under requisition to His Majesty's Government. For the most part the requisitions are in form temporary, and the Procurator-General as proper officer of the Crown, has, in accordance with the Prize Court Rules given undertakings to pay into Court the value of the ships when required so to do.

The general principles arising out of the Sixth Hague Convention and the Treaty of Peace, which apply to detained enemy ships, will no doubt apply to the appraised values of these vessels, but there is the further question whether, where the loss has resulted from illegal enemy action the enemy owner is, even if the Sixth Hague Convention be held to apply as between Great Britain and Germany, entitled to claim compensation from His Majesty's Government, and ought not rather to raise the claim against the German Government, by whose orders the illegal acts were committed.

It is not, however, altogether clear that vis-à-vis the Prize Court to whom the undertaking has been given, the Procurator-General is relieved from his obligation to pay the appraised values of the lost ships into the Prize Court by illegal act of the enemy.

Under Order XXIX, Rule 5, as amended by the Order in Council of the 29th April, 1915, it is not necessary for the proper officer of the Crown to lodge the money in Court until the "Court shall declare by Order that the same is required for the purpose of payment out of Court."

If, therefore, the illegal action of the German Government in sinking these ships is in itself a bar to a claim by the German owner against His Majesty's Government, the necessity for lodging the money in Court will not arise save, perhaps, at the instance of the Exchequer, with a view to ultimate disposal under the terms of the Treaty of Peace.

It would shock the public conscience if money were paid over to the enemy in respect of the loss of a detained ship which had been destroyed by a German submarine without warning perhaps with the loss of the lives of all the British crew on board.

The desirability of providing against such an anomaly is apparent.

The Law Officers and Counsel are requested to advise:—

1. Whether The Hague Convention, No. VI, is applicable as between Great Britain and Germany and Great Britain and Austria.
2. If the Convention is applicable—

- (a.) Whether the ships none the less fall to be dealt with under the provisions of the Treaty of Peace (Annexe III of the Reparation clauses or Article 297), and, if so, what further application, if any, should be made to the Prize Court to secure a title to the ships.
- (b.) If they do not fall, to be dealt with under the Treaty of Peace, whether they must be returned to the German owners or in what other way they should be disposed of.
- (c.) Whether it is still open to His Majesty's Government and Colonial Governments to apply to the Prize Court to convert temporary orders of requisition into orders of requisition under Order XXIX, Rule 1, and, if so, whether absolute titles will thereby be obtained.
- (d.) In what way the appraised values of detained enemy ships sunk by illegal enemy action, while under requisition to His Majesty's Government, should be dealt with, and what application, if any, should be made to the Prize Court with regard to their disposal.

3. If the Convention is not applicable, whether application can successfully be made to the Prize Court for decrees of condemnation.
4. Generally upon the matter.

H.M. Procurator-General's Department,
January 22, 1920.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. W. N. Raeburn, K.C., Mr. Bowstead, and Dr. Pearce Higgins.

1. We are of opinion that, in view of the correspondence with the United States Government in August and September 1914, it is not open to the British Government to contend that the Sixth Hague Convention is inapplicable because all the belligerents were not parties thereto. We think that, by this correspondence, Great Britain did undertake as between herself and Germany to observe the provisions of the Convention. But in our opinion a strong argument may be presented that Great Britain is justified, by way of retaliation for the flagrant violation of other Hague Conventions and of the rules of international law on the part of both Germany and Austria, in refusing to observe the terms of the Sixth Hague Convention.

2. In view of our answer to 3 below, we do not think it is necessary to decide these questions herein.

3. We think that application for condemnation should be made in accordance with the right reserved to the Crown by Sir Samuel Evans in the Chile case, when he left over for future decision what the full rights of the Crown as seizers of the vessels in port may be.

4. It is possible that the Court may take the view that the Convention is binding, notwithstanding the conduct of the enemy, and we advise that a test case should be brought before the Court on an application of condemnation, and, in the alternative, for permanent requisition of the vessel. A case in which it is probable that the German owners will resist the application should be chosen, so that the matter may be fully argued.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
W. N. RAEBURN.
W. BOWSTEAD.
A. P. HIGGINS.

*Law Officers' Department,
February 9, 1920*

[193305]

No. 1^B.

[Ministry of Shipping]

[File 3015/1919]

[March 31, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

(A copy Memorandum by Professor A. Pearce Higgins accompanies this Case.)

Ships sold by Germans to the Dutch during the War.

BY article 8 of the Convention prolonging the Armistice with Germany, signed at Trèves on the 16th January, 1919, it was agreed:—

"In order to secure the provisioning of Germany and of the rest of Europe, the German Government shall take all necessary steps to place the whole German merchant fleet, for the duration of the Armistice, under the control and the flags of the Allied Powers and the United States, who shall be assisted by a German delegate. This arrangement shall in no wise affect the final disposal of such vessels. The Allies and the United States shall, if they consider this necessary, replace the crews either entirely or in part, and the officers and crews so replaced shall be repatriated to Germany. Suitable compensation, to be fixed by the Allied Governments, shall be made for the use of such vessels.

"All questions of details, as also any exceptions to be made in the case of certain types of vessel, shall be settled by a special agreement to be concluded immediately."

Five vessels, viz., the "Johann Heinrich Burchard," "William Oswald," "Braunschweig," "Denderah" and "Nassau" were not delivered on the pretext that these ships, having been sold in 1915-16 by the Hamburg-Amerika and the Kosmos Line to Dutch shipping companies, were consequently not German but Dutch ships.

The German Government was repeatedly informed by the president of the Allied Naval or Armistice Commission that the Allied and Associated Powers did not recognise any transfer of enemy tonnage to a neutral flag or ownership during the war except by special consent, and the Supreme Council has called upon the German Government to send, without further delay, the above-named five vessels to the Firth of Forth for delivery to the Allied and Associated Powers, and to remove the Dutch crews.

A communication in the above sense was addressed to the Dutch Government, who replied to it on the 28th October, 1919, in the following terms:—

"The 'William Oswald' and the 'Johann Heinrich Burchard' were acquired by the Dutch shipping company known as 'Koninklijke Hollandsche Lloyd' on the 15th June, 1916, the three remaining ships having been bought by the Dutch shipping company known as 'Hollande-Amerika Lijn' on the 29th July and the 7th August, 1915.

"At the time of the transaction the above-mentioned ships (the purchase price of which has been paid by the two companies) were under construction. As ships properly so called they have at no time been German property, and were never entered on any register of German ships. Their first certificates of registry were Dutch.

"The ships in question are, therefore, indubitably Dutch property, the more so that at the date when the transactions took place there were no regulations prohibiting Germany from disposing of ships under construction, or from acquiring ships from neutral countries.

"The Dutch Government has represented to the German Government the rights of the Dutch companies.

"The Royal Dutch Government has considered it its duty to bring the above to the notice of the Supreme Council. It is confident that the Supreme Council will recognise the rights of the Dutch companies, and will refrain from measures calculated to hinder the handing over of the ships in question to their rightful owners."

It appears that the Supreme Council replied to the Dutch communiqué of the 4th November that the conditions in which the transaction took place did not allow the principal Allied and Associated Powers to recognise the rights of ownership in those vessels of the Dutch parties concerned. It was also pointed out that, according to the terms of the Armistice Convention of the 16th January, 1919, Germany was to surrender all her merchant ships to the Allies, and that between the signature and the coming into force of the Treaty of Peace no agreement entered into by Germany can affect the execution of the obligation imposed on her by the treaty to surrender her merchant ships to the Allied and Associated Powers.

In these circumstances the Supreme Council informed the Dutch Government that the claim by the Dutch parties concerned cannot be satisfied, but that if the parties have claims they must submit them to Germany, whose intervention in this respect is provided for in paragraph 7 of Annex 3 of Part V (Reparation) of the Treaty of Peace with Germany.

On the 7th November, 1918, the Foreign Office addressed a circular telegram to all neutral Governments to the effect that His Majesty's Government would refuse to recognise, either during or after the war, any transfer of enemy tonnage to neutral flag or ownership made before the final conclusion of peace, except with their special consent. His Majesty's Government hold that Allies have a claim against the shipping of Central Powers in view of illegal submarine campaign, and they did not intend to allow their claim to be defeated by any such transfer.

The exchange of ratifications of the Treaty of Peace with Germany took place on the 10th January, 1920.

The "Limburgia," formerly the "Johann Heinrich Burchard," left Bremerhaven on the 3rd February and reached Ymuiden, in Holland, on the following day. The other four vessels are still in German waters.

The Reparation Committee has handed to the German representative the following instructions:—

1. The German Government to be informed that clearance papers must not be given to the ships mentioned in the Reparation Commission's letter of the 31st January, 1920.
2. If clearance papers are given to the ships, the Reparation Commission will have to inform the Allied and Associated Powers that Germany is evading her obligations under the Peace Treaty.

[6498]

3. If ships try to leave or leave without clearance papers, it is for the German Government to take all steps usual for a Government to take in such circumstances.
4. The Reparation Commission request that these steps be taken pending settlement of ownership. The Reparation Commission will hear all parties concerned, but meanwhile request an undertaking that the necessary steps to prevent ships leaving will be taken.

There is a possibility that the remaining four vessels may attempt to reach Holland, without clearance papers if necessary, and the British and other Admiralties are desired to take the necessary steps to prevent this.

The opinion of the Law Officers is desired as to the steps which His Majesty's ships may take against these vessels should they be met on the high seas with or without German clearance papers.

Memorandum by Professor A. Pearce Higgins.

One of the questions raised by these papers relates to the transfer of an enemy ship to a neutral flag after the outbreak of war. It is claimed by the Dutch that all five vessels were sold to Dutch purchasers by the German builders before the end of 1916 and that they had never been German, but that in order to run no risks of capture by the British or French warships they did not attempt to leave Germany during the war. Against this, it is alleged that as regards the "Denderah" and "Braunschweig," either under these names or under their Dutch names of "Moerdijk" and "Eemdijk," they do not appear in any Dutch shipping lists corrected to the 1st April, 1919, nor in the list of the Holland-America fleet. Also that an examination of returns of the German shipbuilding yards throughout the war does not reveal a single case of a ship being returned as built for the Dutch account.

British prize law on the subject of the transfer of merchant vessels to a neutral owner during or in contemplation of hostilities is set forth as follows in the memorandum prepared for the Naval Conference of London of 1908-9 (Parl. Papers, "Misc. No. 4 (1909)," p. 10, [Cd. 4554]), and for the present purpose is treated as a sufficiently accurate statement:—

1. The assignment, either by sale or gift, to a neutral of an enemy ship, other than a ship of war, is not rendered invalid merely by the fact that it was made during or in contemplation of hostilities ("Benedict," Spinks, 314, 2 E.P.C. 527; "Baltica," 11 Moore, P.C., 141, 2 E.P.C. 628; "Minerva," 6 C. Rob. 396, 1 E.P.C. 591).
2. Such an assignment is not, however, valid if:—
 - (a.) It is made in blockaded port ("General Hamilton," 6 C. Rob. 62, 1 E.P.C. 528).
 - (b.) It is made in the course of a voyage. For this purpose a voyage is at an end as soon as the ship reaches a port where she can actually be delivered into the possession of the transferee ("Dankebaer Africaan," 1 C. Rob. 112, 1 E.P.C. 74; "Vrouw Margeretha," 1 C. Rob. 336, 1 E.P.C. 149; "Jan Frederick," 5 C. Rob. 128, 1 E.P.C. 435; "Baltica," 11 Moore, P.C., 141, 2 E.P.C. 628).
 - (c.) The vendor retains any share in the ship, or if there is an agreement to reconvey her at the end of the war ("Sechs Geschwistern," 4 C. Rob. 100, 1 E.P.C. 363; "Noydt Gedacht," 2 C. Rob. 137, note).
3. The onus of proving that the transfer is genuine lies on the claimant, and the assignment must be complete, bonâ fide, and for good consideration.

The vessel transferred to a neutral flag is, therefore, still liable to be condemned by the Prize Court if the circumstances of the transfer are attended with suspicion not removed by the claimant ("Vigilantia," 1 C. Rob. 1, 1 E.P.C. 31; "Endraught," 1 C. Rob. 19; "Welvaart," 1 C. Rob. 122; "Juffrou Anna," 1 C. Rob. 124, 1 E.P.C. 76; "Noydt Gedacht," 2 C. Rob. 137, note; "Jemmy," 4 C. Rob. 31, 1 E.P.C. 331; "Soglasie," Spinks 105; "Ernst Merck," Spinks 99, 2 E.P.C. 338; "Ariel," 11 Moore P.C., 110, 2 E.P.C. 600; "Christine," Spinks 82, 2 E.P.C. 320), as, for example:—

- (a.) No documentary evidence of the assignment is found on board at the time of the seizure;
- (b.) The transferor has any control over the ship, reservation of the profits, or power to revoke the assignment;
- (c.) Possession has not been taken by the alleged transferee, or by some agent of his who is not an enemy;
- (d.) The ship is under the control of an enemy;
- (e.) The master or other person in command is in the service of an enemy.

The views of other countries on this subject are set forth in Parl. Papers, "Misc. No. 5 (1909)," [Cd. 4555] pp. 112-114. They may be summarised as follows:—

Germany.—A ship flying a neutral flag can be treated as enemy if until the commencement of hostilities, or within two weeks preceding it, she has flown an enemy flag.

Austria accepted the rule proposed by the Institut du Droit international, which provided that the legal act evidencing the sale of an enemy ship during war must be perfect, and the ship must be registered in conformity with the legislation of the country whose nationality it has acquired before leaving its port of departure.

Spain accepted the British rules, which are set forth above.

France says that the change of nationality of merchant ships made after declaration of war is void and of no effect.

Italy presumes that a transfer made after outbreak of war is fraudulent ("fictive"), and therefore is not to be recognised, but proof to the contrary may be admitted in special cases.

Japan allows such a transfer only if there is sufficient proof of a complete bonâ fide transfer.

Holland recognises the transfer without restriction.

Article 56 of the Declaration of London provides:—

"The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected after the outbreak of hostilities, is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.

"Provided that there is absolute presumption that a transfer is void—

- "1. If the transfer has been made during a voyage or in a blockaded port.
- "2. If a right to repurchase or recover the vessel is reserved to the vendor.
- "3. If the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled."

The subject of transfer to a neutral flag after the outbreak of war was discussed by Lord Sterndale in the "Edna," ex "Mazatlan" (1919, p. 157), and the following extract from his judgment deals with it:—

"Then it is said she was enemy property, and she could not become anything else during the war. If she is a merchant ship, according to the decision in the 'Baltica' (11 Moore, P.C., 141), she can be acquired by a neutral during the war so long as it is a bonâ fide transfer, which I have held this to be. I will assume that she was enemy property and was a German ship. I have already expressed my opinion, and I retain it, that what took place with regard to the change of the flag from Mexican to German and from German to Mexican had nothing whatever to do with the question of ownership. But I will assume that I am entitled to go behind the entity of the Mexican company and to look at the persons who were really concerned; and I will assume that this vessel was a German-owned merchant vessel at the beginning of the war. I can find nothing to show that if that is so she cannot be bonâ fide bought and transferred to a neutral flag—i.e., American, as this vessel was during the war. As I have said, I find a distinct statement that she can, by the Privy Council in the 'Baltica' (11 Moore, P.C., 141), and the only argument I have heard to the contrary is that such a transfer is prohibited by article 56 of the Declaration of London. Article 56 is to this effect: 'The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected after the outbreak of hostilities, is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.'

Now that must be read, of course, in conjunction with the previous article, article 55: 'The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected before the outbreak of hostilities, is valid, unless it is proved that such transfer was made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.' The difference between the two is this: Before the war, prima facie the transaction is good, but it may be shown to be bad because it may be shown that it is made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed; after the war, prima facie (this is the highest degree to which it seems to me you could put this article) it is invalid, but it may be shown to be valid if it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed. It was argued (at least, I think this is what the argument came to) on behalf of the Crown, that an enemy vessel, by reason of being an enemy vessel, is always exposed to certain consequences, and therefore she never can be transferred validly because the transfer always will evade the consequences of her being an enemy vessel. I think the Solicitor-General rather disclaimed the wish to put the argument as high as that; but if it is not to be put as high as that, it seems to me to come to nothing so far as this case is concerned. If the sale is made bona fide because the purchaser wishes to get the ship for his own purposes, that, in my opinion, is not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel is exposed. It does, no doubt, put an end to the consequence that follows on her being an enemy vessel, namely, that so long as she is an enemy vessel she may be seized. But it is not made in order to evade those consequences. I think that article 56 is really pointing at what may be called colourable transfers, and some support of that is afforded by the words that follow: 'Provided that there is an absolute presumption that a transfer is void . . . (2) If a right to repurchase or recover the vessel is reserved to the vendor'—giving one instance of it being colourable. I do not think that this article was intended to interfere with the general principle of law as laid down by the 'Baltica' at all, except so far as it might throw the onus of proving the bona fides of the transaction upon the purchaser. Here bona fides is shown, and I think that this transaction was a perfectly sound and valid one, and there was nothing in the circumstances to prevent the Lloyd Mexicano passing a perfectly good title to the claimants."

In no one of the cases under consideration was the transfer completed by the delivery of the ship during the period of hostilities; they all remained in Germany till the "Limburgia" (formerly known as "Johann Heinrich Burchard") escaped on the 3rd February. Assuming the validity in international law of article 56 of the Declaration of London, there is no evidence that the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have been fulfilled. Such evidence as exists is to the effect that two at least do not appear on the lists of Dutch ships.

In the "Baltica" (2 E.P.C. 628) it is stated that the purchase by a neutral of an enemy ship is valid after the outbreak of war, even when vessel is lying in an enemy port; in the "Ariel" (ibid., 600) the enemy ship was sold when in a British port and only partly paid for; but in both cases the condemnation was reversed on appeal. They are strong cases in favour of a neutral purchaser, but in the present case no attempt was made to take possession for three years after the alleged sale took place.

It does not appear to me that the views of the Allied Powers that they would not recognise any transfer to neutral flags during war except by consent can be supported by international law as administered by British Prize Courts. The French, however, take a stronger line against transfers flagrante bello. Had they been met at sea by British or Allied warships during the war they would certainly have been captured and brought in for condemnation, as on the facts so far as they are known there is a strong prima facie case against the bona fides of the alleged transfer.

The relevant articles of the Treaty of Versailles relating to German shipping are contained in Annex 3 to Part VIII (Reparation), under which Germany undertakes to deliver to the Allied and Associated Powers the ships mentioned in article 1. These ships are defined in article 3, and include all ships which fly or may be entitled to fly the German merchant flag, or are owned by any German national, company, or corporation, &c., or are under construction in Germany or in other than Allied or Associated countries for the account of any German national, company, or corporation. If the ships in question were not validly transferred to neutral owners before the termination of the war, i.e., before the exchange of deposit of the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, they still remained owned by German owners, and therefore come within the terms of the article above mentioned. By article 23 of the armistice of the 11th November, 1918, "no transfers of German merchant shipping of any description to any neutral flag are to take place after the signature of the armistice" (see Oppenheim, "International Law," 2nd ed., vol. 1, sections 255 and 261).

All the facts are not before us, but there seems a strong prima facie case for suspicion of the bona fides of the transfer, and there is a presumption that merchant ships which have remained in a German port for so long a period during the war, without any attempt being made to get them to a port of the country to which they are alleged to belong, are enemy.

If, however, the Dutch statements can be substantiated, I think it very doubtful whether a British Prize Court would have condemned them if they had put to sea and had been seized during the war. If they are seized now in German ports, the Dutch owner will also probably commence an action in rem in the Courts of this or any other country where he may find the vessels.

We are now at peace with Germany, and any attempt to interfere with a merchant ship on the high seas flying the Dutch flag on the ground that she is in fact a German vessel would be treated by Holland as a grave insult to her flag (see "The 'Marianna Flora,'" 11 Wheaton 1).

A. PEARCE HIGGINS.

March 15, 1920.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Assuming that the transfer of these ships was invalid, we think that His Majesty's ships (or those of any of the Allied Powers) would be justified in seizing them if found on the high seas sailing under the Dutch flag, on the ground that they are German vessels and are wrongfully sailing under the Dutch flag in order to evade the provisions of the Armistice Convention and of the Peace Treaty with Germany. The facts are not sufficiently known to found a conclusion as to the validity of the transfers, but we agree with Dr. Pearce Higgins that there is a strong prima facie case for suspicion as to the bona fides of the transactions, and we think that this suspicion would justify the seizure of the vessels in order that the circumstances might be fully enquired into. In view of the circular telegram, dated the 7th November, 1918, addressed to neutral Governments and of the communications from the Supreme Council addressed to the Netherlands Government in reference to these five ships in particular, we do not see how Holland could justifiably treat this action as a grave insult to her flag. If it turned out that the transfers were valid, we think that the claims of Holland would be adequately met by a proper apology, with restoration of the vessels and compensation for any damage; and if, on the other hand, it turned out that the transfers were invalid, we do not think that Holland would have any grounds of complaint at all.

As to Dr. Pearce Higgins' suggestion that if the vessels were seized the Dutch owners would probably commence an action in rem, the answer is, we think, that, the seizure being an act of State, no such action would lie in any British Court.

It seems to us that the whole matter is one of policy rather than law, and that the remedy in case of seizure would be diplomatic and not legal.

GORDON HEWART.
E. M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
March 31, 1920.

[T 9193]

No. 1^c.

[Procurator-General.]

[File No. 1252/377/1920.]

[July 8, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers and Dr. Pearce Higgins.

Claim of French
Government to share in Prizes captured at Duala and Bonaberi, and in Cameroon
River.

HEREWITH are sent :—

1. Memorandum setting out the facts and legal questions.
2. Reports of Captain Fuller.
3. Correspondence with French Government.
4. Memorandum by M. Charguéraud.
5. Anglo-French joint capture convention.
6. Chart.

The operations against the German Colony in the Cameroons were in their broad characteristics a joint operation undertaken by the British and French naval and military forces. The first objective was the capture of the town of Duala and the shipping lying in the harbour and the Cameroon River. The British naval force arrived first at the mouth of the Cameroon River, and by far the greater part of the preparatory work was undertaken and completed by them before the arrival of the French warships.

This preparatory work included the sweeping of the river for mines and the clearing of a way through the wreck barrage, and this had been completely accomplished before the arrival of the French naval forces.

The bombardment of Duala took place after the French cruiser "Bruix" had arrived, but without its assistance, as "Bruix's" draught was too great to permit of its passing through the barrage as H.M.S. "Challenger" had done.

The capitulation of the town of Duala, which enabled the ocean-going ships lying above the town, and the vessels and craft in the harbour, to be seized was, however, expressed to be made to the Allied forces, and the French Government claims to be entitled to share in all the ships, vessels and craft captured except, perhaps, the steamship "Kamerun" and the three water lighters which had been captured by the British before the French naval forces arrived.

The question to be decided will apparently ultimately resolve itself into this :—

Did the British naval forces accomplish so much of the work as to exclude the French from making a claim? It is clear from the observations of Captain Fuller, the Senior Naval Officer in the Cameroons, that the feeling upon this subject entertained by the British naval forces concerned is somewhat strong, and some distaste is felt at the prospect of having to divide the result of their labours with the French forces. It may be that there is some ground for this feeling, but the question is, of course, whether the law is such as to entitle the French to claim.

The British claim to the vessels captured before the arrival of the French is no doubt well founded, and is believed not to be seriously disputed.

The claim to the vessels on the wreck barrage can be supported by cogent arguments, and with regard to these vessels the question is, whether when the British ships reached and passed through the wreck barrage they were in effective possession of the wrecks upon the barrage—in other words, whether the effective possession of the site on which a sunken ship is lying amounts to effective possession of the wreck before it is raised.

The British claim to the exclusive right in the large ships and craft captured off and above Duala and Bonaberi seems much more difficult to establish in view of the authorities which bear on the question of joint capture cited in the memorandum herewith.

The memorandum by M. Charguéraud represents the views of the French Government.

If the French Government's claim were considered to be so well founded as to admit, if no possibility of successfully contesting it might be considered diplomatic, to concede it without requiring it to be submitted formally to the Prize Court for adjudication.

The British Government is, however, fully within its rights in insisting on obtaining a legal decision in accordance with the arrangement made with the French Government, to which reference is made hereafter, and the Law Officers and counsel may think that, in view of the feeling in the navy upon this subject, it will be better to leave the matter to the decision of the President of the Prize Court, even, though they may consider that the prospects of successfully establishing the naval view are not very strong.

It may be explained that the general division of prizes captured by joint British and French forces is for the most part regulated by a Convention entered into by the United Kingdom and France on the 9th November, 1914. Article 5, paragraph 1, of the Convention provides for the division of the prizes into as many shares as there were men on board the captured ships, and the shares of each Ally so ascertained is to be paid over to the Government entitled to receive the same. Paragraph 2 provides that if the capture shall have been made by cruisers of one of the Allied nations in the presence and sight of a cruiser of the other, the division, &c., of the proceeds of the prize shall likewise be made in the manner above-mentioned. There is nothing in the Convention which purports to make it retrospective, and, as the captures in the Cameroons had all been effected before the 9th November, 1914—the date of the Convention—it does not apply. It has, however, been agreed in diplomatic correspondence that the question whether in the general principles applicable in such cases the French Government is entitled to share in these craft shall be referred to the President of the Prize Court for decision. The late Sir Samuel Evans, when President, agreed to the adoption of this course.

The French Government has now requested that the matter may be decided, unless the British Government is prepared to admit its right to share.

In the event of the French Government being held to be entitled to share in all or any of the ships, there will be the further question whether, in computing the respective shares of the two Governments, the naval forces present alone should be taken into account, or whether the military forces on board the transports at the mouth of the Cameroon River should also be included. This question is dealt with at some length in the memorandum, as it will be greatly to the advantage of the British navy if the naval forces alone are reckoned. Moreover, legal authority appears to support this view.

The Law Officers and counsel are requested to advise—

Whether the claim of the French Government to share in all or any, and if so which, of the ships and craft should be admitted, or whether the matter should be left to the President of the Prize Court for decision.

*Department of His Majesty's Procurator-General,
Storey's Gate, St. James's Park, S.W.,
June 1920.*

Memorandum on the Claim of the French Government to share in Prizes captured at Duala, Bonaberi and in the Cameroon River.

	INDEX.	Page
1. General		17
2. Questions for decision		19
3. British Government's Case		19
4. French Government's Case		21
5. Shares of British and French Governments		22
6. Summary of Cases		22
7. Conclusions		24

1. General.

In the course of the operations in the Cameroons, a number of valuable ocean-going steamers as well as a large number of tugs, lighters and other floating craft were captured by naval forces and have been condemned by the British Prize Court.

[6498]

D

The French Government put forward a claim to share in the proceeds of many of the foregoing and it was agreed that the French claim should, if necessary, be adjudicated on by the British Prize Court, and to this the late President, Sir Samuel Evans, agreed.

The subject has now been taken up by a French advocate, M. Chaguéraud, on behalf of the French Government, and it becomes necessary to ascertain what are the exact claims of that Government, what are the grounds on which they are based, and what are the arguments upon which the British Government relies in answer to the French claim.

It may be noted in the first place that a convention was entered into between the British and French Governments on the 9th November, 1914, relating to prizes captured during the war, the object of which, as set forth in the preamble, is "to determine the jurisdiction to which the adjudication of joint captures which may be made during the course of the present war by the naval forces of the Allied countries shall belong, or of captures which may be made of merchant-vessels belonging to one of the countries by the cruisers of the other," and "to regulate at the same time the mode of distribution of the proceeds of joint captures." It will be seen that the question whether or not there was a joint capture in fact is left to the decision of the Court having jurisdiction.

The captures in the Cameroons were all effected before the signature of the Anglo-French Convention; and the view that strictly it does not operate retrospectively so as to apply to captures already made has met with general acceptance.

The capitulation of the towns of Duala and Bonaberi to the Allied forces took place on the 27th September, 1914. Under the terms of the capitulation these towns and areas, as therein defined, were surrendered unconditionally to the Allied forces.

The terms of the capitulation are as follows:—

"Nigerian Government yacht 'Ivy,' off Duala.
September 27, 1914.

"(30590/16)

"I, as representative of the German Government, do hereby surrender unconditionally the towns of Duala and Bonaberi to the Allied forces.

"The area surrendered is to include all inhabited portions of Duala and Bonaberi, Bell Town and Bonaberi, and as far east as Beseke and to a point on the Edea Railway 3½ kilom. from Duala. On the Bonaberi side the area surrendered is to extend to a point on the railway 1½ kilom. from the wharf. The arms, ammunition and all Government property are to be surrendered, and all shipping in the harbour and the wharfs of Duala and Bonaberi is also to be handed over to the naval authorities of the French and British Allies. All German and Austrian male subjects at present within the surrendered area to be prisoners of war.

"(Signed) L. BLOCHER.

"Signed in the presence of the undersigned, as representatives of the British and French Allied forces in the Kamerun River.

"(Signed) C. M. DOBELL, Brigadier-General.
"(Signed) A. MAGES."

An Agreement was made between the French General Aymerich, and the British General Dobell regarding the disposal of German maritime property of uncertain or private ownership, under which all ships, boats, &c., derived from private ownership, including all found sunk, which had been placed in the Prize Courts were to be disposed of under those Tribunals; the Allied Governments were to determine whether vessels and craft, private property, which were sunk for the defence of the country, had lost their character of private property; and all vessels retained by the Allied Governments for need of their administrations were to be considered on loan from the Prize Court until a decision was arrived at.

Considerable correspondence took place between the French Ambassador and the Foreign Secretary, and between various Departments concerned, in regard to the claim by France to share as joint captors in the craft captured in the Cameroons, as a result of which it was ultimately agreed that all the craft captured at Duala should be placed in the British Prize Court, reserving to the French Government the right to put forward the claims to which they consider they are entitled under the terms of the capitulation of Duala to which they consider the terms of the Anglo-French Convention of the 9th November, 1914, should apply.

As above stated, all the craft referred to, including those sunk, have been condemned as prize by the British Prize Court.

M. Chaguéraud, the French Advocate entrusted by the French Government with the negotiating in this country, has put forward a summary of their case; and Captain Fuller, R.N., who was Senior Naval Officer at Duala, has also made a report as regards the operations in which he was engaged. From these documents it appears that the principal questions for decision are as follows:—

Captain
Fuller's
Report of the 31st August,
1916, and enclosures.

2. Questions for Decision.

1. Whether all or any of the vessels were joint captures so as to entitle the French forces to share.
2. If they were joint captures—
 - (I.) Which of the following vessels or classes of vessels were joint captures—
 - (a.) Steamship "Kamerun" and three water lighters captured before the arrival of the French.
 - (b.) Large vessels and craft found in the river off Duala and Bonaberi.
 - (c.) Vessels and craft found in the river above Duala and craft captured there and in the creeks, &c.
 - (d.) Vessels on the wreck barrage.
 - (II.) In what proportions the vessels are to be divided between the two forces and in particular—
 - (i.) Whether the division is to be based on the relative strengths of the forces engaged.
 - (ii.) If so, whether the naval forces only are to be taken into account, or whether the land forces also are to be reckoned.
 - (iii.) Whether the Anglo-French Joint Capture Convention applies, and if not, whether it is desirable that it should be applied.
 - (iv.) Whether the effect of the capitulation is to give the French a right to 50 per cent. of the ships, or their value, irrespective of the relative strengths of the forces engaged.

3. British Government's Case.

The case for the British Government is presented by Captain Fuller, R.N., in his report of the 31st August, 1916, and enclosures.

His view is that the steamship "Kamerun," the three water lighters cut out at Victoria and the vessels on the wreck barrage were all captured before the French ships arrived; that the large vessels lying above the town were not surrendered under the capitulation, but were seized by British naval forces alone and not as the result of joint operations; but he does not seriously contest that some of the smaller craft were covered by the capitulation. He bases his view upon the following contentions:—

Captain Fuller's original orders were to dispose of any German cruisers near Duala River, and thereafter turn his attention to the thirty-two German merchant-ships reported at Duala.

Accordingly a British naval force, consisting of H.M.S. "Cumberland" and H.M.S. "Dwarf," and some light Nigerian marine craft, arrived off the Cameroons at the beginning of September 1914. On the 8th September they began sweeping operations towards the Cameroon River entrance, and these operations were continued until, by the 10th September, a channel had been swept through the wreck barrage to within about 5 miles of Duala.

On the 10th September, 1914, Captain Fuller received from the Admiralty a telegram dated the 2nd September, 1914, that General Dobell, commanding the operations in the Cameroons, was expected to arrive at Sierra Leone on the 11th September, and he was to co-operate with him. Captain Fuller was instructed to gain intelligence and prepare to assist by attack with light-draught vessels on Duala. He

Report, paragraphs
4 and 8.

was also directed to discuss the scheme of operations personally with General Dobell and French S.N.O. before taking action.

Report.
Paragraph 9.

Captain Fuller states that prior to the receipt of this telegram it was his intention to send launches up the river to take possession of the large merchant-ships lying above the town, which was a feasible operation after the Joss battery had been dealt with.

On the 11th September the "Dwarf" engaged and silenced the Joss battery, the only guns in the defences at Duala, and on the succeeding nights engagements were fought with armed enemy ships.

Between the 17th and 20th September the main channel to the wreck barrage was surveyed and buoyed, and preparations were made to clear a passage through the wreck barrage for H.M.S. "Challenger." This necessitated diving operations and blowing up of some of the lighters which had been sunk by the Germans.

On the 23rd September, A.M., H.M.S. "Challenger" arrived with six transports of British troops, and during the day lightened ship so as to enable her to pass through the barrage.

On the 25th September, at 8.45 A.M., H.M.S. "Challenger" passed through the wreck barrage and proceeded up river towards Duala.

At 8.55 A.M. on the 25th September, the French warship "Bruix," with five transports containing French troops, arrived and anchored at the Suellaba base. The commander of the "Bruix" was asked whether he proposed to take part in the bombardment at Duala, but the draught which the ship drew prevented her passing through the barrage and he was unable to do so.

At 9.25 A.M. on the 25th September, 1914, H.M.S. "Challenger" sent an ultimatum to Duala and proceeded further up the river.

On the 26th September, 1914, in the morning, H.M.S. "Challenger" commenced the bombardment of Duala, and a British naval and military reconnaissance was made to M'benge. An attempt was made by two British naval vessels to blow up the railway at the Japona Bridge, thereby threatening the enemy's line of retreat.

On the 27th September, 1914, between 12 noon and 12.30 P.M., Duala capitulated, and in the afternoon Duala and Bonaberi, which is immediately opposite to Duala across the river, were occupied by landing parties from H.M.S. "Challenger." The capitulation was signed by the British General Dobell and a French military officer, Colonel Mages, in the Nigerian Government yacht "Ivy."

On the 28th September, in the morning, British troops disembarked at Duala, and at 9.30 A.M. the prize vessels above Bonaberi were taken possession of by H.M.S. "Dwarf." At 5 P.M. on the same afternoon French troops commenced to disembark at Duala. [It is believed that French sailors landed earlier in the day. M. Charguéraud says that the British and French Commanders entered Duala with pickets of thirty sailors at 3 P.M. on the 28th September, 1914 (Memorandum, paragraph 4). It is understood that there were thirty British and thirty French sailors.]

It will be seen from the above statement that the arduous and dangerous work of sweeping the channels, clearing the wreck barrage and dealing with the land defences was entirely carried out by British forces, for the most part before the arrival of the French ships. The way into Duala had in fact been opened; but, on the other hand, it is clear that Captain Fuller received orders from the Admiralty on the 10th September directing him to discuss the scheme of operations with General Dobell and the French Senior Officer before taking action, that is to say, before making the final attack upon the town. (Report of Captain Fuller, enclosure 1, paragraphs 4 and 8.)

Captain Fuller's view at the time seems to have been that the French cruiser "Bruix" was only a convoy for French transports and was not intended to take any active part in the operations. It is the case that she remained at the Suellaba base, 14 miles from Duala and 11 miles from the position of H.M.S. "Challenger" when she was bombarding that town, but it should be noted that the "Bruix" was in sight of H.M.S. "Challenger" and within sound of her guns during the bombardment. Beyond, however, lending two steamboats for guard duty at Suellaba base on one night and three small guns which were mounted in the Nigerian marine tug "Balbus," the French warship did not contribute directly to the capture of Duala or to the subsequent seizure of the ships and craft.

The attitude of the British naval forces towards the French claim is succinctly summed up in enclosure 4 to Captain Fuller's report, paragraph 4:—

"It is this fact—that the British navy having done all the work and run all the risks from mines, shore batteries, armed craft and infernal machines, should have to divide the result of it because the French warship arrived at the last moment without having any effect upon or helping in any way towards that result—which renders this claim so distasteful to those who took part in the operations."

4. French Government's Case.

The case for the French Government is presented in M. Charguéraud's memorandum as follows:—

The British General Dobell was appointed Commander-in-chief of all the forces operating against the Cameroons, both English and French, military and naval. Accordingly, the French forces took their orders from General Dobell and Captain Fuller. The date of the arrival of the French ships in the Cameroon River was fixed in consultation between the commander of the "Bruix" and the commander of the "Challenger."

M. Charguéraud's Memorandum.
Paragraph 1.
Paragraph 2.

On the 19th September, 1914, the commander of the "Challenger" informed the commander of the "Bruix" that he was starting on the following day with his convoy, arriving on the 23rd September. He expressed the wish that the French ships should not arrive at the same time, and it was accordingly arranged that the French convoy should leave Lagos on the 20th September and arrive at the mouth of the Cameroon River on the 22nd September at 12 noon. This programme was departed from owing to General Dobell ordering the "Bruix" to call at Calabar for victuals.

Paragraph 3.

On the 26th September the "Challenger" shelled Duala. Some English troops tried to disembark, but finding themselves in the marsh were taken off again and it was decided that French troops should disembark on the following day. Two staff officers and fifty bluejackets were to reconnoitre the proposed place of disembarkation. At the time at which this was being done (between 12 and 1 P.M. on the 27th September) Duala capitulated.

Paragraph 4.

The principal point of the French case is that the capitulation was signed by General Dobell and Colonel Mages of the French army, and in terms surrendered unconditionally the towns of Duala and Bonaberi to the Allied forces, and further provided that all shipping in the harbour and the wharfs of Duala and Bonaberi was to be handed over to the naval authorities of the French and British Allies. The French contend that all the shipping and craft passed under the capitulation and not by independent capture by the British naval force, which on the following day took possession of the vessels lying in the harbour and above the town. Their view is that the expression "harbour and wharfs of Duala and Bonaberi" is wide enough to include all those parts of the river in which the big ships and the greater part, if not all, of the craft were found. In the alternative, if the words "harbour and wharfs of Duala and Bonaberi" are not wide enough to include those parts of the river immediately above the town, where some of the big ships were lying, they contend that the capture was the result of a common enterprise and that the fact that the British naval force was detached to seize the ships was a fortuitous circumstance, and that a French naval force might, if General Dobell or Captain Fuller had thought fit, equally well have been detailed to do the work.

Paragraph 5.

Paragraph 5A.

Paragraph 5C.

With regard to the British contention that the French forces were not in sight at the capture, the French do not admit that this is the case or that, if it were the case, it would necessarily disentitle them from sharing if the operations were in fact joint operations. It is true that at the time of the bombardment of Duala to which the capitulation may fairly be ascribed, the "Bruix" was 14 miles away from the town. The "Challenger" was, however, in sight and the sound of the guns could be heard. Technically therefore the French may successfully maintain that the "Bruix" was in sight during the action.

This is rather a legal nicety. The substance however of the matter is that the capitulation was to the joint forces, and was signed by a British and French officer; that French forces were landed at Duala on the following day and the town was then and thereafter in the joint possession of the two Allied Powers.

Alternatively, on this part of the case, the French contend that to entitle them to share as joint captors it was not necessary for the French ship to be actually in sight provided she was taking part in joint operations. In support of this view they rely:—

1. Upon the case of the "Ferd. Laeisz"—a German ship captured during the present war by a French cruiser in co-operation with but out of sight of a British cruiser—in this case the British were held to be entitled to share.

2. Upon the case of operations at Piræus, where a French torpedo-boat was detached from the combined French and British forces operating in the harbour to seize an enemy ship at a distant port where no British ship was present, and also to cargo seized in warehouses at Piræus after the British force had left. The British have been held to be entitled to share on the ground that the seizures were part of a general scheme of joint operations.

With regard to the particular ships seized at Duala, it is understood that no claim is made by the French to share in the steamship "Kamerun" or the three water-lighters cut out of Victoria which were actually captured before the French arrived.

With regard to ships on the wreck barrage, the French do not admit that there was an effective capture by the British at the moment at which the passage was cleared through the barrage.

The French contend that a captor must be in actual possession of the vessel as distinguished from being in military occupation of the site of the river upon which the vessel lies. In the French view, therefore, these vessels should be treated as having been covered by the capitulation. With regard to the vessels at Bonaberi, they contend that they were either covered by the capitulation or were captured as the result of a common enterprise.

5. Shares of British and French Governments.

If the French successfully maintain the claim in principle, there will be the further question of the proportions in which the prizes are to be divided.

The French contend that the military forces in the transports should be taken into account in ascertaining these proportions.

The importance of this question is that if the proportions are to be calculated on the relative strengths of forces engaged, the British naval personnel was very much larger than the French naval personnel, there being only one French ship as against three big British ships and many small armed craft, and if therefore only naval forces are taken into account the British will secure a larger proportion than the French.

If, however, the military forces in the transports are taken into account the disproportion will be much reduced, and the French share correspondingly increased.

According to English Prize Law, land forces are only entitled to share in the proceeds of naval prize if they can show that there was actual co-operation or preconcerted action on their part (Dordrecht, 2 C. Rob. 68).

In this respect they stand on a less favourable footing than naval forces claiming to share in a joint capture.

The law upon this question is dealt with hereafter, and it is sufficient for the moment to express the view that there would seem to have been no sufficient co-operation or preconcerted action by the land forces at Duala to entitle them to share according to English Prize Law, and that they should not, therefore, be taken into account.

6. Summary of Cases.

The conflicting claims of the two Governments can be conveniently summarised as follows:—

British Government's Claims.

(i.) That the steamship "Kamerun" and three water-lighters were captured before any French ships arrived in Cameroon waters.

(ii.) That the steamship "Lorne," steamship "Anna Woermann" and other vessels on the barrage were captured on the 10th September, 1914, when H.M.S. "Cumberland" and H.M.S. "Dwarf" passed through, before the arrival of the French.

(iii.) That the capitulation did not apply to the nine big ships and other craft, e.g., "Sokoto," "Fullah," "Hausa," &c., because these were in the river above the limits of the harbour.

French Government's Claims.

(i.) As to these vessels no claim will probably be made by the French.

(ii.) As to ships on the barrage, it is not admitted that passing through the site constitutes an effective capture. An actual taking of possession is necessary.

(iii.) That under the capitulation of Duala all shipping in the harbour and wharves of Duala and Bonaberi were handed over to the naval authorities of the French and British Allies, and that some, if not all, of the big ships and many of the small craft were in the harbour area.

(iv.) That these vessels were captured on the following day by British naval parties, and that no French warship was in sight at the time.

(iv.) That any that were outside the strict limits of the harbour area were captured in the course of joint operations in which the French forces, naval and military, were under the command of General Dobell.

That the fact that British naval forces actually took possession after the capitulation was a fortuitous circumstance, and that the French forces, who were also in Duala at the time, might have done so just as well had not General Dobell detailed the British forces for this particular service.

That the British took possession of shipping surrendered under the capitulation as a matter of convenience only and for purposes of safe custody, and not by right of capture.

(v.) That if Captain Fuller had not been expressly ordered to await the arrival of General Dobell and the French force all the enemy vessels could have been captured by the British naval forces after the 11th September, 1914, when H.M.S. "Dwarf" dealt with the Joss battery, that is to say, before the arrival of the French warship "Bruix" on the 25th September, 1914.

(v.) It will probably not be admitted that this is relevant consideration, inasmuch as the interest of one service as against another service of an ally must of necessity be subordinated to the requirements of the general scheme of operations, and the fact that the navy has been prevented from making a valuable capture by such considerations does not give it any claim to the prizes when taken. Moreover, the success of a cutting-out expedition in an enemy port must necessarily have been hazardous and uncertain.

(vi.) That "Bruix" did not take part in bombardment of Duala on the 27th September, her draught being too great for her to cross the barrage, and she remained 14 miles by direct line and out of sight of Duala.

vi. That "Bruix" was in sight of "Challenger" during the bombardment of Duala; that the capitulation of Duala and the surrender or capture of the craft was the result of a joint operation which entitled the French to share, even if not in sight. (See the "Ferd. Laeisz.")

(vii.) H.M.S. "Challenger" proceeded to Duala on the 27th September and occupied town and Bonaberi.

(vii.) That the town and harbour were surrendered to combined French and English forces.

(viii.) As the French claim has never been admitted, the question of the division of the ships has never been officially considered. It should be noted that although the surrender of the town was to the Allied forces, the shipping was handed over to the naval authorities. The French say this was only for convenience.

(viii.) That the proceeds of the prize should be divided between the two Governments in the proportion which the forces bore to one another, and that land forces should be included in computing the personnel, because Duala surrendered to the Allied forces, which included both naval and military, thereby enabling the ships to be captured. The capitulation was signed by the Allied military officers, General Dobell and Colonel Mages, and not by the naval officers.

The capture of Duala was the result of a purely naval operation, all land forces being at the time at Suellaba base, 14 miles away; and as the army did not contribute, it should not be taken into account. (Dordrecht, 2 C. Rob. 65). General Dobell was in supreme command of the military and naval forces, and the fact that he, and not Captain Fuller, signed the capitulation does not in any way show that the surrender of Duala was not the result of a purely naval operation and of the threat of naval bombardment.

In the alternative that as the vessels passed under the capitulation, they should be divided equally between the French and British Governments irrespective of the relative strengths of the forces.

7. Conclusions.

It is difficult to see how, if an impartial view is taken of these conflicting claims, it is possible to resist the French claim in so far as it is based on the contention that the capitulation of Duala and consequent surrender or seizure of the ships was the result of a joint operation.

It is clear from Captain Fuller's report that the actual capture of the ships at Duala was not effected until after the capitulation on the 27th September, although he considers that he could have seized the German merchant-ships at any time after the "Dwarf" had passed through the wreck barrage on the river and silenced the Joss battery on the 11th September, 1914. Operations were, however, suspended until after the arrival of General Dobell on the 23rd September, 1914, and of the French vessel "Bruix" on the 25th September, 1914. The presence of the French ship with the British squadron was capable of being known to the Germans, because Captain Fuller says, in addition to native spies, they were able, before the surrender of Duala, to keep themselves informed of the movements of vessels at the mouth of the river by a lookout posted at the top of the wireless mast. In the case of the "Island of Trinidad" (5 C. Rob. 92) the question before the Court was as to the right to share in the capture of that island by several ships which had been sent to form part of the besieging squadron. The ships in question were not present at the first overture for the surrender, but arrived before the final agreement and actual signing of the capitulation, though they do not appear to have taken any part in the fighting. At the time the terms of capitulation were agreed upon the ships were in sight, and were held entitled to participate. The "Bruix," though not taking part in the bombardment, did patrol duty with two steamboats, and lent three guns to the "Balbus," which, however, were not used. Her presence was, on Captain Fuller's evidence, probably known to the Germans, and she took some part, though very slight, in the operations. The fact that the "Bruix" could not get in close enough to bombard is not enough to exclude her from sharing, as she was engaged on a joint operation with the British vessel. In the "Harmonie" (3 C. Rob. 318), the smaller ships engaged in a blockade were sent close in because they drew less water. The larger vessels of the outer line, though possibly out of sight on that account, were yet all employed on one common indistinguishable service, the enforcement of the blockade, and were allowed to share in the joint capture made by one of the smaller vessels.

From these authorities it appears to result that the vessels captured at Duala after the arrival of the French warship "Bruix" on the 25th September were a joint capture, though the credit for the capture and the capitulation of Duala were due very largely, if not wholly, to the ships under Captain Fuller's command. The arrival of the French warship "Surprise" at Libreville, 180 miles distant, was not part of the expedition against Duala, and was not of sufficiently material assistance in the capture of Duala to entitle her to share as joint captor: she had been sent off on a separate mission (see "The Island of Trinidad," 5 C. Rob., at p. 96).

With regard to the several classes of vessels captured, it is probable that no claim will be made to the vessels admittedly captured before the arrival of the French ships, i.e., steamship "Kamerun" and three water-lighters cut out at Victoria.

The ships and craft found in harbour and above the town are covered by the conclusion reached above, and the French are entitled to share in these.

The only remaining category are the ships on the wreck barrage. With regard to these there is a difference of opinion as to whether there was an effective capture in law when H.M.S. "Dwarf" passed through the barrage on the 11th September, that is to say, before the French ship arrived.

The British claim that there was, because they were in command of the site.

Captain Fuller states that H.M.S. "Dwarf" passed through the barrage on the 10th September, 1914, and on the following day the vessels on the barrage were boarded and examined by craft belonging to the squadron to ascertain if anyone was on board. The vessels were found to be deserted. Although they were sunk the living spaces on the upper deck of some of the craft were clear of high water, and were used as necessary in connection with the work of clearing a passage through the barrage.

The French cruiser "Bruix" did not arrive in the Cameroons waters until the 25th September, 1914.

The French claim is that there must be some actual taking possession of the vessels cum animo capiendi. The English Prize Court has had to consider an analogous question as to the moment of capture on two occasions, viz., in the "Lokken" (34 T.L.R. 594) and the "Pellworm" and three other German ships. ("Lloyd's List," 31st July, 1919.) In the former case Sir Samuel Evans treated the material time as the moment when the British warship started the operation of closing on the enemy and ordering her to stop, and the stopping of her engines; in the "Pellworm," Lord Sterndale held that the act of capture was not complete until the boarding party took possession. The older cases are not conclusive, nor is there a complete unanimity amongst text-writers, but if a conclusion may be drawn from this evidence it appears to be necessary for some effective control to be exercised by the captor to complete the capture of the prize ("The Edward and Mary," 3 C. Rob. 306; "The Resolution," 6 C. Rob. 21; "The Hercules," 2 Dod. at p. 363; "The Grotius," 9 Cranch 370; Hall, "International Law," 7th Ed., p. 484; Phillimore, iii, S. 318; H. Taylor, "International Law," p. 570).

There would seem, however, to be a strong argumentative case to be made in support of the contention that the vessel came under effective control as soon as the British ships were in command of the site of the barrage. Those which were only partly submerged could have been boarded, and all were under the guns of the British ships.

Assuming that the question of joint capture is decided in favour of the French there is the further question as to the proportion in which the prizes are to be divided, and whether the military forces operating are entitled to share.

It is admitted by the French that the Anglo-French Convention is not retrospective, and does not apply to surrender to naval and military forces, but it is contended that it would be equitable for it so to be applied, and for the net proceeds of the prizes or the prizes themselves to be divided into as many shares as there were men, naval and military, associated for the common enterprise. To this contention it is objected by the British that the capture of Duala was a purely naval operation, all the military forces being some 14 miles away at the time of the capitulation. To this it is replied by the French that all forces, naval and military, were under the command of General Dobell and all co-operating, that all were associated for a common purpose, producing "encouragement to the friend and intimidation to the enemy." (L'Etoile, 2 Dod. at p. 110); that being in sight was not necessary ("The Forsigheld," 3 C. Rob. 311; "Guillaume Tell," Edwards 6; "Empress," 1 Dods., 368.) The cases just cited, however, are all cases of joint capture by ships, and the principles applicable to ships engaged in a common expedition or operation have not been applied to joint operations by naval and military forces. The principles applicable to the latter are those laid down in "The Dordrecht" (2 C. Rob. at p. 65). "The services which I should require must be such as were directly or materially influencing the capture, so that the capture could not have been made without such assistance, or, at least, not certainly, and without great hazard."

Admiral Sir Henry Jackson points out that the assistance of the land forces must be taken into account in estimating the operations at Duala from the military point of view. He says that the surrender at Duala without severe fighting, and consequently with no considerable losses, was the result of careful naval preparations by the British and joint operations carried out by suitable forces of the Allies. By English Prize Law, however, in a claim on the part of the army to share in a capture made by the fleet, the onus probandi lies on them to show that there was actual co-operation and assistance on their part, but where there is preconcerted action it is not of so much consequence that the services should be material, because then each party performs the service that was previously assigned to him, and whether that is important or not, it is not so material ("The Dordrecht," 2 C. Rob., 65). Consequently, although the military aspect of the operations must be borne in mind in considering the claims of the French to equal participation in the capture of the prizes at Duala, it does not seem that from a strictly legal point of view the land forces took any direct part in the operations leading to the capitulation and the capture of the ships such as would entitle them to share in the prizes.

The opinion of Admiral Sir Henry Jackson, a most distinguished strategist, cited above, is of great importance, and when, as in this case, the question is one between Allies, and not between British naval and military forces, it may possibly be deemed to be of greater value than a strict application of the legal decisions in former cases in British Prize Courts on disputes between purely British forces, but a concession made on such grounds alone would be one of policy and not of law.

In this connection it may be mentioned that the Naval Prize Tribunal has already held, although without formal argument, that the British military forces engaged in the Cameroons expedition are not entitled to share in these prizes, and, if this decision be correct, it would seem logically to follow that the French military forces cannot be entitled to share either.

The true conclusion of this aspect of the matter seems therefore to be that all the ships and craft, other than those actually captured before the arrival of the French ship "Bruix" (those on the wreck barrage being doubtful), should be divided in proportion to the relative strengths of the British and French naval forces in the Cameroon River at 12 noon on the 27th September, 1914, the time and day of the capitulation of Duala.

Department of His Majesty's Procurator-General,
Storey's Gate, St. James's Park, S.W. 1,
March 10, 1920.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Dr. A. Pearce Higgins.

The claims fall under four classes: (1) those captured before the arrival of the French ships, (2) those captured on the barrage, (3) and (4) those captured in Duala and above it.

(1) We are of opinion that all the enemy vessels captured before the arrival of the "Bruix" were British naval captures, and that (2) the British naval forces took effective possession on the enemy vessels sunk on the barrage before the arrival of the French cruiser.

(3) and (4). We are of opinion that the vessels and craft taken in the river off Duala and Bonaberi, as well as those captured above Duala, after the capitulation of Duala, were captured by the British and French naval forces jointly.

We think, therefore, that an offer may well be made to France to divide with her all vessels, except the craft captured before the arrival of the "Bruix," in proportion to the relative strengths of the British and French naval forces at the time of the capitulation, i.e., the 27th September, 1914, and that if this offer be not accepted, the whole matter should be left in the hands of the President of the Prize Court.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
A. PEARCE HIGGINS.

Law Officers' Department,
July 8, 1920.

[T 849]

No. 1st.

[Procurator-General.]

[File 13/1921.]

[December 31, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers and Dr. Pearce Higgins.

Herewith is sent: Print of the Judgment of the Prize Court in the case of the steamship "Marie Leonhardt."

Detained
Austrian Ships:
Applicability of
Sixth
Hague
Convention.

UPON the outbreak of war between this country and Austria on the 12th August 1914, there were in the ports of the United Kingdom and the Dominions a number of Austrian and Hungarian ships.

It will be remembered that in the case of Germany, Hague Convention No. 6 according days of grace was not brought into force, but in the case of Austria matters took a different course.

On the 4th August, 1914, immediately after the outbreak of war with Germany, a Proclamation, which is to be found in the "Manual of Emergency Legislation," vol. I, p. 138, was issued stating that, in the event of one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State being satisfied by information reaching him not later than midnight on Friday, the 7th August, the German Government would accord to British ships in their ports treatment not less favourable than that provided by Articles 3 to 7 of that Order, then Articles 3 to 8 of that Order were to come into force. Articles 3 to 8 in question permitted the departure, up till a date specified, of enemy merchant ships which—

1. At the outbreak of war were in any port to which the Order applied; or
2. Cleared from their last port before the declaration of war and after the outbreak of hostilities entered a port to which the Order applied without knowledge of the war.

Paragraph 6 of the Order provides as follows:—

"The privileges accorded by Articles 3 and 4 are not to extend to cable ships or other seagoing ships designed to carry oil fuel, or to ships whose tonnage exceeds 5,000 tons gross or whose speed was 14 knots or over . . . Such vessels will remain liable on adjudication by the Prize Court to detention during the war or to requisition in accordance, in either case, with the Convention aforesaid."

When Austria-Hungary came into the war a further Proclamation was issued, which will be found in the same volume of the "Manual of Emergency Legislation" at page 97, which, by paragraph 3, applied the Proclamation of the 4th August, 1914, with the necessary alterations in names and dates, to Austro-Hungarian ships and cargoes.

Austria agreed within the time limited by the Proclamation to accord reciprocity to British ships in their ports, and, so far as Austria-Hungary was concerned, the Proclamation of the 4th August was accordingly brought into force. (See "Times" "Documentary History of the War," vol. III, pp. 89 and 90.) In pursuance of this arrangement days of grace were accorded to Austro-Hungarian ships, and the great majority of them left the British ports in which they found themselves and proceeded under passes to neutral ports.

Seven vessels were, however, unable to leave.

In the United Kingdom there were three—

1. Steamship "Tergeste," 4,272 tons gross. Owners: Premuda & Co., Trieste. Port of Registry: Trieste.
2. Steamship "Sabbia," 2,752 tons gross. Owners: Navigazione Libera Triestina Società in Azione, Trieste. Port of Registry: Trieste.
3. Steamship "Karpas," 5,056 tons. Owners: Hungarian Levant Steamship Company, Budapest. Port of Registry: Fiume.

In overseas ports there were four—

4. Steamship "Erzherzog Franz Ferdinand," 6,105 tons. Owners: Lloyd-Austriaco. Port of Registry: Trieste.
5. Steamship "Perla," 5,355 tons. Owners: Navigazione Libera Triestina Società in Azione. Port of Registry: Trieste.
6. Steamship "Turul," 3,530 tons. Owners: Hungarian Levant Steamship Company. Port of Registry: Fiume.
7. Steamship "Koerber," 5,440 tons. Owners: Lloyd-Austriaco. Port of Registry: Trieste.

The steamships "Tergeste," "Sabbia" and "Turul," being under 5,000 tons, were entitled to depart, but were prevented from leaving by circumstances beyond their control. The steamships "Tergeste" and "Sabbia" were under arrest in civil proceedings, and the steamship "Turul" was under arrest as a prize to another port. The steamships "Karpas," "Erzherzog Franz Ferdinand," "Perla" and "Koerber" were of a tonnage exceeding 5,000 tons, and were not permitted to leave, in accordance with paragraph 6 of the Proclamation.

The position of Austrian ships will be seen, therefore, to differ from that of German ships, inasmuch as the provisions of The Hague Convention were not applied in the case of German ships, but were, to a limited extent, applied in the case of Austrian ships.

It is important here to observe that the Proclamation of the 4th August, 1914, does not in terms say that Hague Convention No. 6 shall apply, subject to the exceptions specified in paragraph 6.

In form it is a substantive agreement between the two countries that certain specified classes of vessels, subject to the exceptions in paragraph 6, shall be allowed to depart within a fixed time after complying with certain requirements as to discharging cargo, &c.

[6498]

E 2

Nothing is said in the Proclamation with regard to vessels falling within the privileged classes, which, owing to circumstances beyond their control, may have been unable to leave within the period contemplated.

Article 2 of Hague Convention No. 6 provides expressly that such vessels may not be confiscated, but may merely be detained, and had there been an application in terms of the Convention (subject to the exceptions in paragraph 6 of the Proclamation) it would have followed that these vessels would have been covered by this Article.

The effect, however, of having made a substantive agreement by Proclamation without applying the Convention or incorporating a provision analogous to Article 2 thereof, is apparently that the British Government undertook to permit the departure of Austrian ships which were able to go, but that vessels which were unable to avail themselves of the right to go and remained in British ports did not derive immunity from any other paragraph of the Proclamation, and are in the position of any other unprotected enemy ships in our ports, and liable to condemnation under the Rule in Lindo v. Rodney (steamship "Marie Leonhardt").

It may well be that the omission to make any provision in the Proclamation for the case of these ships was due to an oversight; but the fact remains that there is no such provision in the Proclamation, and the question for decision is whether or not the legal consequence of the omission is to render the three ships under 5,000 tons liable to condemnation.

In the letter from the Foreign Office of the 12th November, it is suggested that it might be argued that the Convention became applicable to vessels which were unable to leave during the days of grace. If the effect of the Proclamation is to bring the whole Convention into force, there may be some grounds for the argument; but there do not appear to be in the Proclamation any words which have this effect.

It may perhaps be added that if in construing this Order in Council the precedent of the Order in Council issued at the beginning of the Crimean war is followed, reference should be made to Dr. Lushington's rule, which was laid down in the "Fenix" (2 E.P.C. 238) and the "Argo" (ibid. 294). In the former case he said: "I am perfectly free to confess that I think it to be quite clear that whenever the Government of Great Britain or of any other country, by a public document in the nature of an Order in Council, relaxes the severity of belligerent rights, it ought to be taken in favour of the party for whom it is intended, and that a liberal construction should be put upon it." In the "Argo," after referring to his judgment in the "Fenix," he added: "I am of opinion that all relaxation of belligerent rights emanating from the Government of this country, and declared in authentic documents, should receive as liberal a construction as the terms of those documents will admit of; but in so doing I must be forewarned and instructed of the words which are used, and abstain from giving an interpretation which cannot be borne out by the instrument to be construed."

The Order in Council of the 29th March, 1854, allowed a Russian vessel which had sailed prior to the date of the Order from any foreign port bound to a port in His Majesty's Dominions to enter such port and to discharge her cargo, and "afterwards forthwith to depart without molestation" (2 E.P.C., p. 239, note). In the "Odessa" (ibid., p. 469), Dr. Lushington said: "I think the word 'forthwith' ought not to be pressed with too much severity against a vessel so circumstanced. I think so for this reason: circumstances might intervene which would render it difficult, perhaps impossible, to discharge the cargo with great expedition, or to leave the port. She might have had to make repairs, or something of the kind."

These decisions do not, however, seem to go beyond laying down the rule that where use is made of an ambiguous word such as "forthwith," a liberal interpretation should be put upon it. They do not go so far as to say that concessions should be extended to classes of ships which either by design or accident have been excluded or omitted from the Proclamation. Such an interpretation of the powers of the Court would be to invest the Court with powers and functions which can be exercised by the executive authority alone.

Reference should, however, be made to the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the "Turul," reported in 3 B and C. P.C., p. 356, because there are passages in it which suggest that the Privy Council acted on the view that the effect of the Proclamation was to bring Article 2 of the Convention into force, e.g., at p. 359:—

"Now, the question is whether this ship, by reason of circumstances beyond its control, was unable to leave the enemy port within the time limited by the previous Article within the terms of Article 2 of the Convention. If that was so, then she could not be confiscated and the Order made by the Court below was right."

The facts of the "Turul" were special, because she was prevented from leaving by the action of the officers of the Crown itself. As they were acting under a misapprehension, it would have been wrong to have condemned the ship in consequence, and it may well be that in the case of this ship a decree of condemnation cannot now be asked for.

There is, however, a further passage in the same judgment, p. 360, which assists the Crown against the other two vessels under 5,000 tons:—

"It is to be remembered that a Proclamation of this kind may operate in favour of the belligerent who publishes it, since it may be used to diminish by limiting them the advantages which the Convention was intended to secure to the enemy ship, for by its publication the belligerent Power . . . determines also some, at any rate, of the terms upon which the exercise of the privilege is to be enjoyed."

This, it is submitted, was done in the case of the "P. Tergeste" and "Sabbia" by the omission of any reference in the Proclamation to vessels prevented from leaving by circumstances beyond their control.

The four ships exceeding 5,000 tons appear to be in a more favourable position, inasmuch as they are dealt with by paragraph 6 of the Proclamation, which provides that:—

"Such vessels (i.e., vessels exceeding 5,000 tons, &c.) will remain liable on adjudication by the Prize Court to detention during the period of the war, or to requisition in accordance in either case with the Convention aforesaid."

The last words must presumably be taken to refer to Article 2 of the Convention, which provides that vessels which were not allowed to leave the enemy port may not be confiscated, but may merely be detained on condition of being restored after the war.

If it be the correct view that paragraph 6 of the Proclamation incorporates by reference Article 2 of the Convention in so far as relates to ships exceeding 5,000 tons, it would seem that these vessels are protected from condemnation if the Proclamation is, in the events which have happened, binding on the Crown.

It will be remembered that in the case of the steamship "Marie Leonhardt," a detained German ship, the Crown asked for condemnation on the ground that Hague Convention No. 6 did not apply, or, in the alternative, that, if it did apply, Germany had disentitled herself from claiming the benefit of it by reason of the breaches of the laws of war committed by her naval and military forces. The judgment of the President proceeded solely upon the ground that The Hague Convention had not been put into force by the British and German Governments and the vessels were, therefore, in the same position as enemy vessels in the days when Lord Mansfield decided the case of Lindo v. Rodney:—

"Upon the declaration of war or hostilities all the ships of the enemy are detained in our ports to be confiscated as the property of the enemy if no reciprocal agreement is made."

It was not necessary therefore for the President to decide the second point, and the question whether, if The Hague Convention had been applied, the vessels could still be condemned as a measure of reprisal was not determined.

The same question arises for consideration in the case of Austrian and Hungarian vessels, partly by reason of breaches of the laws of war committed by the Austro-Hungarian naval and military forces and partly by reason of their participation or acquiescence in the grave violations of the laws of war committed by Germany.

The evidence with regard to Austria's active participation in major outrages is not voluminous. With regard to submarine warfare, Count Czernin, in his book "In the World War," p. 334, quotes a speech which he delivered on the 11th December, 1918, in the course of which he explained Austria's position upon this subject. If his account is correct, it would appear that Austria acquiesced in the submarine campaign after a considerable struggle against Germany, and because they were unable to act otherwise. In the note addressed by the Austrian Government to the American Government on the 5th March, 1917, it is stated that throughout the entire course of the war Austro-Hungarian warships had not destroyed a single merchant ship without previous warning, though this may have been of a general character (p. 283).

It does not appear to be possible to prove any specific cases in which Austrian submarines sank merchant vessels without warning, and the foundation of the charges under this head would be limited to the assistance rendered to Germany in carrying on their campaign by putting the Austrian ports in the Adriatic at the disposal of German submarines as bases.

The Admiralty state that, beyond rendering this assistance, no specific cases of grave violation of the laws of war at sea are recorded against Austria.

Detailed enquiry has not at present been made as to the extent to which Austrian forces were guilty of breaches of the laws of war on land, and enquiry would probably have to be made of the Italian and Serbian Governments if it were decided to endeavour to obtain condemnation of Austrian ships on such grounds.

It may, however, be observed that the report of the Committee of Enquiry into Breaches of the Laws of War refers to several cases in which the laws of war on land were violated by Austria.

The Treaty of Peace with Austria contains in Annex III to Part VIII, reparations, p. 47, similar provisions to those contained in the Treaty with Germany.

The Austrian Government cede to the Allied Governments the property in all merchant ships and fishing boats belonging to nationals of the former Austrian Empire. It would appear, therefore, that even if certain of the detained Austrian ships are immune from condemnation in the Prize Court, they still fall to be dealt with in accordance with the above-mentioned paragraph of the Treaty of Peace.

The advice of the Law Officers and Counsel is desired upon a further question of an analogous character.

The Austrian steamship "Polnay" was in a British port at the outbreak of war. She was given days of grace and allowed to depart, but she had on board cargo which she was required to discharge before leaving. As the owners did not come forward to claim the cargo it was sold, and, as a matter of convenience, the proceeds were handed over to the Admiralty Marshal and lodged in the Prize Court. Proceedings were not instituted for the condemnation of these proceeds because it was considered at the time that they might prove to be Austrian owners and therefore protected by Article 4 of Hague Convention No. 6, which reads as follows:—

"ARTICLE 4.

"Enemy cargo on board the vessels referred to in Articles 1 and 2 is likewise liable to be detained and restored after the war without indemnity, or to be requisitioned on payment of indemnity with the ship or separately. The same applies in the case of cargo on board the vessels referred to in Article 3."

It has now been ascertained that part of the cargo so discharged and dealt with is German-owned.

As the Law Officers and Counsel are aware, the Sixth Hague Convention was not brought into force between Great Britain and Germany, and detained German ships have recently been condemned. Had the cargo referred to above been in a German ship it is clear that it would have been liable to condemnation.

It is submitted that German cargo in an Austrian ship, which was given days of grace, is liable to condemnation for the same reasons a detained German ship is so liable. The fact that it was in a ship which was given days of grace is immaterial, inasmuch as the Sixth Hague Convention was not applied between Great Britain and Germany and German cargo wherever found in a British port is therefore liable to condemnation in accordance with the principles laid down in the case of Lindo v. Rodney, cited in the "Marie Leonhardt."

The Law Officers are requested to advise if this is a correct construction of the Convention and whether proceedings should now be instituted for the condemnation of the proceeds of sale of the German-owned part of the cargo of this vessel. It is not anticipated that any serious difficulty will arise in proving the seizure, more particularly in view of the fact that the proceeds of sale of the cargo were lodged in the custody of the Marshal of the Prize Court.

The Law Officers and Counsel are requested to advise—

1. Whether by reason of the omission from the Proclamation of the 4th August, 1914, of any reference to vessels which have been unable to leave owing to circumstances beyond their control, the Austro-Hungarian vessels "Sabbia" and "Tergesteia," being under 5,000 tons, are liable to condemnation.

2. Whether for the same reason the steamship "Turul" is liable to condemnation.
3. Whether Austro-Hungarian vessels exceeding 5,000 tons are liable to condemnation.
4. Whether Austro-Hungarian vessels are liable to condemnation as a measure of reprisal by reason of breaches of the laws of war by Austria-Hungary.
5. If any detained Austrian ships are not liable to condemnation, they fall to be dealt with under the Treaty of Peace with Austria.
6. As to the course to be pursued with regard to these vessels.
7. Whether German-owned cargo discharged from an Austrian ship, to which days of grace were allowed, is liable to condemnation.
8. Generally.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Professor A. Pearce Higgins.

1, 2 and 3. In our opinion the Proclamation ("Pulling's Manual," p. 97) applying the Order in Council (ibid., p. 138) must be construed as incorporating the provisions of the recited Hague Convention No. 6, except so far as the provisions of that Convention are superseded by the provisions of the Order in Council. We, therefore, subject to the point raised in question 4, answer the first three questions in the negative.

4. We doubt whether the evidence in the case of Austria is strong enough to justify the Crown in asking the Court to say that she is to be treated as an "outlaw," and not entitled to the benefits afforded by the Convention and Proclamation, and, on the whole, we answer this question in the negative also.

5. Yes, we think so.

6. The vessels should be treated as subject to The Hague Convention and the provisions of the Peace Treaty.

7. Yes.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
A. PEARCE HIGGINS (except as regards 7).

*Law Officers' Department,
December 31, 1920.*

AUSTRIA.

[E 1028]

No. 1^E.

[Board of Trade.]

[File 1027/1921]

[July 8, 1920.]

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. J. Austen-Cartmell.

(Secret.)

WE agree with the view of Mr. Austen-Cartmell. Paragraph 14 of the Annex to Section IV (p. 78 of the treaty) provides that, in the settlement of matters provided for in article 249, in respect of which Section III is not adopted, the provisions of Section III respecting the rate of exchange shall apply unless a notification is made as provided to the contrary. Article 249 (b) (p. 75) provides for the proceeds of the property, &c., and cash assets of nationals of the former Austrian Empire being applied in payment of the debts defined by paragraph 4 of the Annex; and paragraph 4 of the Annex (p. 77) provides for the charging of such property, &c., and assets, with payment of debts owing by Austrian nationals. It follows, in our opinion, that if the debts are charged on the assets in pursuance of this provision, the provisions of Section III as to the rate of exchange apply to such debts, although Section III is not adopted.

This view is supported by the first paragraph of clause 14 of the Annex to Section IV (p. 78), providing that the provisions of article 249 and the Annex apply to debts, Section III regulating only the method of payment.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
J. AUSTEN-CARTMELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
July 8, 1920.*

Austrian
Treaty of Peace:
Rate of exchange for payment of debts.

ANNEX.

Opinion of Mr. Austen-Cartmell.

I AM upon the whole of opinion that if the Clearing Office scheme is not adopted, the provisions contained in article 248 (d) (currency pre-war rate of exchange, &c.), will apply to such debts as would, if the Clearing Office scheme were adopted, be dealt with by the Clearing Office under Section III, that is, debts due under (1) or (2) of article 248 from Austrian nationals who are, on the coming into force of the Treaty, resident within Austrian territory to British nationals who are at the same date resident within British territory. By Austrian nationals and Austrian territory I mean of course, subject to the exceptions indicated in the Treaty, nationals and territory of the former Austrian Empire.

My reasons for the above opinion are shortly as follows:—

By paragraph 14 of the Annex to Section IV it is in effect provided that, if the Clearing Office scheme is not adopted, the provisions of article 248 (d) are (unless excluded by notice as mentioned in paragraph 14 of the Annex to Section IV) to apply in the settlement of matters provided for in article 249. Now one of the matters which is (if the Clearing Office scheme is not adopted) provided for in article 249 is the application, if thought fit, of the property mentioned in (h) (2) thereof "in payment of the claims and debts defined by this article or paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto." I do not find in article 249 itself any reference to debts (as distinguished from claims) except so far as may be contained in the somewhat ambiguous sentence "this property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto" in paragraph (c) of the article. Paragraph 4 of the Annex does, however, refer to debts, power being given to an Allied or Associated State to create the charge therein mentioned for debts owing to the nationals of such State by Austrian nationals. In a case in which the Clearing Office scheme is adopted these debts are in my opinion, speaking generally, limited to debts which can be dealt with by the Clearing Office (see the Law Officers' opinion of April last upon the Treaty of Peace with Germany); and I think that, in a case in which the Clearing Office scheme is not adopted, the same limitation must be put.

I may possibly be permitted to add that, if the Clearing Office scheme is not adopted, there will, in my opinion, be great difficulties in the way of carrying out the provisions of Section IV of the Treaty.

J. AUSTEN-CARTMELL.

Lincoln's Inn, June 23, 1920.

CHINA.

No. 1.

[176191]

(File 143337/1919.)

[January 31, 1920.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 16, 1920.

China (Kashgar) Order in Council, 1920.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to inform you that it is deemed desirable to issue an amending Order in Council providing for the application of British-Indian instead of English law to British subjects within the jurisdiction of his Majesty's consul-general at Kashgar.

A draft of the proposed Order in Council, which has been prepared in this Department in consultation with the India Office, is transmitted herewith, together with a copy of a letter, with enclosures, addressed by the India Office to this Department.

The considerations which render advisable the issue of this Order are set forth in a memorandum, copy of which is enclosed herewith, drawn up by His Majesty's consul-general at Kashgar in 1915. They are based upon the fact that by far the greater number of the persons under the jurisdiction of His Majesty's consul-general are of Asiatic descent and have much in common with India; that His Majesty's consuls-general at Kashgar have hitherto been nominated from among officials in the service of the Government of India, and not from among His Majesty's consular officers in China; and that, in view of the relative proximity of Kashgar to India, it is desirable that the Consular Court should be subordinated to the Indian judicial system rather than to the Supreme Court at Shanghai.

The draft Order follows generally the lines of similar Orders providing for the application of British-Indian law, such as the "Persian Coast and Islands" and the "Bahrein" Orders in Council, but omitting all the provisions relating to maritime jurisdiction. Certain provisions, such as articles 22 to 24, 27, and 46, which are necessitated by the fact that the limits of the Order are within China, have been taken from "The China Order in Council, 1904," and various Orders amending it. The Order will have the effect of having in force in Kashgar the following Orders in Council:—

- "The China (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906."
- "The China (Consular Fees) Order in Council, 1909."
- "The Foreign Jurisdiction (Neutrality) Order in Council, 1904."
- "The Foreign Jurisdiction (Probates) Order in Council, 1908."

I am therefore to request that you will take the draft Order into your consideration and that you will favour Lord Curzon with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper to be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

J. A. C. TILLEY.

List of Papers.

- (A).—Draft "China (Kashgar) Order in Council, 1920."
- (B).—India Office to Foreign Office, October 18, 1919.
- (C).—Memorandum by His Majesty's Consul-General, Kashgar, September 14, 1915.

Report.

We are of opinion that the terms of the draft Order,* which we have initialled, are fit and proper to be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.*Law Officers' Department,
January 31, 1920.*

[F 917]

No. 2.

[File 917/1920]

[June 3, 1920.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 26, 1920.

I AM directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to transmit to you herewith drafts of two Orders in Council, to be entitled respectively "The China Order in Council, 1920," and "The China (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1920," which have been prepared with the object of empowering the Judge of His Majesty's Supreme Court in China to prescribe such fees as he may deem expedient in respect of proceedings taken under "The China and Corea Order in Council, 1904," and of legalising the collection of fees under that Order and under "The China (Consular and Marriage Fees) Order in Council, 1906," at the rate of 10 dollars to the pound sterling.

I am to request that you will take the draft Orders in Council into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Curzon with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper to be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

V. WELLESLEY.

Report.

In our opinion, the drafts of the two Orders in Council,† as initialled by us, are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.*Law Officers' Department,
June 3, 1920.*

* The text of the Order in Council is contained in the "London Gazette" of March 12, 1920 (Confidential No. 11512*).

† The text of the Orders in Council is contained in the "London Gazette" of June 29, 1920 (Confidential Nos. 11551* and 11552* respectively).

1920

34

CHINA.

[A 4795]

No. 3.

[File No. 39/1920.]

[July 14, 1920.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 8, 1920.

"China (Amendment) Order in Council, 1920."

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to transmit to you the accompanying draft of "The China (Amendment) Order in Council, 1920," which has been drawn up with a view to making provision for the taking of precautionary measures against, and, if necessary, the deportation of, seditious British subjects in China.

The Order amends "The China Order in Council, 1904," and repeals article 2 (1) of "The China and Corea (Amendment) Order in Council, 1909," and the whole of "The China (War Powers) Order in Council, 1917," subject to certain reservations specified in article 5. Copies of these enactments are enclosed for convenience of reference.

Article 6 is similar in form to article 170 (1) of the principal Order of 1904, and has been inserted in order to determine the date and manner of the coming into force of the (amended) Order.

A copy of the correspondence relative to the drawing up of this draft Order is enclosed herein, which shows that its terms, as submitted to you, have been concurred in by the India Office, His Majesty's Representative at Peking and His Majesty's Acting Judge at Shanghai.

I have the honour to request that you will take this draft into your consideration and favour Lord Curzon with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper for submission to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval, or whether any, and if so, what, additions or amendments are required.

I have, &c.

H. J. SEYMOUR.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Sir J. N. Jordan (Peking), No. 514, Secret, November 19, 1919 (with enclosure).
- (B.) Foreign Office to India Office, Secret, February 14, 1920.
- (C.) Foreign Office to Sir J. N. Jordan, No. 76, Secret, February 14, 1920.
- (D.) India Office to Foreign Office, Secret, March 5, 1920.
- (E.) Mr. B. F. Alston (Peking), No. 258, Telegraphic, May 15, 1920.
- (F.) Draft Order in Council.
- (G.) "China and Corea Order in Council, 1904."
- (H.) "China and Corea (Amendment) Order in Council, 1909."
- (J.) "China (War Powers) Order in Council, 1917."

Report.

In our opinion the draft Order in Council,* as initialled by us, may properly be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

*Law Officers' Department,
July 14, 1920.*

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

* The text of the Order in Council is contained in the "London Gazette" of September 28, 1920 (Confidential No. 11557*).

CHINA.

35

[T 11699]

No. 4.

[File 8452/1920]

[October 13, 1920.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 30, 1920.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to transmit, for your consideration, the draft of an Order in Council to be entitled "The China (Amendment No. 2) Order in Council, 1920" (Paper (A)). The object of this Order is to confer upon His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court in China all such jurisdiction in matters matrimonial as for the time belongs to the High Court in England. In this connection I am to remind you that article 101 of the China Order in Council, 1904, a copy of which is sent herewith (Paper (B)), at present excepts the jurisdiction relative to dissolution or nullity or jactitation of marriage. I am also to send you herewith copies of a despatch dated the 6th May, 1920 (Paper (C)), from the Acting Judge of the Supreme Court in China, with enclosures, from which you will observe that the effect of the recent decision of the House of Lords in the case of Casdagli v. Casdagli (L.R. 1919, A.C. 145) is to deprive British subjects domiciled in China of access to any existing Tribunal for the purpose of adjusting their matrimonial relationship.

With reference to the learned judge's suggestion that the duties of King's Proctor should be added to those of Crown Advocate, I am to suggest that section 12 (i) of the principal Order authorises the Secretary of State to appoint a person to discharge these functions, and that there seems to be no reason why the same person should not discharge the duties attached to either office.

I am therefore to request that you will take the draft Amendment Order in Council into your consideration, and that you will favour Lord Curzon with your opinion whether its terms are fit and proper to be submitted to the Privy Council for His Majesty's approval.

I have, &c.

CHARLES TUFTON.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Draft "China (Amendment No. 2) Order in Council, 1920."
- (B.) "China and Corea Order in Council, 1904."
- (C.) Judge Skinner Turner (Shanghai), May 6, 1920 (with enclosures).

Report.

In our opinion the draft Order in Council,* as initialled by us, may properly be submitted to the King in Council for His Majesty's approval.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

*Law Officers' Department,
October 13, 1920.*

* The text of the Order in Council is contained in the "London Gazette" of May 20, 1921. (Confidential No. 11593*).

[6498]

F 2

EGYPT.

[T 4923]

No. 5.

[File 3033/1920]

[May 5, 1920.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 21, 1920.

Case of Cimitian v.
Gout and Geary:
Demand for renewal of registration as British subjects.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Lord Curzon of Kedleston, to lay before you the papers noted in the annexed list on the subject of a case recently heard in His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court for Egypt, in which the plaintiff claimed a declaration that he and his wife and child were entitled to the renewal of their registration as British subjects, and for a writ of mandamus against His Majesty's Consul at Cairo commanding him to renew the registration pursuant to "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910" (Paper (F)), and "The Egypt Order in Council, 1915" (Paper (G)).

The facts of the case are set out in the interlocutory judgment delivered by the Court on the 2nd January, 1920 (Paper (B)), and the questions which arise are discussed in a Memorandum by Mr. Malkin, Assistant Legal Adviser to this Department (Paper (C)), and in the letter from this Department to the Colonial Office of the 23rd February, 1920 (Paper (D)), and the reply dated the 20th March, 1920 (Paper (E)). You will observe that the plaintiff contended that he had become a British subject under "The Cyprus Annexation Order in Council of the 5th October, 1914" (Paper (H)), the High Commissioner's Proclamation of the same date (Paper (J)), and a subsequent Proclamation of the 3rd March, 1915 (Paper (K)). The Court found in favour of the plaintiff's contentions, and that he had become a British subject under the 1914 Order in Council (Paper (H)), and the two Proclamations referred to above. The question then arose: What was the effect, if any, on the plaintiff's nationality of "The Cyprus Annexation Amendment Order in Council of the 27th November, 1917" (Paper (L)), which was based on your predecessors' opinion of the 11th April, 1916, a copy of which is enclosed for convenience of reference (Paper (M)). The Judge appears to have thought that this question was one which the Court had no power to decide, and must be referred to the Secretary of State under section 4 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act; and he has accordingly referred by his despatch of the 3rd January, 1920 (Paper (A)), two questions which are set out in the order of the Court of the 2nd January (see Paper (B)).

The exact effect of the two questions put by the Court to the Secretary of State is not very clear, but, as you will observe, the Secretary of State is advised that it is extremely doubtful whether they are such as can properly be put under section 4 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act (see Paper (C)), and his Lordship is desirous of ascertaining your opinion on this point. Should you be of opinion that the questions should not have been so put, and should therefore not be answered, the question arises what steps should be taken, as it appears that the Secretary of State has now power to decline to answer questions put to him under the section above referred to, and the only means of avoiding doing so would appear to be by an appeal to the Privy Council against the order of the Court. Further, you will observe that the Secretary of State for the Colonies is unwilling to accept the finding of the Court as to the nationality of the plaintiff as a correct interpretation of the Proclamations and Orders in Council in question, and it is therefore desirable, if possible, that the finding of the Court on this point should be reviewed by the Privy Council.

Lord Curzon of Kedleston would therefore be grateful if you will take the annexed papers into your consideration and would favour him with your opinion on the following points:—

1. Whether the two questions put to the Secretary of State by the order of the Court dated the 2nd January, 1920, are questions which can properly be put under section 4 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act?
2. If the answer to the first question is in the negative, whether an appeal should be taken to the Privy Council against the order of the Court, or what other steps should be taken?

EGYPT.

3. If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, in what way the questions put should be answered?
4. Whether you are in agreement with the finding of the Court as to the effect of the various Proclamations and Orders in Council on the plaintiff's nationality, and, if not, whether an appeal should be taken to the Privy Council against the finding of the Court that the plaintiff became a British subject under the 1914 Order in Council and the two Proclamations issued thereunder? If such an appeal were brought, it would probably be necessary to go into the question as to the effect on the plaintiff's position of the Order in Council of the 27th November, 1917, but it is presumed that it would be open to the Crown to go into this point on such an appeal, even though the Judge has not given any decision.
5. Whether, in the event of an appeal to be brought on the question of the plaintiff's nationality, you anticipate any difficulty from the point raised in Paper (C) as to the interpretation put by the Court upon article 159 (2) of "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910," an interpretation which, although in this case it operated in favour of the Crown, may be held to be erroneous.

His Lordship would be grateful for any observations of a general nature on the case as to the action to be taken in connection therewith which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

CHARLES TUFTON.

List of Papers.

- (A.) The Acting Judge, Supreme Court for Egypt, to Foreign Office, January 3, 1920.
- (B.) Order and interlocutory judgment (in original for return).
- (C.) Mr. Malkin's Memorandum, February 10, 1920.
- (D.) Foreign Office to Colonial Office, February 23, 1920.
- (E.) Colonial Office to Foreign Office, March 20, 1920.
- (F.) Ottoman Order in Council, 1910.
- (G.) Egypt Order in Council, 1915.
- (H.) Cyprus Annexation Order in Council, 1914.
- (J.) High Commissioner's Proclamation, November 5, 1914.
- (K.) High Commissioner's Proclamation, March 3, 1915.
- (L.) Cyprus Annexation Amendment Order in Council, November 27, 1917.
- (M.) Law Officers' Report, April 11, 1916 (and reference of October 20).

Report.

In our opinion—

1. The two questions put to the Secretary of State are not questions which can properly be put under section 4 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., cap. 37), because (a) the questions are not as to the "existence or extent of any jurisdiction of His Majesty in a foreign country" within the meaning of that section; (b) the questions are not framed "so as properly to raise" any question which arises in the proceedings. The real questions that the Judge desired to be answered seem to be whether the Order in Council of 1917 (Cyprus (Annexation) Amendment Order in Council) has any legal effect in Egypt since the declaration of the protectorate, and whether such Order in Council can deprive a British subject in Egypt of his status as such. The questions put do not raise these points at all. Question 1 could be answered by saying "Of course it has if it is an Order which purports to apply to Egypt," and question 2 by saying "No," but these answers would obviously be of no assistance to the Court.

2. The Secretary of State could properly refuse to answer the questions on the grounds indicated above, but we think that an appeal should be taken to the Privy Council against the Order of the Court so that a ruling may be obtained as to the scope of section 4 and the kind of questions that may properly be put to the Secretary of State.

3. Does not arise.

4. The ruling of the Court as to the effect of the various Proclamations and Orders in Council on the plaintiff's nationality appears to be wrong. We agree with the opinion of the former Law Officers of the 20th October, 1915, that the words "resident in" in the Proclamation of the 3rd March, 1915, should be interpreted as meaning

"who were ordinarily resident in." We think that the appeal to the Privy Council should raise this point, as well as the propriety of the questions put to the Secretary of State. It will be open on such an appeal to go into the question of the effect (if any) of the Order in Council of the 27th November, 1917.

5. The ruling of the Court on this point appears to be wrong, but we do not think that the effect of article 159 (2) of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, is that the registration as a British subject must be continued after it has been discovered that the registrant is not of British nationality. The point, however, is arguable.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
May 5, 1920.

GENERAL.

[211613]

No. 5^A.

[Colonial Office.]

[File 200303/1919]

[January 23, 1920.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, December 30, 1919.

I AM directed to lay before you certain questions which have arisen in connection with such of the former German Colonies as will be administered by the self-governing dominions.

2. Under article 119 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany (enclosure 1) Germany renounces in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all her rights and titles over her oversea possessions, and by the decision of the Supreme Council of the 7th May (enclosure 2) the Mandates for South-West Africa, the Samoan Islands, and the German Pacific Possessions other than the Samoan Islands and Nauru are to be held by the Union of South Africa, New Zealand, and the Commonwealth of Australia respectively.

3. The position of the mandatory under the League of Nations is regulated by article 22 of the Treaty of Peace. Express provision is made in the sixth paragraph of that article in regard to the territories which will be administered under Mandate by the three self-governing dominions mentioned.

4. I am further to invite attention to Part II of the accompanying print (enclosure 3), containing correspondence as to the procedure necessary to enable Dominion Governments legally to exercise powers conferred upon them by the Mandate in their own mandated territory.

I am to enclose (enclosure 4) the ruling by the Speaker of the House of Assembly of the Union of South Africa referred to in Lord Milner's telegram to Lord Buxton of the 8th November (No. 8, in Part II of the print), together with the correspondence as to the validating legislation referred to in the same telegram (enclosures 5 and 6, 7 and 8).

Part I of the print, it will be seen, includes correspondence as to steps required to give international effect to the Mandates. On this point it may be added that it has been suggested that the procedure should be by way of formal conventions, but that it is not yet possible to say whether this procedure will be adopted, and your report is desired irrespective of the question as to what procedure, if any, in this connection will ultimately be adopted.

5. It will be observed from Part II of the printed correspondence that, while His Majesty's Government and the Government of New Zealand are agreed that in respect of the Samoan Islands it would be appropriate to issue an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, General Smuts contends that such a procedure is both unnecessary and undesirable, whether for South-West Africa or Samoa, and further expresses doubt whether the Foreign Jurisdiction Act can be used even for the portion of German East Africa which will be administered by this country under a Mandate in conformity with the fifth paragraph of article 22 of the Treaty of Peace. It may be mentioned that a despatch has been received from the Governor-General of the Union

Mandates.—
Questions connected with such of the former German Colonies as will be administered by the Self-Governing Dominions.

of South Africa, forwarding a request by his Ministers, dated the 16th October, 1919, for the application to South-West Africa of the Royal Proclamation of the 23rd January, 1911, relating to Coinage (enclosure 9), and that there appears to be no existing means of complying with this request except by an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. There is no precedent for conferring on the Parliament of a self-governing dominion power to legislate for the exercise of His Majesty's jurisdiction under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, but there are precedents for conferring such power on a colonial legislature (e.g., the Sierra Leone Protectorate Order in Council, 1913, enclosure 10). The Act passed by the Union Parliament during the recent session with regard to the South-West African Mandate will be found on pp. 3 and 4 of Part II of the printed correspondence.

6. If, in respect of German South-West Africa, some formal act or instrument on the part of His Majesty, other than an Act of the Union Parliament, is necessary in order to enable the Union to make provision for the execution of the Mandate, the conflicting views appear to point to the selection of one of these alternatives:—

- (a.) An Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890; or
- (b.) Some act or instrument emanating from His Majesty in his Government of the Union of South Africa (as suggested by General Smuts).

7. It appears to be necessary to rule out certain alternatives which might perhaps be suggested. The first is that the necessary instrument might take the form of an Order in Council under section 151 of the South Africa Act, 1909, which section provides as follows:—

"151. The King, with the advice of the Privy Council, may, on Addresses from the Houses of Parliament of the Union, transfer to the Union the government of any territories, other than the territories administered by the British South Africa Company, belonging to or under the protection of His Majesty, and inhabited wholly or in part by natives, and upon such transfer the Governor-General in Council may undertake the government of such territory upon the terms and conditions embodied in the schedule to this Act." It is, however, politically impracticable to suggest a procedure which would exclude South-West Africa from the legislative authority of the Union Parliament, and it cannot be contended that South-West Africa will come under His Majesty's protection unless at the same time it is held to be subject to the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. It will be observed from the printed correspondence that the attention of the New Zealand Government has been drawn to the fact that Samoa will not strictly be a British protectorate; and that the Finance Act, 1919, distinguishes between cases "where any territory becomes under His Majesty's protection," and cases where the territory "is a territory in respect of which a Mandate of the League of Nations is exercised by the Government of any part of His Majesty's dominions."

8. The alternative might also be suggested of an Order in Council annexing German South-West Africa and including it in the Union under the Colonial Boundaries Act, 1895; but the objection to this is that, while it is undoubtedly the fact that the Mandate for South-West Africa will amount to practical annexation, in form and law this will not be the case. Article 127 of the Peace Treaty relating to the status of native-inhabitants would be meaningless if the mandatory State were at liberty to issue a formal Act of annexation.

9. With regard to the position of the Commonwealth of Australia in respect of New Guinea, the question involved would appear to be, whether His Majesty will have already placed New Guinea under the authority of the Commonwealth within the meaning of the Constitution, and, if not, whether the formal placing of the territory under the authority of the Commonwealth can be effected under the Constitution Act alone, or must be effected under both that Act and the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. (See cap. VI of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution (63 & 64, Vic. cap. 12). Copies of the Letters Patent of the 18th March, 1902, and the Order in Council of the 30th March, 1914, placing British New Guinea and Norfolk Island, respectively, under the authority of the Commonwealth, are enclosed (enclosures 11 and 12), together with a copy of the Reserved Bill amending the Australian Navigation Act, which, inter alia, provides that territory under the authority of the Commonwealth includes any territory governed by the Commonwealth under a Mandate and a copy of the Order in Council of the 25th November, 1919, declaring His Majesty's assent thereto (enclosures 13 and 14).

GENERAL.

10. I am accordingly to request that you will take into your consideration the general constitutional questions at issue, as set out in this letter, and those involved in particular cases when the time comes for the issue of the appropriate Mandates, and advise on the following points:—

(1.) Whether some formal act or instrument on the part of His Majesty (termed for the sake of convenience in the succeeding questions a "Crown instrument") is necessary in order to enable the Union to make provision for the execution of the Mandate under the Treaty in respect of South-West Africa?

(2.) If no such Crown instrument is necessary, whether the Union Parliament is competent to make provision for the execution of the Mandate, and, if so, whether it derives its authority from the Treaty and/or Mandate, or from what other source?

(3.) If any such Crown instrument is necessary, whether an Act of the Union Parliament assented to by the Governor-General in His Majesty's name and not disallowed by His Majesty would constitute such an instrument, or whether such an Act would be ultra vires as an Act of a Colonial Legislature purporting to extend its own jurisdiction beyond its fixed constitutional limits?

(4.) If the effect of the answers to the three foregoing questions is that some Crown instrument other than an Act of the Union Parliament is necessary, whether that instrument should be—

- (a.) An Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890? or
- (b.) Some Act or instrument emanating from His Majesty in His Dominion of the Union of South Africa (as suggested by General Smuts), and, in the latter event, what should be the nature of that Act or instrument; and, if neither (a) nor (b), what other instrument would be necessary and proper for the desired purpose?

(5.) So far as the answers to the above questions do not cover the cases of Mandates to be issued to Australia and New Zealand, what will be the instruments necessary in connection with these Mandates?

(6.) Whether in the case of German East Africa an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act will be effectual for the purpose in view and, if not, what other form of instrument should be adopted?

I am, &c.

W. D. ELLIS.

List of Papers.

- | | | |
|----------------------------|---|---------------|
| Validating
Legislation. | 1. Treaty of Peace with Germany. | |
| | 2. Decision of Supreme Council, 7th May, 1919. | |
| | 3. Printed correspondence as to Mandates. | |
| | 4. Speaker's Ruling. | |
| | 5. Governor-General's despatch, No. 107, 23rd February, 1917. | (16216/17.) |
| | 6. S. of S. despatch, No. 300, 30th June, 1917. | (28376/17.) |
| | 7. S. of S. despatch, No. 383, 16th August, 1917. | (38177/17.) |
| | 8. Governor-General's despatch, No. 906, 6th December, 1918. | (4316/18-19.) |
| | 9. Governor-General's despatch, No. 835, 24th October, 1919. (Coinage.) | (67114/19.) |
| | 10. Sierra Leone Protectorate Order in Council, 1913. | |
| | 11. British New Guinea Letters Patent, 30th March, 1902. | |
| | 12. Norfolk Island Order in Council, 1914. | |
| | 13. Australian Navigation Bill, 1919. | |
| | 14. Order in Council, 25th November, 1919, assenting to No. 13. | |

Report.

In our opinion:—

1. General Smuts's view is correct, and no Crown instrument is necessary to enable the Union to make provision for the execution of the Mandate under the Treaty in respect of South West Africa.

2. The Union Parliament is competent to make provision for the execution of the Mandate, and it derives its authority from the Treaty and Mandate. His Majesty's assent is sufficiently shown by the execution of the Treaty, to which His Majesty in his Dominion of the Union of South Africa is a party, and by the conferring of the Mandate.

GENERAL.

3. Does not strictly arise. An Act of the Union Parliament assented to by the Governor-General in His Majesty's name and not disallowed by His Majesty is sufficient for the purpose in question.

4. Does not arise.

5. The above answers cover the cases of Mandates to be issued to Australia and New Zealand (these Dominions also being parties to the Treaty) also.

6. Yes; we think that in the case of German East Africa, where the Mandate is to be given to His Majesty in his British Government, an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act will be sufficient and appropriate for the purpose in view.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
January 23, 1920.

[182390]

No. 5ⁿ.

[Admiralty.]

[File 2411/1919]

[February 21, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

HEREWITH:—

- (1.) Copy Convention for the Control of the Trade in Arms and Ammunition and Protocol, signed at Saint-Germain-en-Laye, 10th September, 1919.
- (2.) Copy Admiralty File.

Control of Arms Convention, September 10, 1919.

The preamble of the above-mentioned convention recites that there are accumulations in various parts of the world of considerable quantities of arms and munitions of war, the dispersal of which would constitute a danger to peace and public order; that in certain parts of the world it is necessary to exercise special supervision of the trade in and the possession of arms and ammunition; that the existing treaties and conventions, and particularly the Brussels Act of the 2nd July, 1890, regulating the traffic in arms and ammunition in certain regions, no longer meet present conditions, which require more elaborate provisions applicable to a wider area in Africa and the establishment of a corresponding régime in certain territories in Asia; and that a special supervision of the maritime zone adjacent to certain countries is necessary to ensure the efficacy of the measures adopted by the various Governments, both as regards the importation of arms and ammunition into those countries and the export of such arms and ammunition from their own territory.

The question is raised, therefore, whether legislation either by statute or Order in Council is necessary to enable Great Britain to carry into operation the provisions of the convention.

Previous treaty stipulations regarding the introduction of firearms into certain parts of Africa have had relation to the suppression of the slave trade. Articles 8-14 of the Brussels Act, 1890, are concerned with this subject. To enable the British authorities to carry out the provisions of this treaty, an Order in Council was made on the 9th May, 1892, which provided that the said General Act should be deemed to have been and to be an existing Slave Trade Treaty within the meaning of the Slave Trade Act, 1873 (Statutory Rules and Orders revised to the 31st December, 1903, vol. xi, "Slave Trade," pp. 1-46). Section 29 of the Slave Trade Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vic., cap. 88) is the authority under which the Order in Council was issued, but it expressly provides for the application of the provisions of the statute in relation to the slave trade. The following appear to be the statutes still in force on this subject: 5 Geo. IV, cap. 113; 6 & 7 Vic., cap. 98; 36 & 37 Vic., cap. 59; 36 & 37 Vic., cap. 88; 39 and 40 Vic., cap. 46; 42 & 43 Vic., cap. 38, and 53 & 54 Vic., cap. 27.

The provisions of the Arms Convention of the 10th September, 1919, have a wider object than the mere prevention of the slave trade, and by article 6 the High Contracting Parties undertake, each as far as the territory under its jurisdiction is concerned, to prohibit the importation of arms and ammunition specified in articles 1 and 2 into certain specified areas, and to prevent the importation and exportation in the maritime zone therein defined. The areas include the whole of Africa, excluding Algeria, Libya and the Union of South Africa, Transcaucasia, Persia, Gwadar, the Arabian peninsula and such continental parts of Asia as were included in the Turkish Empire on the 4th August, 1914, and the maritime zone includes the Red Sea, the Gulf of Aden, the Persian Gulf and the Sea of Oman. There is a provision for the issue of special licences for the import of arms and ammunition into these areas. Chapter III of the Convention deals with the supervision on land and Chapter IV with maritime supervision. Chapter V, which contains general provision, by Article 22 provides that the High Contracting Parties who exercise authority over territory within the prohibited areas and zones specified in Article 6 agree to take the measures required for the enforcement of the Convention and in particular for the prosecution and repression of offences against the provisions of the Convention, and to communicate these measures to the Central Office and to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. By Article 25 the provisions of former general international conventions relating to matters dealt with in the Convention are to be considered as abrogated in so far as they are binding between the Powers who are parties to the Convention.

[6498]

G

It is suggested that the legislation under the Slave Trade Acts is not applicable to the traffic in arms contemplated by the new Convention, and that further legislation will be necessary to enable the British authorities within the areas and zones under British jurisdiction to carry out the terms of this Convention, and to subject British subjects to the international jurisdiction created, as well as to provide for the prosecution of offences against the provisions of the Convention (see Article 22).

Section 43 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, provides that the importation of arms, ammunition, gunpowder or any other goods may be prohibited by proclamation or Order in Council, and by the Exportation of Arms Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vic., cap. 44), power is given to His Majesty by proclamation to prohibit the exportation of arms or naval stores (see Highmore's "Customs Law," pp. 62, 127).

The Law Officers are requested to advise whether any and, if any, what legislation is necessary in order to carry out the provisions of the Convention for the control of the trade in arms and ammunition of the 10th September, 1919.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

We agree that legislation under the Slave Trade Acts is not applicable to the traffic in arms contemplated by the Convention, and the provision of section 43 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vic., cap. 36), applies only to importation into the United Kingdom. The Exportation of Arms Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vic., cap. 44) is confined to cases where the prohibition is judged expedient in order to prevent the arms, &c., from being used against His Majesty's subjects and forces, or against forces engaged in operations in co-operation with His Majesty's forces.

We think that legislation is clearly necessary in order to carry out the provisions of the Convention, and we would suggest a short Act giving His Majesty power to make such Orders in Council as appear to him to be necessary for giving effect to the provisions of the Convention.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
February 21, 1920.

[211613]

No. 5^c.

[Colonial Office.]

[File 200303/1919]

[July 13, 1920.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, May 27, 1920.

I AM directed by Viscount Milner to transmit to you a copy of a despatch from the Governor-General of Canada (dated the 16th February) forwarding an approved Minute of the Privy Council for Canada in which the Canadian Government request His Majesty's Government to submit, for the sanction of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, an amendment to the British North America Acts, declaring generally in

Acts of Canadian Parliament.
Suggested extra-territorial operation.

effect that an enactment of the Parliament of Canada, otherwise intra vires, shall operate, and be deemed to have operated, extraterritorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

2. On the 26th February, 1920, the Minister of Justice gave notice in the House of Commons of Canada of a resolution for an address to the King, praying His Majesty to give his consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, by adding the following subsection to section 91 of that Act:—

"Any enactment of the Parliament of Canada otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament shall operate and be deemed to have operated extraterritorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom."

3. It will be observed that the question was raised primarily with reference to legislation for the control of aerial navigation, especially in connection with the International Air Convention, and that there is no suggestion in the Minute of Council that so far as the Convention is concerned, the necessary powers for carrying out the obligations which it will impose on Canada, if ratified by His Majesty in respect of the Dominion, already exist under section 132 of the British North America Act.

4. The Air Navigation Bill now before Parliament, which will enable effect to be given to the Convention so far as this country and the colonies are concerned, is drawn up on the basis that the Dominions will pass their own legislation for the purpose. I am to enclose in this connection a copy of a letter, dated the 7th January, 1919, from the Minister of Justice to the Prime Minister of Canada, in which Sir R. Borden expressed his concurrence, dealing with an early tentative draft Bill printed in the Report of the Civil Aerial Transport Committee (vide enclosed copy of the Parliamentary Paper, Cd. 9218). It will be seen that strong exception was taken to that draft Bill as not only governing Canadian aircraft when beyond the limits of Canada, but also regulating aircraft even while in or over the territory of the Dominion.

5. Had the request in the Minute of Council been confined to the matter of aerial legislation, Lord Milner would have taken immediate steps to meet the wishes of the Canadian Government, but the very general terms in which the proposed amendment of the British North America Act is expressed appear to him to call for the most careful consideration from both a legal and a constitutional point of view, and he has accordingly sent to the Canadian Government the telegram of which a copy is enclosed.

6. It will be observed that the letter of the Minister of Justice mentioned in paragraph 4 of this letter, while asserting the sole right of the Canadian Parliament to legislate for Canadian aircraft while out of the Canadian jurisdiction, was equally emphatic in asserting the same right in respect of all aircraft within the Dominion. The allusion in the Minute of Council to section 177 of the Army Act (which appears in an adapted form as section 177 of the Air Force Act) suggests, however, that the proposed amendment does not exclude legislation for other parts of the Empire. In any case the terms of the proposed amendment are not such as exclude the possibility of conflicts of law between Canadian legislation and Acts of the Imperial Parliament operating extraterritorially, or the possibility of the Canadian Parliament legislating for other parts of the Empire. So far as the Imperial Parliament and the United Kingdom and the colonies are concerned, this is a matter solely between His Majesty's Government and the Canadian Government, but it is open to grave question whether His Majesty's Government would be justified, so far as the other Dominions are concerned, in assenting on their own responsibility to any arrangement which might derogate from their existing jurisdictions. The difficulty of dealing with the proposal of the Canadian Government is, of course, increased by the fact that it is retrospective in character.

7. The only Dominion Constitution which expressly confers powers to legislate extraterritorially is that of the Commonwealth of Australia. Section 5 of the Commonwealth of Australia Act (63 & 64 Vic., cap. 12) declares that "the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British ships, the Queen's ships of war excepted, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth," and section 51 (X) of the Constitution gives the Commonwealth Parliament power to legislate for "Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits." The powers of Dominion Parliaments generally to legislate for ships outside their territorial limits are those conferred by section 735 and section 736 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894." Lord Milner is consulting the Board of Trade as to the position of British ships, other than those registered in Canada, not engaged in the coasting trade, under the proposal of the Canadian Government, and their views will be communicated to you later. In the meantime, I am to invite attention to the general statements as to the respective provinces of the Imperial and Dominion Parliaments in merchant shipping matters contained in the despatches to the Commonwealth Government of the 29th November, 1907, and the 18th September, 1908 (No. 3 and No. 7 in Cd. 3891 and Cd. 4355, respectively), to the correspondence as to Canadian merchant shipping legislation printed in the accompanying Colonial Office prints (Dominions, No. 9, 18, 43 and 56), and to Resolution XXI of the Imperial Conference of 1911 and the discussions at that Conference on the legislative powers of the dominions in regard to merchant shipping (Cd. 5745, pp. 18, 144-146, 149-153, 406-424). A Consolidating Bill relating to merchant shipping is now under consideration in Canada. A memorandum on the Bill by the Board of Trade recently communicated to the Canadian Government is also enclosed.

[6498]

G 2

8. Other Departments that may be concerned are also being consulted, and their views will be submitted to you when received. In the meantime, Lord Milner would be glad if you would take the matter into consideration and favour him with any observations which you may be good enough to offer on the legal and constitutional problems involved in the proposal put forward by the Canadian Government.

I am, &c.

H. LAMBERT.

List of Papers.

1. Governor-General's despatch, February 16, 1920.
2. Mr. Doherty to Prime Minister of Canada, January 7, 1919.
3. Reports of the Civil Aerial Transport Committee [Cd. 9218].
4. Telegram to the Governor-General, May 6, 1920.
5. Correspondence. Proposed legislation of Australia and New Zealand in regard to merchant shipping [Cd. 3891].
6. Further correspondence. Proposed legislation of Australia and New Zealand in regard to merchant shipping [Cd. 4355].
7. Colonial Office prints (Dominions, Nos. 9, 18, 43, 56).
8. Minutes of Proceedings. Imperial Conference, 1911 [Cd. 5745].
9. Canada Shipping Bill.

Report.

Section 91 of "The British North America Act, 1867," gives the Parliament of Canada power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, and amongst other subjects within this power enumerates the regulation of trade and commerce, navigation and shipping, patents and copyright and criminal law. In Attorney-General for Canada v. Cain (1906) A.C. p. 542, it was held that a Canadian enactment was not necessarily ultra vires because it involved extraterritorial constraint, but no doubt, as a general rule, colonial legislation is ultra vires if it purports to operate extraterritorially. The reasons for this rule are obvious. If it were acknowledged as a general principle that laws of the colonies might have extraterritorial operation, frequent conflicts between the various colonies would almost inevitably arise owing to overlapping and conflicting legislation. (Conflict between Imperial and Colonial legislation is prevented by "The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865" (28 & 29 Vic., cap. 63), any colonial law repugnant to the provisions of any Imperial Act extending to the colony being void to the extent of the repugnancy.)

It is difficult to say what would be held to be the effect of the proposed amendment, having regard to the words "otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament." It might be held that it merely expresses the existing law, as exemplified in Attorney-General for Canada v. Cain (ubi supra). But if it were construed as giving the Canadian Parliament power to legislate extraterritorially generally with regard to all the matters mentioned in the section, provided only that the legislation could be said to concern the peace, order and good government of Canada, it would reverse the fundamental rule that colonial legislation must prima facie relate exclusively to the colony, and might, we think, quite probably lead to conflict with the other self-governing Dominions, who would naturally expect to be placed on the same footing in this respect as Canada.

In our opinion the Government should refuse to assent to the proposed amendment, and should consent to extraterritorial powers being given to colonies only as regards specified subjects, where, for special reasons, it is considered desirable that they should have such powers.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
July 13, 1920.

[W 1264]

No. 5^d.

[Cabinet Office.]

[File 241/1920.]

[October 14, 1920.]

Memorandum by the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers of the Crown.

IN our opinion there are good grounds for apprehending that the establishment of such a Court as is suggested—at all events at the present time—would be contrary to the interests of this country. Under articles 33 and 34 a State can, in case of a dispute, be brought against its will before the Court by another, and as between States which are members of the League the Court is to have jurisdiction, without any special agreement, to determine any case of a legal nature concerning a question in international law. It may, we think, be gravely doubted whether it would be politic for Great Britain in any circumstances to bind herself to refer any disputes which might arise in the future within this very wide jurisdiction to a tribunal of whose impartiality she has no assurance. It may be asked, perhaps, whether it is reasonable to expect impartiality from any permanent international Court. And there are special reasons why this country should not be a party to such an engagement now. It is well known that some neutral nations (e.g., Sweden and Holland) are dissatisfied with our proceedings during the war, and also with some of the decisions of our Prize Courts. If the proposed Court were established it would be open to these and other States to make claims based on such proceedings, and, if they were not settled diplomatically, to carry them before the new Court, with the result that we might, and probably should, have to pay very heavy compensation, and various decisions of the Prize Courts might, in effect, be reversed.

Another serious objection to the setting-up of the Court at the present time is that America is not yet a member of the League of Nations, and would therefore have no influence on the election of the judges. Nor would America or other States outside the League be bound in any way by the rulings of the Court, so that there would be a set of rules of international law growing up which would be binding on some of the Great Powers as well as the smaller States members of the League, but not on the Great Powers and the States outside the League.

Law Officers' Department,
October 14, 1920.

B.
G. H.
E. M. P.

ANNEX.

(Translation.)

Draft Scheme for the Institution of the Permanent Court of International Justice.

ARTICLE 1.

A Permanent Court of International Justice, to which parties shall have direct access, is hereby established, in accordance with article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. This Court shall be in addition to the Court of Arbitration organised by The Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907 and to the special Tribunals of Arbitration to which States are always at liberty to submit their disputes for settlement.

CHAPTER I.—Organisation of the Court.

ARTICLE 2.

The Permanent Court of International Justice shall be composed of a body of independent judges elected, regardless of their nationality, from amongst persons of high moral character, who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices, or are jurisconsults of recognised competence in international law.

GENERAL.

ARTICLE 3.

The Court shall consist of fifteen members: eleven judges and four deputy judges. The number of judges and deputy judges may be hereafter increased by the Assembly, upon the proposal of the Council of the League of Nations, to a total of fifteen judges and six deputy judges.

ARTICLE 4.

The members of the Court shall be elected by the Assembly and the Council from a list of persons nominated by the national groups in the Court of Arbitration, in accordance with the following provisions.

ARTICLE 5.

At least three months before the date of the election, the Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall address a written request to the members of the Court of Arbitration belonging to the States mentioned in the Annex to the Covenant or to the States which shall have joined the League subsequently, inviting them to undertake, by national groups, the nomination of persons in a position to accept the duties of a member of the Court.

No group may nominate more than two persons; the nominees may be of any nationality.

ARTICLE 6.

Before making these nominations each national group is hereby recommended to consult its highest Court of Justice, its Legal Faculties and Schools of Law, and its National Academies and national sections of International Academies devoted to the study of law.

ARTICLE 7.

The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall prepare a list, in alphabetical order, of all the persons thus nominated. These persons only shall be eligible for appointment, except as provided in article 12, paragraph 2.

The Secretary-General shall submit this list to the Assembly and to the Council.

ARTICLE 8.

The Assembly and the Council shall proceed to elect by independent voting first the judges and then the deputy judges.

ARTICLE 9.

At every election the electors shall bear in mind that not only should all the persons appointed as members of the Court possess the qualifications required, but the whole body also should represent the main forms of civilisation and the principal legal systems of the world.

ARTICLE 10.

Those candidates who obtain an absolute majority of votes in the Assembly and the Council shall be considered as elected.

In the event of more than one candidate of the same nationality being elected by the votes of both the Assembly and the Council, the eldest of these only shall be considered as elected.

ARTICLE 11.

If, after the first sitting held for the purpose of the election, one or more seats remain to be filled, a second, and if necessary a third, sitting shall take place.

ARTICLE 12.

If after the third sitting one or more seats still remain unfilled, a joint conference consisting of six members, three appointed by the Assembly and three by the Council, may be formed at any time at the request of either the Assembly or the Council for the purpose of choosing one name for each seat still vacant, to submit to the Assembly and the Council for their respective acceptance.

If the committee is unanimously agreed upon any person who fulfils the required conditions, he may be included in its list, even though he was not included in the list of nominations made by the Court of Arbitration.

If the joint conference is not successful in procuring an election, those members of the Court who have already been appointed shall, within a time limit to be arranged by the Council, proceed to fill the vacant seats by selection from amongst those candidates who have obtained votes either in the Assembly or in the Council.

In the event of an equality of votes amongst the judges, the eldest judge shall have a casting vote.

ARTICLE 13.

The members of the Court shall be elected for nine years.

They may be re-elected.

They shall continue to discharge their duties until their places have been filled. Though replaced, they shall complete any cases which they may have begun.

GENERAL.

ARTICLE 14.

Vacancies which may occur shall be filled by the same method as that laid down for the first election. A member of the Court elected to replace a member the period of whose appointment has not expired will hold the appointment for the remainder of his predecessor's term.

ARTICLE 15.

Deputy judges shall be called upon to sit in the order laid down in a list. This list shall be prepared by the Court, having regard first to the order in time of each election and secondly to age.

ARTICLE 16.

The exercise of any function which belongs to the political direction, national or international, of States by the members of the Court during their terms of office is declared incompatible with their judicial duties.

Any doubt upon this point is settled by the decision of the Court.

ARTICLE 17.

No member of the Court can act as agent, counsel or advocate in any case of an international nature.

No member may participate in the decision of any case in which he has previously taken an active part as agent, counsel or advocate for one of the contesting parties, or as a member of a national or international Court, or of a Commission of Inquiry, or in any other capacity.

Any doubt upon this point is settled by the decision of the Court.

ARTICLE 18.

A member of the Court cannot be dismissed unless, in the unanimous opinion of the other members, he has ceased to fulfil the required conditions.

When this happens a formal notification shall be given to the Secretary-General.

This notification makes the place vacant.

ARTICLE 19.

The members of the Court, when outside their own country, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities of diplomatic representatives.

ARTICLE 20.

Every member of the Court shall, before taking up his duties, make a solemn declaration in open Court that he will exercise his powers impartially and conscientiously.

ARTICLE 21.

The Court shall elect its President and Vice-President for three years: they may be re-elected. It shall appoint its Registrar. The duties of Registrar of the Court shall not be considered incompatible with those of Secretary-General of the Permanent Court of Arbitration.

ARTICLE 22.

The seat of the Court shall be established at The Hague. The President and Registrar shall reside at the seat of the Court.

ARTICLE 23.

A session shall be held every year. Unless otherwise provided by rules of Court, this session shall begin on the 15th June, and shall continue for so long as may be necessary to complete the cases on the list. The President may summon an extraordinary meeting of the Court whenever necessary.

ARTICLE 24.

If, for some special reason, a member of the Court considers that he cannot take part in the decision of a particular case, he shall so inform the President.

If, for some special reason, the President considers that one of the members of the Court should not sit on a particular case, he shall give notice to the member concerned.

In the event of the President and the member not agreeing as to the course to be adopted in any such case, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

ARTICLE 25.

The full Court shall sit, except when it is expressly provided otherwise. If eleven judges cannot be present, deputy judges shall be called upon to sit, in order to make up this number.

If, however, eleven judges are not available, a quorum of nine judges shall suffice to constitute the Court.

GENERAL.

ARTICLE 26.

With a view to the speedy despatch of business the Court shall form, annually, a chamber composed of three judges, who, at the request of the contesting parties, may hear and determine cases by summary procedure.

ARTICLE 27.

The Court shall frame rules for regulating its procedure. In particular, it shall lay down rules for summary procedure.

ARTICLE 28.

Judges of the nationality of each contesting party shall retain their right to sit in the case before the Court.

If the Court includes upon the Bench a judge of the nationality of one of the parties only, the other party may select from among the deputy judges a judge of its nationality, if there be one. If there should not be one, the party may choose a judge, preferably from among those persons who have been nominated as candidates by some national group in the Court of Arbitration.

If the Court includes upon the Bench no judge of the nationality of the contesting parties, each of these may proceed to select or choose a judge as provided in the preceding paragraph.

Should there be several parties in the same interest, they shall, for the purpose of the preceding provisions, be reckoned as one party only.

Judges selected or chosen as laid down in paragraphs 2 and 3 of this article shall fulfil the conditions required by articles 2, 16, 17, 20, 24 of this Statute. They shall take part in the decision on an equal footing with their colleagues.

ARTICLE 29.

The judges shall receive an annual salary, to be determined by the Assembly of the League of Nations upon the proposal of the Council. This salary must not be decreased during the period of a judge's appointment.

The President shall receive a special grant for his period of office, to be fixed in the same way.

Deputy judges shall receive a grant for the actual performance of their duties, to be fixed in the same way.

Travelling expenses incurred in the performance of their duties shall be refunded to judges and deputy judges who do not reside at the seat of the Court.

Grants due to judges selected or chosen as provided in article 28 shall be determined in the same way.

The salary of the Registrar shall be decided by the Council upon the proposal of the Court.

A special regulation shall provide for the pensions to which the judges and Registrar shall be entitled.

ARTICLE 30.

The expenses of the Court shall be borne by the League of Nations, in such a manner as shall be decided by the Assembly upon the proposal of the Council.

CHAPTER II.—Competence of the Court.

ARTICLE 31.

The Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine suits between States.

ARTICLE 32.

The Court shall be open of right to the States mentioned in the Annex to the Covenant, and to such others as shall subsequently enter the League of Nations.

Other States may have access to it.

The conditions under which the Court shall be open of right or accessible to States which are not members of the League of Nations shall be determined by the Council in accordance with article 17 of the Covenant.

ARTICLE 33.

When a dispute has arisen between States, and it has been found impossible to settle it by diplomatic means, and no agreement has been made to choose another jurisdiction, the party complaining may bring the case before the Court. The Court shall, first of all, decide whether the preceding conditions have been complied with; if so, it shall hear and determine the dispute according to the terms and within the limits of the next article.

ARTICLE 34.

Between States which are members of the League of Nations the Court shall have jurisdiction (and this without any special convention giving it jurisdiction) to hear and determine cases of a legal nature concerning—

- (a.) The interpretation of a treaty;
- (b.) Any question of international law;
- (c.) The existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;
- (d.) The nature or extent of reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation;
- (e.) The interpretation of a sentence passed by the Court.

GENERAL.

The Court shall also take cognisance of all disputes of any kind which may be submitted to it by a general or particular convention between the parties.

In the event of a dispute as to whether a certain case comes within any of the categories above mentioned, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

ARTICLE 35.

The Court shall, within the limits of its jurisdiction as defined in article 34, apply in the order following:—

1. International conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognised by the contesting States;
2. International custom as evidence of a general practice, which is accepted as law;
3. The general principles of law recognised by civilised nations;
4. Judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.

ARTICLE 36.

The Court shall give an advisory opinion upon any question or dispute of an international nature referred to it by the Council or Assembly.

When the Court shall give an opinion on a question of an international nature which does not refer to any dispute that may have arisen, it shall appoint a special commission of from three to five members.

When it shall give an opinion upon a question which forms the subject of an existing dispute, it shall do so under the same conditions as if the case had been actually submitted to it for decision.

CHAPTER III.—Procedure.

ARTICLE 37.

The official language of the Court shall be French.

The Court may, at the request of the contesting parties, authorise another language to be used before it.

ARTICLE 38.

A State desiring to have recourse to the Court shall lodge a written application addressed to the Registrar.

The application shall indicate the subject of the dispute, and name the contesting parties.

The Registrar shall forthwith communicate the application to all concerned.

He shall also notify the members of the League of Nations through the Secretary-General.

ARTICLE 39.

If the dispute arises out of an act which has already taken place or which is imminent, the Court shall have the power to suggest, if it considers that circumstances so require, the provisional measures that should be taken to preserve the respective rights of either party.

Pending the final decision, notice of the measures suggested shall forthwith be given to the parties and the Council.

ARTICLE 40.

The parties shall be represented by agents.

They may have counsel or advocates to plead before the Court.

ARTICLE 41.

The procedure shall consist of two parts: written and oral.

ARTICLE 42.

The written proceedings shall consist of the communication to the judges and to the parties of statements of cases, counter-cases and, if necessary, replies; also all papers and documents in support.

These communications shall be made through the Registrar, in the order and within the time fixed by the Court.

A certified copy of every document produced by one party shall be communicated to the other party.

ARTICLE 43.

The oral proceedings shall consist of the hearing by the Court of witnesses, experts, agents, counsel and advocates.

For the service of all notices upon persons other than the agents, counsel and advocates, the Court shall apply direct to the Government of the State upon whose territory the notice has to be served.

The same provision shall apply whenever steps are to be taken to procure evidence on the spot.

ARTICLE 44.

The proceedings shall be under the direction of the President or, in his absence, of the Vice-President; if both are absent, the senior judge shall preside.

GENERAL.

ARTICLE 45.

The hearing in Court shall be public, unless the Court, at the written request of one of the parties, accompanied by a statement of his reasons, shall otherwise decide.

ARTICLE 46.

Minutes shall be made at each hearing and signed by the Registrar and the President. These minutes shall be the only authentic record.

ARTICLE 47.

The Court shall make orders for the conduct of the case, shall decide the form and time in which each party must conclude its arguments, and make all arrangements connected with the taking of evidence.

ARTICLE 48.

The Court may, even before the hearing begins, call upon the agents to produce any document or to supply to the Court any explanations. Any refusal shall be recorded.

ARTICLE 49.

The Court may, at any time, entrust any individual, bureau, commission or other body that it may select with the task of carrying out an enquiry or giving an expert opinion.

ARTICLE 50.

During the hearing in Court the judges may put any questions, considered by them to be necessary, to the witnesses, agents, experts, advocates or counsel. The agents, advocates and counsel shall have the right to ask, through the President, any questions that the Court considers useful.

ARTICLE 51.

After the Court has received the proofs and evidence within the time specified for the purpose, it may refuse to accept any further oral or written evidence that one party may desire to present unless the other side consents.

ARTICLE 52.

Whenever one of the parties shall not appear before the Court or shall fail to defend his case, the other party may call upon the Court to decide in favour of his claim.

The Court must, before doing so, satisfy itself not only that it has jurisdiction in accordance with articles 33 and 34, but also that the claim is supported by substantial evidence and well founded in fact and law.

ARTICLE 53.

When the agents, advocates and counsel, subject to the control of the Court, have presented all the evidence and taken all other steps that they consider advisable, the President shall declare the case closed.

The Court shall withdraw to consider the judgment.

The deliberations of the Court shall take place in private and remain secret.

ARTICLE 54.

All questions shall be decided by a majority of the judges present at the hearing. In the event of an equality of votes, the President or his deputy shall have a casting vote.

ARTICLE 55.

The judgment shall state the reasons on which it is based. It shall contain the names of the judges who have taken part in the decision.

ARTICLE 56.

If the judgment given does not represent, wholly or in part, the unanimous opinion of the judges, the dissenting judges shall be entitled to have the fact of their dissent or reservations mentioned in it. But the reasons in it for their dissent or reservations shall not be expressed in the judgment.

ARTICLE 57.

The judgment shall be signed by the President and by the Registrar. It shall be read in open Court, due notice having been given to the agents.

ARTICLE 58.

The judgment is final and without appeal. In the event of uncertainty as to the meaning or scope of the judgment, the Court shall construe it upon the request of any party.

GENERAL.

ARTICLE 59.

An application for revision of a judgment can be made only when it is based upon the discovery of some new fact, of such a nature as to be a decisive factor, which fact was, when the judgment was given, unknown to the Court and also to the party claiming revision, always provided that such ignorance was not due to negligence.

The proceedings for revision will be opened by a judgment of the Court expressly recording the existence of the new fact, recognising that it has such a character as to lay the case open to revision, and declaring the application admissible on this ground.

The Court may require previous compliance with the terms of the judgment before it admits proceedings in revision.

No application for revision may be made after the lapse of five years from the date of the sentence.

ARTICLE 60.

Should a State consider that it has an interest of a legal nature which may be affected by the decision in the case, it may submit a request to the Court to be permitted to intervene as a third party.

It will be for the Court to decide upon this request.

ARTICLE 61.

Whenever the construction of a convention, in which States other than those concerned in the case are parties, is in question, the Registrar shall notify all such States forthwith.

Every State so notified has the right to intervene in the proceedings; but, if it uses this right, the construction given by the judgment will be as binding upon it as upon the original parties to the dispute.

ARTICLE 62.

Unless otherwise decided by the Court, each party shall bear its own costs.

[W 1548]

No. 6.

[File 279/1920]

[October 29, 1920.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 15, 1920.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to request the favour of your advice on the following question:—

2. One of the items on the agenda for the first meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations, which is to take place in November, is "Preparations required to enable the economic weapon of the League to be used in case of necessity." The reference is, of course, to article 16 of the Covenant, the text of which will be found on p. 3 of Paper A, and you will find on pp. 6 and 7 of the same document the report presented by the Italian representative on the Council of the League at the San Sebastian meeting in August last, where it was decided to place upon the agenda of the first Assembly the consideration of the necessary measures to ensure the application of article 16, and to propose to the Assembly that, as a preliminary measure, an International Blockade Commission should be appointed under the authority of the first Assembly, for the purpose of studying the problem and settling the general plan of action, the organisation of the more permanent machinery required and the principles on which it should work.

3. The Board of Trade, in a letter dated the 6th October (Paper B), has raised the question of the legal powers actually possessed by His Majesty's Government for carrying out the obligations in this connection imposed on this country as a member of the League. The points which arise are fully dealt with in that letter. Those on which it is desired to obtain your advice are (1) whether the necessary action to enable this country to fulfil its obligations under article 16 of the Covenant can be taken by means of Orders in Council under "The Treaty of Peace Act, 1919," and (2) whether, when the circumstances contemplated in article 16 arise, this country is, ipso facto, at war with the Covenant-breaking State, so that the common law and special legislation of this country applicable to a state of war would automatically come into force. I am to draw your attention to the observations of the Secretary-General of the League

[6498]

H 2

Use of Economic Weapon of League of Nations.
(Article 16
of the Covenant.)

(see Paper A, p. 11, paragraph (a)), suggesting that the economic weapon may have to be used in cases arising under articles 11, 13 or 17 of the Covenant. It would appear possible that if the economic weapon is used in a case arising at any rate under article 11 or article 13, the provision in article 16 under which the Covenant-breaking State is deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League might not apply, and that it might consequently be difficult to hold that this country was at war with the State concerned so that the provisions of British municipal law relating to a state of war would apply.

4. I am therefore to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and will favour his Lordship with your opinion as to :—

(1.) Whether "The Treaty of Peace Act, 1919," gives power to impose by Order in Council any prohibition on trade and financial relations and intercourse which may be necessary to give effect to article 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

(2.) Whether, in the event of the circumstances contemplated in article 16 of the Covenant arising, this country is automatically placed in a state of war against the Covenant-breaking State in the sense that the common law against trading with the enemy would apply to relations with that State, and that "The Customs (Exportation Prohibition) Act, 1914," and "The Customs (Exportation Restriction) Act, 1914," would therefore become applicable.

5. Lord Curzon would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

6. It will be necessary that the instructions to be given to the British representatives at the meeting of that Assembly should be settled at an early date, and Lord Curzon would therefore be glad to receive your opinion as soon as possible.

I have, &c.

CHARLES TUFTON.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Memorandum by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations (W 674).
(B.) Board of Trade to Foreign Office, October 6, 1920 (W 699).

Report.

1. In our opinion this question should be answered in the affirmative. The Covenant of the League is part of the Treaty of Peace, and the Act (9 & 10 Geo. V, cap. 33, sec. 1 (i)) empowers His Majesty to make such Orders in Council as appear to him to be necessary for giving effect to any of the provisions of the treaty.

2. No, we do not think that this country is automatically placed in a state of war against the Covenant-breaking State. Some Act of State, such as a Proclamation, is, in our opinion, necessary to place this country in a state of war for legal purposes. But on the issue of a Proclamation, or other formal Act of State, declaring that a state of war exists, the common law relating to trading with the enemy and the statutes mentioned would at once become applicable. (No declaration of war is necessary so far as the offending State and other nations are concerned.)

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
October 29, 1920.

[W 1664]

No 6^A.

[Colonial Office.]

[File 1664/1920]

[November 10, 1920.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, November 2, 1920.

I AM directed by Viscount Milner to acknowledge the receipt of your report of the 13th July* relative to the proposal that the British North America Act should be amended so as to confer powers to legislate extra-territorially on the Parliament of Canada.

Proposed amendment of British North America Act: Powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canadian Parliament.

2. I am now to transmit to you the following further papers :—

- Copy of a despatch from the Governor-General of Canada transmitting the Address of both Houses of the Parliament of Canada, praying the King to submit a measure to Parliament for the purpose in question.
- Copy of a further despatch from the Governor-General enclosing a letter from the Department of External Affairs, explaining, in reply to Lord Milner's telegram of the 6th May, the nature of the proposed amendment as viewed by the Canadian Government.
- The Debates on the Address which took place in the House of Commons of Canada on the 24th June and in the Senate on the 26th June.
- Letters containing the observations of the Foreign Office, Air Ministry, Board of Trade, War Office, Home Office and Admiralty on the proposed amendment of the British North America Act, together with copies of subsequent correspondence with the Foreign Office.

3. Lord Milner would be obliged if you would favour him with any further observations which you may have to offer after considering these papers.

I am, &c.

HENRY LAMBERT.

List of Papers.

- Governor-General of Canada, No. 569, September 8, 1920.
- Governor-General of Canada, Secret, September 1, 1920.
- Extract from Debates in Canadian House of Commons, June 24, 1920.
- Extract from Debates in Canadian Senate, June 26, 1920.
- Foreign Office to Colonial Office, June 10, 1920.
- Colonial Office to Foreign Office, August 13, 1920.
- Foreign Office to Colonial Office, August 20, 1920.
- Air Ministry to Colonial Office, June 23, 1920.
- Board of Trade to Colonial Office, June 28, 1920.
- War Office to Colonial Office, July 20, 1920.
- Home Office to Colonial Office, August 6, 1920.
- Admiralty to Colonial Office, August 19, 1920.

Report.

In our opinion the further papers do not call for any observations by us. These papers do not appear to afford reason for any modification of the views expressed in our report of the 13th July, 1920.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
November 10, 1920.

* See No. 5^C.

1920

54

GENERAL.

[W 3529]

No. 7.

[File 279/1920]

[December 22, 1920.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 30, 1920.

WITH reference to the Foreign Office letter of the 11th December, 1912, and your predecessors' reply of the 17th February, 1913, relative to the draft forms of notification to the International Telegraph Bureau at Berne respecting the suspension or limitation of the transmission of telegrams and radio-telegrams throughout British Possessions and Protectorates, I have the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to state that the Censorship Sub-Committee of the Committee of Imperial Defence have had these forms of notification under consideration.

2. The Committee are of opinion that certain alterations in the text of Notification 1 imposing a general censorship are necessary, and that the Dominion Governments and the Government of India should be asked to issue separate notifications, to be known as Notification 1A, to the International Telegraph Bureau.

3. I am to point out that the different wording in Notification 1 is required, in the opinion of the Sub-Committee, for the following reasons:—

(1.) The omission of a reference to any foreign Government (vide line 10 of the old form of Notification 1) is considered unnecessary owing to the fact that it is undesirable to indicate any special country against which censorship should be established before war is declared. In fact, this procedure was adopted on the 3rd August, 1914.

(2.) So as to apply to all territory under His Britannic Majesty's protection, including territory for which a mandate has been, or will be, granted to His Majesty's Government.

4. In view of these circumstances, it has also been considered necessary slightly to alter the wording of Notification 2 imposing a local censorship.

5. I am to enquire whether you consider that the revised drafts of Notifications 1 and 2 and the draft of Notification 1A are in a proper form for issue by the British Government or Governments concerned under Article 8 of the International Telegraph Convention of St. Petersburg and Article 17 of the International Radio-Telegraph Convention, in the event of the establishment of a general or local censorship of telegrams and radio-telegrams being necessary.

6. In consequence of a revision of the regulations with reference to the use of registered addresses and codes, Notifications 3, 4 and 5 are no longer required.

7. Lord Curzon would be glad to receive your views on this matter at your early convenience, and to learn whether you consider these drafts could be advantageously altered or modified, and, if so, in what respect. His Lordship would also be glad to receive any observations of a general nature which you may care to offer.

8. I am to transmit, for convenience of reference, copies of the correspondence referred to in the first paragraph of this letter, and copies of the Conventions mentioned in paragraph 5.

I have, &c.

G. H. VILLIERS.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Draft Notifications respecting suspension or limitation of telegraph or radio-telegraph services throughout the British Empire.
- (B.) Foreign Office to Law Officers, December 11, 1912 (49798/12).
- (C.) Law Officers to Foreign Office, February 17, 1913 (7380/13).
- (D.) International Telegraph Convention, July 22, 1875; Lisbon Revision, 1908 (Confidential, 9395*).
- (E.) International Radio-telegraph Convention, July 5, 1912 (Treaty, 1483).

Report.

In our opinion the revised drafts of Notifications 1 and 2 and the draft of Notification 1A, as initialled by us, are in a proper form for issue by the British

Suspension,
&c., of telegraph or radio-telegraph services throughout the British Empire;
Draft
Notifications.

GENERAL.

55

Government or Governments concerned under Article 8 of the International Telegraph Convention of St. Petersburg and Article 17 of the International Radio-Telegraph Convention, in the event of the establishment of a general or local censorship of telegrams and radio-telegrams being necessary.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
December 22, 1920.

Annex.

I.—DRAFT NOTIFICATION OF SUSPENSION OF TELEGRAPH AND RADIO-TELEGRAPH SERVICES THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE.

His Britannic Majesty's Government find themselves under the necessity of availing themselves of the power reserved under Article 8 of the International Telegraph Convention and Article 17 of the International Radio-Telegraph Convention to suspend the transmission of telegrams and radio-telegrams to and from or in transit through the United Kingdom, and to and from or in transit through all British territory or territory under His Britannic Majesty's protection save and except such telegrams and radio-telegrams as are on the service of any British Government.

With a view, however, to minimise inconvenience to the public, His Britannic Majesty's Government will, until further notice, and as an act of grace, permit the transmission of such telegrams and radio-telegrams in plain language as foreign Governments or the public choose to send, provided that such telegrams and radio-telegrams are written in English or French, and on the understanding that they are accepted at the sender's risk and subject to censorship by the British authorities; that is, that they may be stopped, delayed or otherwise dealt with in all respects at the discretion of those authorities and without notice to the senders; and that no claims in respect of them, whether for the reimbursement of the sums paid for transmission or otherwise, will be considered by His Majesty's Government in any circumstances whatever. It is, moreover, essential that such telegrams and radio-telegrams should bear the sender's name at the end of the text, otherwise they are liable to be stopped until the name is notified by paid telegram. Registered abbreviated addresses will not be accepted, either as addresses or as names of senders.

Separate notifications are being issued by the Governments of India, Canada, Australia, the Union of South Africa, New Zealand and Newfoundland in respect of territories under their administration.

1 A.—Notification by the Government of India or of a Dominion.

The Government of † notify the International Telegraph Bureau for communication to the Contracting Governments of the International Telegraph Convention that the notification made by His Britannic Majesty's Government with regard to the suspension of the transmission of telegrams and radio-telegrams applies in all respects whatsoever to † and to all territories administered thereby.

II.—DRAFT NOTIFICATION OF LOCAL SUSPENSION OF TELEGRAPH AND RADIO-TELEGRAPH SERVICES.

His Britannic Majesty's Government find themselves under the necessity of availing themselves of the power reserved under Article 8 of the International Telegraph Convention and Article 17 of the International Radio-Telegraph Convention to suspend the transmission of telegrams and radio-telegrams to and from or in transit through † save and except such telegrams and radio-telegrams as are on the service of any British Government.

With a view, however, to minimise inconvenience to the public, His Britannic Majesty's Government will, until further notice, and as an act of grace, permit the transmission of such telegrams and radio-telegrams in plain language as foreign Governments or the public choose to send, provided that such telegrams and radio-telegrams are written in English or French, and on the understanding that such telegrams and radio-telegrams are accepted at the sender's risk, and subject to censorship by the [†] authorities; that is, that they may be stopped, delayed, or otherwise dealt with, in all respects at the discretion of those authorities, and without notice to the senders, and that no claims in respect of them, whether for the reimbursement of the sums paid for transmission or otherwise, will be considered by [†] His Britannic Majesty's Government in any circumstances whatever. It is, moreover, essential that such telegrams and radio-telegrams should bear the sender's name at the end of the text, otherwise they are liable to be stopped until the name is notified by paid telegram. Registered abbreviated addresses will not be accepted, either as addresses or as names of senders.

* Strike out word(s) not applicable.

† Here insert name of the British Government concerned.

‡ Here insert the territories, cables, land lines or wireless installations to be placed under censorship.

NOTE 1.—The term "telegram" in the International Convention is applied to radio-telegraph messages sent from shore to shore, as well as to those sent by cable or land line.

The term radio-telegram in the International Convention is used to denote messages exchanged between ships and the shore.

NOTE 2.—Non-adhering Governments, i.e., those of Canada and Newfoundland, should as a matter of convenience send Notification 1A through His Majesty's Government. Notification 2 should similarly be sent through His Majesty's Government, the first paragraph being modified by the omission of references to the International Telegraph Convention and/or the International Radio-Telegraph Convention.

G. H.
E. M. P.

[W 1308]

No. 7^A.

[File 1308/1921]

[December 24, 1920.]

[Colonial Office.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, December 20, 1920.

Proposed amendment of British North America
Act: Control of Canadian aircraft outside the Dominion.

I AM directed by Viscount Milner to acknowledge the receipt of your further report of the 10th November[†] relative to the proposal that the British North America Act should be amended so as to confer powers to legislate extra-territorially on the Parliament of Canada.

2. The origin of the proposal is the adoption by the Canadian Government of the view that such legislation is required to enable the Dominion to control effectively the proceedings of Canadian aircraft outside Canada. The question whether immediate legislation of the character proposed is required from this standpoint would seem to be affected by two points:—

- (1.) Whether or not, if Canada becomes a party to the International Air Convention, the powers conferred by section 132 of the British North America Act can be regarded as such as to enable the Canadian Parliament to deal with offences against the convention, even if committed outside the limits of the Dominion. The section, which seems to be couched in very wide terms, runs as follows:—

"The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the Empire and such foreign countries."

- (2.) Whether, apart from any question of treaty obligation, the necessary powers for dealing with Canadian offenders against the Canadian laws relating to aviation found within the Canadian jurisdiction, even if the offences have been committed outside Canada, could not be secured by a Canadian law making it an offence to re-enter Canada having committed such an offence, in accordance with the principle of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company v. Kingston (A. C. 1903, p. 471).

* Strike out word(s) not applicable

† Here insert name of the British Government concerned.

‡ See No. 6.

3. Lord Milner would be obliged if you would be so good as to take the above points into your consideration and favour him with your observations thereon.

I am, &c.

G. GRINDLE.

Report.

In our opinion—

- (1.) The powers conferred by section 132 of the British North America Act are sufficient to enable the Canadian Parliament, if Canada becomes a party to the International Air Convention, to deal with offences against the convention by Canadian airmen, even though the offences are committed outside the limits of the Dominion.
- (2.) Yes.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
December 24, 1920.

GERMANY.

[C 4297]

No. 7^B.

[Board of Trade.]

[File 104/1921.]

[February 24, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers, Mr. Austen-Cartmell and Mr. Branson.

COUNSEL'S attention is called to the provisions of article 297 of the Treaty of Peace, and more particularly to paragraphs (f) and (g).

The following is copy of the point submitted to Sir Ellis Cunliffe by Mr. Payne, C.B., the Secretary to the Board, dealing with such points, and of Sir Ellis Cunliffe's opinion thereon.

Restitution
in specie of
British
property in Germany
under article 297
of Treaty of Peace.

(B.T.C. 239.)

Restitution in Specie of British Property in Germany.

Will you kindly advise as to the position on the assumption that the Government decides not to support claims by British nationals to restitution in specie under article 297 (f) of the German treaty, notwithstanding that the wording of 297 (g) may entitle British nationals to restitution on a strict legal interpretation.

H. A. P.

January 18, 1920.

The Solicitor,

See separate memorandum herewith.

R. E. C.

January 27, 1920.

Mr. Payne,

For the Council.

H. A. P.

January 31, 1920.

On this assumption, and subject, of course, to the provisions of section 4, article 297 (a) of the treaty, which arrests uncompleted measures of transfer, the question is, what will the position be if the Government decide not to support claims by British nationals to restitution in specie? Leaving out the question of hostile attitude of any considerable portion of the House of Commons against the attitude that the Government may take up, the position is as follows:—

[6498]

I

Certain sections of the treaty, including those in question, having been set out in the schedule to the Order in Council, dated the 18th day of August, 1919, have full force and effect as law, and that being so it is at once arguable that our nationals have, if they think that that which is enacted as a law of the land has been misinterpreted by the Government or any department of State, the right to seek redress on a point of law in our own Courts. It will be noted that under paragraph 7 of the annexe to article 298 the Allied or Associated Powers have one year in which to specify the property, rights and interests over which they intend to exercise the right provided in article 297, paragraph (f)—the paragraph in question—but the mere fact that they have a year would not prevent pressure being brought upon them at an early stage to give a reply whether or not they consider our nationals are, or are not, debarred under paragraph (g), though they might ask for a reasonable time to consider the point if they decide to treat it merely as a legal one.

There is probably very little precedent to draw upon to determine the rights of a British subject as against his Government in such a case as this, but it is conceivable that one of two courses may be taken. The subject might present a petition of right on the ground that he is suffering, or will suffer, damage under an intimation by the Government that they refuse to recognise his right to restitution in specie. Petitions of right do not lie in respect of wrongful acts, and therefore a petition would have to be rather ingeniously worded to distinguish the complaint from a complaint of a tortious act by the Government. He possibly might simply allege that the Government had misconstrued the meaning of the treaty. A petition of right has, however, to be filed by the Attorney-General, and therefore the matter would have to come before him before the petition could go forward. Alternatively, there is the procedure which has recently grown up (the right to adopt which, I rather understand, the Crown's advisers are inclined to deny), and that is an action against the Attorney-General for a declaration, which in this case would take the form of a declaration that the subject was entitled under paragraph (f), and notwithstanding paragraph (g) to put in a claim for restitution of his property in specie.

The matter might, from another point of view, come before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal or the arbitrator appointed by that tribunal, because, while it does not appear clear that the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal or the arbitrator has any specific authority to deal with claims for restitution of property in specie per se, it is obvious that they can become seized of such claims, because if the person so claiming (as will happen in most cases) alleges that restitution in specie will not restore him the actual value of the property as it existed at the date of transfer or liquidation, he will be able to put in a claim for compensation under paragraph (f), and the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal (or the arbitrator) will at once have to consider how such a claim is to be dealt with, and it is not easy to predict what course could be taken if the tribunal allowed the claim or disallowed it.

I suppose we have also to bear in mind what will be our position with our allies if we put an interpretation on sections of the treaty which they might regard as a breach of faith.

R. E. C.

February 2, 1920.

(B.T.C. 205.)

Having regard to the great importance of these treaty points, it has been decided that the opinion of the Law Officers should be obtained as to the interpretation of article 297 (f) and (g) of the Peace Treaty, and as to what the position of the Government would be as against persons seeking redress (supposing that article 297 (g) does not debar British nationals from seeking restitution) in the event of the Government deciding not to support the claims of the British nationals.

The Law Officers, Mr. Austen-Cartmell and Mr. Branson are requested to advise accordingly.

Opinion.

In our opinion the legislation in the United Kingdom before the signature of the armistice did not prescribe the "general liquidation" of enemy property, rights or interests within the meaning of article 297 (g). But we do not know that there was no such legislation in any part of the Empire—we rather gathered that there was in India—and, if there was, we think that British nationals would be debarred by the clause from seeking restitution in specie under article 297 (f). In any case, we think that in view of paragraph 7 of the annexe following article 298 (which is printed in the schedule to the Treaty of Peace Order in Council, and therefore has force and effect as law, as well as article 297 itself), it is for the British Government to decide whether the right of restitution provided for by article 297 (f) is to be exercised, and in the event of the Government deciding not to support claims of British nationals to restitution in specie, we do not think that there are any legal means by which British nationals could challenge this decision.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
J. AUSTEN-CARTMELL.
G. A. H. BRANSON.

Law Officers' Department,
February 24, 1920.

[C 3463]

No. 7^c.

[Clearing Office
(Enemy Debts).]

[File 3463/1920]

[May 18, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. J. Austen-Cartmell.

THE opinion of counsel is desired on behalf of the Controller of the Clearing Office with regard to the following points, which have arisen upon the Treaty of Peace and "The Treaty of Peace Order, 1919," a copy of which accompanies these instructions:—

British Companies having Branches in Foreign Countries.

A number of cases have arisen of British companies incorporated under the Companies Acts or under special Acts of Parliament, having their head offices in London and having branches in neutral and allied countries at which business is carried on, and which have incurred debts and pecuniary obligations to German nationals. These companies are, for the most part, banks and insurance companies, and their foreign branches are registered under the laws of the countries in which they carry on business, and in certain cases these laws provide for a sum to be deposited with the authorities of that country by way of security. The general control is in the hands of the board of directors in London, but the branches have, prior to the war, in the ordinary course of business, issued policies which have become claims or have otherwise incurred debts, and it may be assumed that, in the ordinary course, payment to the German creditor would have been made at the branch where the policy was issued or the debt incurred, and that, in most cases, there are assets available in the foreign country which would be sufficient to answer any judgment which might be obtained against the branch, assuming successful proceedings to be instituted by the creditor.

In certain cases claims are being made against these branches by German nationals resident in the foreign country, and in other cases by German nationals resident in Germany, and certain of these companies have applied to the Controller for information as to the proper course to be pursued in meeting these claims, and whether they ought to hand over the sum in question to the Controller and defend any proceedings brought against them in the foreign country or whether they have no option, notwithstanding the terms of the Treaty of Peace, but to pay the creditor direct. They have further, notwithstanding the terms in certain cases, informed the Controller that they are advised by their foreign lawyers that, under the laws of the country in question, there would be nothing to prevent the creditor, if payment is refused, from commencing proceedings and obtaining a judgment followed probably by execution.

Counsel is referred to article 296 (1) and (2) of the Treaty, and also to [6498]

British Companies with branches in foreign countries: Position under the Treaty of Peace with Germany and "The Treaty of Peace Order, 1919."

Section 1 (xvi) of "The Treaty of Peace Order, 1919." Under article 296 (1) and (2) it will be noted that Germany and Great Britain agree that all debts payable before the war and due by a British national residing in British territory to a German national residing in German territory, and also the further class of debt referred to in paragraph 2, are to be settled through the Clearing Offices to be established in each of the two countries; and under (a) of that article and paragraph 3 of the Annex to Section III, which follows it, all other modes of recovering such debts are prohibited, and contraventions of these provisions are subject to heavy penalties.

Although the expression "national" is not defined in the Treaty, Section 2 of the Order in Council states that such expression in relation to any State includes (inter alia) any company or corporation incorporated therein according to the law of that State. There can be no doubt that the companies in regard to which the present difficulty arises are incorporated in the United Kingdom according to British law, and therefore the further question arises whether, in regard to the branch at which the debt was incurred, the company can be reasonably said to be residing in British territory. In general, it would appear that the residence and domicile of an incorporated trading company are determined by the situation of its principal place of business (see Dicey, "Conflict of Laws," 2nd edition, p. 162). On the other hand, for the purpose of special statutes, such as those relating to income tax and service of process, it has been frequently held that a company does not necessarily reside where it is registered, but that its residence is in the place where it in fact keeps house and does its real business (see De Beers Consolidated Mines (Limited) v. Howe, 1906, A.C., 455; Egyptian Hotels (Limited) v. Mitchells, 1915, A.C. 1022).

If there is good cause to believe that a foreign court, upon proof of the place of incorporation of the British company and of the nationality and place of residence of the German creditor at the date of ratification of the Treaty, would hold it a good answer to the claim for the British bank to plead article 296 of the Treaty, and to allege that it had already discharged the debt in question by payment to the Controller of the British Clearing Office, then in such cases the company may doubtless be advised to resist the claim, and may be offered an indemnity in case of their failing in the defence; if, on the other hand, the foreign court is likely to hold that, by reason of the situation of the branch, the fact that the debt was incurred abroad and was payable abroad, and the fact that the company has assets abroad sufficient to meet the claim, the company is not, in relation to the branch in question, residing in the United Kingdom, then it would appear to be the better policy for the Controller to abandon the claim to the funds in question.

It should be pointed out that such an abandonment would mean considerable diminution of the fund out of which debts owing to British nationals by German nationals will have to be paid. It does not appear likely that Germany will be in a position to carry out her Treaty obligations with regard to the payment of the monthly balances between the Clearing Offices, and, if the debt owing from the company in question is an enemy debt, or can be looked upon as property, rights or interests within British dominions of a German national at the date when the Treaty comes into force, thus becoming subject to the charge created by Section 1 (xvi) of the Order in Council, it would become available to meet British debts and claims.

In certain cases the debt claimed from the branch is due to a German national residing in the foreign country and not in Germany, and in that case the claim would appear more difficult to meet, for it would not be in the nature of an "enemy debt" within article 296 of the Treaty. If the local situation of the debt (as to which see Dicey, pp. 309 and 310) could be said to be, not the foreign country, but the United Kingdom where the company is incorporated, the property might be said to come within the terms of the charge, but even if this were so, there might be a difficulty in preventing a judgment from being recovered in the foreign country where the debt was incurred.

Counsel will, therefore, please advise the Controller what course the above-mentioned companies should be directed to follow with regard to debts claimed against their foreign branches (a) by German nationals resident in Germany; and (b) by German nationals resident in the country where the branch is established, and whether there would be a reasonable probability of the companies successfully defending proceedings abroad to recover such debts either in case (a) or (b), generally upon the matter.

The Law Officers and Mr. Austen-Cartmell are requested to advise—

1. Whether, in the cases referred to, such claims fall to be dealt with under the Treaty of Peace and the Order in Council.

2. Whether, in the event of proceedings having been instituted in enemy countries against the branch of a British company and payment enforced either against funds deposited or against other assets within the local jurisdiction, those cases can be reopened on the ground that the claims fall to be dealt with under the Treaty of Peace and the Order in Council.
3. Generally upon the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. J. Austen-Cartmell.

1. A company which, having been incorporated in accordance with the laws of the United Kingdom, has its head office and effectively carries on business in the United Kingdom but which also has a branch in a foreign country, resides for the purpose of article 296 (1) et seq. of the Treaty of Peace and Section 1 (ii) of "The Treaty of Peace Order, 1919," within the United Kingdom. Such a company (to which we hereinafter refer as "a British company") cannot, we think, be treated as consisting of two entities of which one resides in the United Kingdom and the other resides in the foreign country. The result is that a debt which is claimed as being due from a foreign branch of a British company is, for the purpose above indicated, a debt which is due from a British national residing within British territory.

If the alleged creditor is a German national residing within German territory, the conditions of article 296 of the Treaty of Peace are satisfied, and the case falls to be dealt with (through the Clearing Offices) under the Treaty of Peace and "The Treaty of Peace Order, 1919," Section 1 (i) et seq.

If the alleged creditor is a German national who does not reside within German territory, the case does not fall to be dealt with through the Clearing Offices, but if by British law the debt is (as in most instances would probably be the case) situate in the United Kingdom, it would technically be subject to the charge created by Section IV of the Treaty Annex, paragraph 4, and Section 1 (xvi) of the Treaty of Peace Order.

2. German nationals who reside within German territory are, as regards the payment of debts due to them from British nationals who reside within British territory, bound by the relative provisions of the Treaty (see Treaty, article 296 (a), and Annex, paragraph 3). We think therefore that though practical difficulties may arise, any case in which the "actor" is a German national residing within German territory, whether the action is brought in a German or other foreign court, whether neutral or not, can be adjusted on the ground suggested in the question. But we think that the questions contained in No. 2 should be separated and further considered.

3. Generally.—In cases in which the debt (being according to British law situate in the United Kingdom) is due to a German national not residing within German territory and payment thereof is exacted in a foreign country (not being German territory), it would be difficult, if not impossible, to enforce the charge created by Section IV of the Treaty Annex, paragraph 4, and Section 1 (xvi) of the Treaty of Peace Order.

Our recent opinion in regard to the surrender value of life policies does not deal with the points now raised. We should add that the above opinion does not deal with those cases (if any) in which the debts have been vested in the Custodian.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
J. AUSTEN-CARTMELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 18, 1920.*

[C 4297]

No. 7^o.

[File 104/1921]

[December 14, 1920.]

[Board of Trade.]

Instructions to settle Case on behalf of the British Government on Arbitration between the British and German Governments.

HEREWITH are sent—

Case for opinion and opinion dated the 24th February, 1920.
Notes relating to the point at issue passing between the British and German Governments.
Translation of extracts from German text-books on trading with the enemy legislation.
Draft case for arbitration.

Restitution
in specie of
British
property in Germany
under article 297
of Treaty of Peace.

A dispute has arisen between the British and German Governments as to the true construction of sub-sections (f) and (g) of article 297 of the Treaty of Peace, and it has been arranged that the question shall be submitted for arbitration to the neutral chairman of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. Each Government is to state its contentions in the form of a case. The cases are to be exchanged, and a month is to be given for reply by each party. A rough draft of the proposed case has been prepared, and is sent herewith for counsel's consideration, and it is believed that, subject to the consideration of the précis of colonial legislation hereinafter referred to, it contains information as to all facts that may be material to the point at issue, which point is really confined to that on which counsel advised on the 24th February, 1920, as to whether the legislative measures taken in the British Empire prescribe the general liquidation of enemy property, rights or interests.

In the further papers which were sent to counsel in February last will be found the text of a reply given to a query raised by the German delegation when the Peace Treaty was under discussion between the Allies and Germany. That reply has not been referred to in the case, as it is really part of the German case as against the British Government.

Enquiry has been made into the German legislation corresponding to "The Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916," and the extracts which are sent herewith show that in fact the German legislation did not require general liquidation. The German legislation was of a permissive character (see p. of the German translations herewith).

The various ordinances and statutes dealing with enemy businesses in the colonies have been inspected, and there is sent herewith a précis of legislation passed in different parts of His Majesty's dominions.

In the case of the colonies specified in the précis, it may be mentioned that legislation on the lines of the Trading with the Enemy Acts passed in the United Kingdom was also passed in those colonies, but it will be for the consideration of counsel whether the proclamations or further legislation passed in those colonies for winding up the trade of alien enemies amounts to "legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights and interests."

It will be noted that in certain cases set out in the précis the winding-up of businesses of alien enemies, &c., has been provided for by proclamation; in other cases legislation has been passed in protected territories or in places which may not form part of His Majesty's dominions; but as the Colonial Office included them in answer to the Board's request to be supplied with colonial legislation dealing with the particular subject matter, it was thought best to include them in the précis for the consideration of counsel.

It may well be that, notwithstanding the headings and short title of the Acts included in the précis, it can be contended that the legislation is of an enabling or permissive character, and therefore does not prescribe the general liquidation of enemy property, rights and interests, but counsel will please consider whether such a contention can validly be put forward.

As regards India, to which reference was made in the opinion of February last, it is interesting to observe that, by Act No. 10 of 1916, being an Act to prohibit or control trading of hostile foreigners and hostile firms and for other purposes, it is provided in section 4 (1) that the Governor-General in Council may make an order either (a) prohibiting any hostile firm from carrying on business except for the purposes and subject to the conditions (if any) specified in the order, and (b) requiring the business of such firm to be wound up, and may, in any case where he has made an order prohibiting or limiting the carrying on of the business at any time if he thinks it expedient, substitute for that order an order requiring the business to be wound up, and many orders were made under section 4 of that Act requiring the businesses of certain firms, &c., set out in schedules to those orders, being wound up.

Counsel will please advise and settle the case for the British Government accordingly.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. G. A. H. Branson.

Having regard to the précis of colonial legislation sent with the papers, we think there are difficulties in establishing that none of the legislative measures in the British Empire goes further than the provisions of sections 1 and 4 of "The Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916." For instance, the law of Jamaica seems to us to go further. What the effect of such legislation in a particular colony may be held to be upon the interpretation to be placed upon 297 (g) is a difficult question. The contention would appear to be open for argument, that legislation prescribing "general liquidation in a limited area does not compel the arbitrator to hold that the restrictive reservation of (g) must come into operation. That clause contemplates legislation prescribing "general liquidation" throughout the territory affected by the restrictive reservation.

It seems necessary, in our opinion—

1. That the whole of the legislation on the subject throughout the Empire should be available to the arbitrator, and that he should also be given for his convenience the précis now with the papers.
2. That the above point should be raised in the case and argued before him.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
G. A. H. BRANSON.

*Law Officers' Department,
December 14, 1920.*

[C 14722]

No. 8.

[File 311/1920]

[December 24, 1920.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 18, 1920.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list in regard to a decision of the Inter-Allied Conference held in London on the 4th December last, relative to certain payments alleged to have been made to the ex-Emperor William. The facts of the case are as follows:—

A report was recently published in the German press to the effect that the following sums had been paid to the ex-Emperor from German sources:—

In January 1919, between 400,000 and 500,000 M.; in August 1919, 1,800,000 M., as arrears from the privy purse; in September 1919, 10,000,000 M. for the purchase of a house at Doorn, in Holland; and, as the sale price to the German Government of two houses in the Wilhelmstrasse, Berlin, a sum of 40,000,000 M. less 2,000,000 M. taxes. The total sum paid was stated in this report to have been over 50,000,000 M.

This report was brought to the notice of the Inter-Allied Conference of Prime Ministers held in London on the 4th December, when the Conference decided to instruct the French, British and Italian representatives at Berlin to ascertain from the German Government whether it corresponded with the facts. If the report proved to be true, the Allied representatives were further instructed to inform the German Government that such payments were a violation of the spirit of the Treaty of Versailles,

Private Property of ex-Emperor
William: position in regard to Article 248
of the Treaty of Versailles.

especially in view of the fact that no payment in respect of reparation had yet been made to the Allied Governments.

3. On receipt of these instructions His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin ascertained that the report was in substance correct. He pointed out, however, that the payment made in August 1919, and the sale price of the two houses in Berlin were money advances made by the Prussian Government out of the private fortune of the ex-Emperor, and that the payments made in January 1919 and the purchase price of the house at Doorn also apparently came out of the ex-Emperor's private resources. In these circumstances, His Majesty's Ambassador enquired whether the protest should still be made.

4. The ground on which the Inter-Allied Conference intended to base their protest to the German Government was presumably that paragraph of Article 248 of the Treaty of Versailles, which reads:—

"Subject to such exceptions as the Reparations Commission may approve, the first charge upon all the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent States shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the present Treaty or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto, or under arrangements concluded between Germany and the Allied and Associated Powers during the armistice or its extensions."

5. I am to request that you will take these papers into consideration and that you will favour Earl Curzon of Kedleston with an opinion on the following points:—

- (1.) Whether the private property of the ex-Emperor can be considered to be a part of the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent States.
- (2.) Whether in that case the recent payments made to the ex-Emperor can be considered to be a breach of Article 248 of the Treaty of Versailles, or whether the proposed protest is justifiable on any other grounds.

6. Earl Curzon would also be grateful to be favoured with any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer upon the papers now submitted for your consideration.

7. Inasmuch as it is obviously important that any representations which it may be thought desirable to address to the German Government should be made as soon as possible, Lord Curzon would be very grateful if he could be favoured with your reply at your earliest convenience.

I have, &c.

LANCELOT OLIPHANT.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Lord D'Abernon's telegram No. 598 of November 26, 1920 (C 12313/1920).
- (B.) To Lord D'Abernon, telegram No. 363 of December 4, 1920 (C 13464/1920).
- (C.) Lord D'Abernon's telegram No. 621 of December 9, 1920 (C 13481/1920).

Report.

In our opinion—

1. The private property of the ex-Kaiser is not part of the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent States.
2. The payments, if they were in fact made out of the ex-Kaiser's private property, cannot be considered a breach of Article 248 of the Treaty; nor can we suggest any other grounds on which the proposed protest can be justified. It could not, we think, be contended that the German Government is bound to confiscate the private fortune of the ex-Kaiser.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
December 24, 1920.

[203244]

No. 8^A.

[Russian Trade Committee.]

[File 142549/1919.]

[June 4, 1920.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

A QUESTION has arisen in connection with the reopening of trading relations with Russia on which the Prime Minister desires to have the views of the Law Officers as quickly as possible.

Foreign trade in Russia is stated by the representatives of the Soviet Government to be entirely in the hands of their Government. In order to restart trading operations, the Soviet Government must export from Russia goods or gold or provide services. In the course of the revolution, property has been nationalised, requisitioned and confiscated, and a considerable number of individuals in countries outside Russia have claims against the Soviet Government or particular authorities thought to be acting in accordance with instructions received from the Soviet Government, as well as against particular persons and firms. Further, both foreign Governments and individuals have claims against Russia in respect of loans, bonds, &c., for which the Czar's Government or earlier revolutionary Governments accepted responsibility.

For the purpose of paying for goods in this country, the Russians may adopt one or more of the following courses:—

- (a.) They may export identifiable goods, e.g., precious stones, gold roubles from the Czar's Treasury, works of art, &c.
- (b.) They may export non-identifiable goods, e.g., timber, grain, flax, &c.
- (c.) They may export either under (a) or (b) or both to neutral countries, and in return therefor the neutral financiers may provide sterling credits in London, either to the order of—
 - (i.) Soviet Government;
 - (ii.) Individual members of the Russian Trade Delegation;
 - (iii.) Centrosoyus Limited (a Limited Company formed by the Russian co-operative organisation some time ago for the purpose of facilitating trading operations with Russian co-operative societies, and registered in Great Britain).
 - (iv.) Any other person or corporation, either specially constituted or otherwise.

The observations of the Law Officers are asked for, in particular, on the following questions:—

1. Whether a British subject having claims could with success initiate litigation to obtain possession of gold or goods sent to this country—
 - (a.) If he could establish that the gold or goods had been his property in Russia at the time of the measures of expropriation;
 - (b.) If he could establish that the gold or goods were the produce of mines or land of which he had been the owner, but which were not produced until after the measures of nationalisation were enforced;
 - (c.) On the ground that, though he had no interest in that particular property, it constituted a fund to which as a claimant he might look for the satisfaction of his claim.
2. Whether a British subject having claims against the Soviet Government or against persons or organisations in Russia could secure by legal process that securities deposited or credits opened in this country by the Soviet Government or its agents should be transferred to himself, or could prevent the use of such securities or credits until other claims are determined by the Courts.

Attachment of Russian gold or goods sent to United Kingdom.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. Assuming that the Soviet Government is to be regarded as the de facto Government of Russia, and that the gold or goods in question have been nationalised, requisitioned or confiscated by or under the authority of that Government, we are of opinion that a British subject could not successfully initiate litigation to obtain possession of gold or goods sent to this country in any of the cases specified. The validity or propriety of the nationalisation, requisitioning or confiscation of the gold or goods, being the executive act of a de facto foreign Government, is not a matter into which the Courts of this country would, in our opinion, have jurisdiction to enquire. The remedy, if any, of persons aggrieved is, we think, exclusively diplomatic and not legal.

2. We think not.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

*Law Officers' Department,
June 4, 1920.*

[N 3274]

No. 9.

[File 822/1920.]

[November 26, 1920.]

Memorandum for the Attorney-General.

Status and privileges of M. L. B.
Krassin,
Russian
Delegate
in United Kingdom.

WHEN the Russian delegation, headed by M. Krassin, was about to arrive in this country for the purpose of negotiating the trade agreement, they requested—and were accorded—the following facilities:—

1. The right to enter and leave England freely.
2. The right of postal, telegraphic and wireless communication, if necessary in cypher, with Moscow, Copenhagen and with "our representatives" in other places.
3. The right to send couriers to and from Russia, Copenhagen and wherever else "our representatives" may be.
4. The right to send "our" despatch bags under seal.

On the 2nd July, 1920, Messrs. Bull and Bull informed the Foreign Office that they had been instructed by M. Krassin with reference to proceedings which had been instituted against him by a Russian consulting engineer in respect of a claim of 4,000*l.* damages for alleged wrongful conversion by the defendant of certain steel ropes and india-rubber belting stated to belong to the plaintiff. They stated that, on the advice of counsel, they proposed entering a conditional appearance only to the writ and to apply to the Court for an order setting aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings as null and void under "The Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1703." Before making this application they asked the Foreign Office to inform them, for the use of the Court, whether or not M. Krassin was a public Minister of the foreign State of Russia authorised and received as such by His Majesty within the meaning of the aforesaid statute. The Foreign Office replied on the 26th July in the following terms:—

"Gentlemen,

"I am directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2nd July relating to the legal status of M. Krassin.

"I am to inform you that M. Krassin is the authorised representative of the Soviet Government, and was received by His Majesty's Government for the purpose of carrying out certain negotiations, and that, for the purpose of facilitating the conduct of these negotiations, the following privileges have been granted to him:—

- "1. The right to enter and leave England freely.
- "2. The right of postal, telegraphic and wireless communication, if necessary in cypher, with Moscow, Copenhagen and Soviet representatives in other places.
- "3. The right to send couriers to and from Russia, Copenhagen, and wherever else the Soviet representatives may be.
- "4. The right to send despatch bags under seal.

"Whether M. Krassin is a public Minister of the foreign State of Russia within the meaning of the Diplomatic Privileges Act of 1703 depends on the interpretation of that statute, and is not a question upon which Lord Curzon feels able to express an opinion; but his Lordship regards M. Krassin as a foreign representative who should, in view of the privileges which have been granted to him for the purpose of the negotiations with which he is charged, be exempt from the processes of the Courts."

On the 23rd September Messrs. H. W. and S. Patey wrote a letter to the Foreign Office in which the following passage occurred:—

"We are aware that diplomatic relations have not been established between His Majesty's Government and the existing Government of Russia, but our client has been authorised by His Majesty's Government to enter into commercial relations with the members of a delegation who claim to represent, in this country, an existing State Government in Russia.

"What we are anxious to know is whether that claim is one which is assented to by His Majesty's Government, or whether the members of this delegation are regarded by His Majesty's Government as a group of individuals possessing no political character?"

To this the Foreign Office replied on the 5th October as follows:—

"Sir,

"I am directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22nd September, and to inform you that His Majesty's Government assent to the claim of the delegation to represent in this country a State Government of Russia."

On the 19th November Messrs. Linklaters and Paines wrote a letter to the Foreign Office of which the material portions for the present purpose are as follows:—

"We called at the Foreign Office to see you on behalf of our clients, Aksionairnoye Obschestvo dlia Mechanicheskoy Obrabotky Diereva A. M. Luther, a company registered in Russia in the year 1898, and, as subsequently suggested by you, we are writing to inform you of the information we require.

"The position is that our clients, practically the whole of whose capital is held by Venesta (Limited), an English company, have commenced proceedings here against the firm of James Sagor and Co. with reference to certain shipments of plywood, which the plaintiffs allege were seized by the Russian Soviet Government at the plaintiffs' factory and wrongfully sold to the defendants, who have imported the same into this country.

"According to an affidavit sworn by Mr. Sagor, the sole partner in the defendant firm, it appears that certain enquiries have been made of His Majesty's Foreign Office as to the status of the Russian delegation now in this country, and that a reply was received to the effect that His Majesty's Government assent to the claim of the said delegation to represent, in this country, a State Government of Russia.

"The affidavit further alleges that the deponent believes His Majesty's Foreign Office issued a certificate to the effect that a M. L. B. Krassin was recognised by His Majesty's Government as possessing the character of a diplomatic representative, and that the said L. B. Krassin was thereupon treated by the Court here as entitled to immunity from process.

"We shall be much obliged for any information with regard to the above two allegations and to know the circumstances under which the information, if supplied at all, was supplied to Mr. Sagor or his solicitor.

"Generally, the plaintiffs require assistance to enable them to obtain possession of the goods, which they contend are their property, which have been wrongfully seized by the Soviet Government, and which the Russian delegation here have purported to contract to sell to the defendants.

"The matter is a very serious one and of the greatest importance to Venesta (Limited) and also to traders in this country, and we should be grateful for any assistance that you can afford us in the matter."

To this letter it was proposed to reply by repeating the substance of the statements made in the letters quoted above to Messrs. Bull and Bull and Messrs. Patey. It has, however, been suggested that the statements made to Messrs. Bull and Bull went too far, since M. Krassin is in a different position from that of any ordinary diplomatic agent inasmuch as he is also engaged in trade. It is suggested that any exemption from the processes of the British Courts accorded to M. Krassin might be limited to matters covered by his diplomatic activity and not to his transactions as a trader. Although no such distinction is made by the British Courts in the case of duly accredited diplomatic agents (Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (1859), 2 E. & E. 94), the peculiar position of M. Krassin may be held to justify such a distinction.

The Secretary of State would be very grateful for the Attorney-General's observations on the position generally, and as to the reply to be returned to Messrs. Linklaters and Paines in particular.

November 26, 1920.

Report of Attorney-General.

As I understand that an immediate opinion is desired in this matter, I am writing at once. It appears to me that, natural as the distinction may be thought to be between the diplomatic duties and the commercial adventures (if any) of an Ambassador, it is very difficult, since the decision in the Magdalena case (2 E. & E. 94), to rely upon that distinction so far as immunity from process is concerned. But in the case of M. Krassin I think that there are good grounds for the contention that he is not in the strict sense an Ambassador, but is a person who for a certain limited purpose is accorded certain specified privileges. Upon the whole, I do not think that the letters written by the Foreign Office go definitely beyond this view. The letter of the 26th July really says that the question is one for the Courts, and the letter of the 5th October is concerned less with the privileges of M. Krassin than with the position of his so-called Government. Perhaps the matter is not of great practical importance, inasmuch as a plaintiff must, one would think, very soon be confronted with the fact that the confiscation or conversion relied upon was the act of something called a Government. With regard to the reply to the solicitors of the present plaintiffs, I suggest that they should be told that it is true that for a certain limited purpose the Foreign Office has regarded M. Krassin as exempt from the process of the Courts, and also that for the like limited purpose the Government has assented to the claim that that which M. Krassin represents in this country is a State Government of Russia, but that beyond these propositions the Foreign Office has not gone, and certainly does not purport to decide difficult and, it may be, very special questions of law upon which it may become necessary for the Courts to pronounce.

GORDON HEWART.

November 26, 1920.

1921

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(11933)

LAST COPY.

Nothing mutilated or removed: A.D.M.N.

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1921.

1921

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked I^A, &c.

COLOMBIA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	June 15, 1921	Writ against Colombian Government: question of intervention of His Majesty's Government on the ground of diplomatic privilege ..	1

GENERAL.

I^A	Law Officers .. [Treasury]	Jan. 25, 1921	Registration of treaties, &c., under article 18 of League of Nations Covenant ..	3
I^B	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	May 31,	Proposed amendment of British North America Act: powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canadian Parliament ..	6
I^C	Law Officers and Mr. C. W. Lilley [Ministry of Labour]	June 1,	International Labour Conventions: obligations under Treaty of Versailles, Part XIII, Labour Clauses ..	8
I^D	Law Officers and Mr. C. W. Lilley [Ministry of Labour]	June 10,	Ratification of International Labour Conventions: obligations under Treaty of Versailles, Part XIII	15
I^E	Law Officers and Mr. W. Bowstead [Board of Trade]	June 30,	Position of Safeguarding of Industries Bill as regards most-favoured-nation clauses of British commercial treaties ..	17
I^F	Law Officers and Mr. R. Hills [Inland Revenue]	July 27,	Foreign Governments trading in United Kingdom: liability to United Kingdom income tax ..	21
I^G	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Aug. 5,	Proposed amendment of British North America Act: powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canadian Parliament ..	24

GERMANY.

I^H	Law Officers and Mr. Branson [Board of Trade]	Jan. 19, 1921	Restitution in specie of British property in Germany under article 297 of Treaty of Peace ..	25
----------------------	--	---------------	--	----

JAPAN.

2	Law Officers ..	June 24, 1921	Termination of Anglo-Japanese Alliance, 1911 ..	28
3	Lord Chancellor 842 [8214]	July 1,	Termination of Anglo-Japanese Alliance, 1911 ..	29

a

(iii)

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
3 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Sept. 21, 1921	Preferential treatment in United Kingdom of goods imported from territories placed under "B" and "C" mandates ..	30

NORWAY.

4	Law Officers ..	Mar. 21, 1921	Draft mining regulations for Spitsbergen ..	32
---	-----------------	---------------	---	----

PALESTINE.

5	Law Officers ..	Feb. 18, 1921	Preferential treatment in United Kingdom of goods imported from Palestine ..	35
---	-----------------	---------------	--	----

RUSSIA.

6	Law Officers ..	Apr. 18, 1921	Signature of Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement: effect as regards recognition of the Soviet Republic ..	36
7	Law Officers ..	Nov. 28,	Liability of a Government for obligations entered into by its predecessors ..	37

TURKEY.

8	Law Officers ..	July 21, 1921	Enlistment by British subjects of persons to serve in Greek naval and military forces to fight Turkish Nationalists ..	40
9	Law Officers ..	Oct. 18,	Delivery of war vessels to Kemalist Government by Russian Soviet Government: question of action under Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, 1921 ..	40

UNITED STATES.

9 ^A	Law Officers .. [Home Office]	Apr. 7, 1921	National status of child born in the United States of a father who, at date of child's birth, was a natural-born British subject, but, during the child's minority, became a naturalised United States citizen ..	43
----------------	----------------------------------	--------------	---	----

(iv)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1921.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

AGR—GOV.

A.

Agreements: character of those to be registered under article 18 of League of Nations Covenant, 3-6.
Alliance: Anglo-Japanese Alliance, 1911, termination of, 28-30.

B.

Bauer, Marchal, et Cie., 1.
British North America. See Canada.

C.

Canada: amendment of British North America Act, 6, 7, 24, 25.
" powers of extra-territorial legislation for Parliament, 6, 7, 24, 25.
Colombia: writ against Government; question of intervention of His Majesty's Government on the ground of diplomatic privilege, 1-3.
Coward, Hawksley, Sons, and Chance, 2, 36, 37.
Customs: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from territories placed under "B" and "C" mandates, 30, 31.
" preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from Palestine, 35, 36.

D.

Debts: liability of Governments for debts of predecessors, 37-39.
Diplomatic privilege: writ against Colombian Government; question of intervention of His Majesty's Government, 1-3.

E.

Enlistment. See Foreign enlistment.
Extra-territoriality: proposed powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canada, 6, 7, 24, 25.

F.

Foreign enlistment: enlistment by British subjects of persons for Greek forces to fight Turkish Nationalists, 40.

G.

Governments: foreign, trading in United Kingdom; liability to British income tax, 21-24.
" recognition of Soviet Republic; effect of Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, 36, 37.

GOV—NEU.

Governments: liability for obligations entered into by their predecessors, 37-39.
Gramophone and Typewriter Company (Limited) v. Stanley, 23.
Greece: enlistment by British subjects of persons for Greek forces to fight Turkish Nationalists, 40.

I.

Imports. See Customs.
Income tax. British: liability of foreign Governments trading in United Kingdom, 21-24.

J.

Japan: termination of Anglo-Japanese Alliance, 1911, 28-30.

K.

Kodak (Limited) v. Clark, 23.

L.

Labour: Washington Conventions; British obligations under Part XIII of Treaty of Versailles, 8-17.
League of Nations: registration of treaties, &c., under article 18 of Covenant, 3-6.
" territories under mandates; preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from, 30, 31, 35, 36.
Liability: of governments for obligations entered into by predecessors, 37-39.

M.

Mandates: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from territories placed under, 30, 31, 35, 36.
Mining: draft regulations. Spitsbergen, 32-34.
Most-favoured-nation clauses. See Treaties.

N.

National Provincial and Union Bank of England, 1.
Nationality: child born in United States of father who at date of the birth was a British subject, but during the child's minority became a naturalised United States citizen, 43, 44.
Neutrality: enlistment by British subjects of persons to serve in Greek forces to fight Turkish Nationalists, 40.
" delivery of warships to Kemal Government in Turkey by Russian Soviet Government; question of action under Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, 40-43.

(v)

PAL—TRE.

P.

Palestine: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from, 35, 36.
" Parlement Belge, 23.
" Porte Alexandre, 23.
Preferential treatment. See Customs.
Property: British in Germany; restitution in specie under Treaty of Peace, 25-28.

R.

Recognition. See Governments.
Registration. See Treaties.
Russia: recognition of Soviet Republic; effect of signature of Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, 36, 37.
" liability of Soviet Government for obligations entered into by its predecessors, 37-39.
" delivery by Soviet Government of warships to Kemal Government in Turkey; question of action under Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, 40-43.

S.

Safeguarding of Industries Bill: position as regards most favoured-nation clauses of British commercial treaties, 17-21.
Sansom v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the Court of Appeal, 23.
Spitsbergen: draft mining regulations, 32-34.

T.

Trade: liability to British income tax of foreign Governments trading in United Kingdom, 21-24.
Treaties: registration under article 18 of League of Nations Covenant, 3-6.
" International Labour Conventions; British obligations under Part XIII of Treaty of Versailles, 8-17.

TRE—WRI.

Treaties: British commercial; position of safeguarding of Industries Bill as regards most-favoured-nation clauses, 17-21.
" Anglo-Japanese Alliance, 1911; termination, 28-30.
" signature of Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement; effects as regards recognition of Soviet Republic, 36, 37.
Treaty of Versailles. See Treaty of Peace (Germany).
Treaty of Peace (Germany): British obligations under Part XIII, Labour clauses, 8-17.
" restitution in specie of British property in Germany under, 25-28.
Turkey: enlistment by British subjects of persons for Greek forces to fight Nationalists in, 40.
" delivery of warships to Kemal Government by Russian Soviet Government; question of action under Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, 40-43.

U.

United States: nationality of child born in United States of father who at date of the birth was a British subject, but during child's minority became a naturalised United States citizen, 43, 44.

W.

Warships: delivery to Kemal Government in Turkey by Russian Soviet Government; question of action under Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, 40-43.
Wharton, D. B. S.: nationality, 43, 44.
Writ: against Colombian Government; question of intervention of His Majesty's Government on the ground of diplomatic privilege, 1-3.

1921

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1921.

COLOMBIA.

[T 7083]

No. 1.

[File 391/1921]

[June 15, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 7, 1921.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to request the favour of your advice on the following matter.

2. There are deposited with the National Provincial and Union Bank of England, in the name of the Colombian Minister to the Court of St. James, two boxes containing emeralds, the property of the Colombian Government. It appears that there were proceedings some years ago in the Chancery Division, which were ultimately stayed by consent under a general settlement, which left the emeralds absolutely at the disposal of the Colombian Minister in London for the time being. In June last year a Paris firm, trading under the name of Bauer, Marchal et Cie., who had nothing to do with the Chancery proceedings referred to, issued a writ against the bank claiming delivery of the emeralds (which were described in the endorsement to the writ as "the property of the Colombian Government, which the said Government had authorised plaintiffs to sell for their account"), and an injunction to restrain the bank from parting with the emeralds. Lord Curzon is not fully acquainted with the facts on which the plaintiffs' claim is based, but he understands their case to be that some agreement was made in May 1914 between the plaintiffs and the Republic of Colombia, under which the plaintiffs were to act as the agents of the Colombian Government for the sale of emeralds, and that in April 1920 the plaintiffs made a contract to sell the emeralds to another Paris firm. This agreement is said to have been approved by some representative at Paris of the Colombian Government, but to have been subsequently repudiated by the Colombian Minister of Finance.

3. On the 8th December, 1920, the Colombian Minister addressed a note to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Paper (A)) informing him that on these proceedings being brought to his notice he had maintained his diplomatic privilege and "disclaimed all civil proceedings of the United Kingdom against that property," but that none the less the proceedings were continuing, and requested that steps should be taken "to apply to the emeralds which I hold on behalf of the Colombian Government the prerogatives granted both by the English and the international law to property of foreign diplomatic agents accredited to the Court of St. James." A search in the Foreign Office archives having failed to find any precedent applicable to the case, the Treasury Solicitor was consulted through the Home Office, and a copy of his opinion is enclosed (Paper (B)). In accordance with this opinion, a note was sent to the Colombian Chargé d'Affaires (Paper (C)), suggesting that he should instruct the legal against Colombian Government.

Writ
Question of intervention of
His Majesty's Government on the ground of diplomatic privilege.

representatives in this country of the Government of Colombia to take such action as might be necessary to bring the facts and any claim of diplomatic privilege which might be founded upon them before the Court.

4. The Colombian Minister was, however, most unwilling to take this course, and on the 18th February a further note was received from the Chargé d'Affaires (Paper (D)) enclosing correspondence between the Minister and the bank, in which the former indicated that his Government was not prepared to appoint any legal representatives in this country to take action in the matter before the Court. The Colombian Government also took the matter up with His Majesty's Minister at Bogotá, and requested the intervention of His Majesty's Government.

5. At this stage it was thought desirable to get into touch privately with the solicitors representing the bank (Messrs. Coward, Hawkesley, Sons, and Chance) in order to ascertain whether they proposed to raise the point of diplomatic privilege when the matter came into court. It was ascertained that they had every intention of doing so. The Colombian Chargé d'Affaires was notified accordingly.

6. On the 23rd March the plaintiffs applied to Mr Justice Roche for an interim injunction. After a full discussion of the privileged position of the Colombian Minister, the Judge refused to grant an injunction, basing his decision, however, upon the serious delay in making the application.

7. The plaintiffs then amended their writ and appealed against the Judge's decision. A copy of the amended writ is enclosed (Paper (E)). Before the appeal was heard the Colombian Chargé d'Affaires communicated to this Department a letter from the Colombian Minister (who, it should be explained, is also accredited to the French Republic and spends most of his time in Paris) which gives some further information about the case (Paper (F)). The Colombian Chargé d'Affaires on the 15th April also addressed a further official note to the Secretary of State (Paper (G)).

8. On the 18th April the Court of Appeal delivered judgment allowing the appeal and granting an interim injunction on the terms that "the name of the Colombian Government should be added to the writ, and that the plaintiffs take such steps as may be possible to bring the writ to the knowledge of the Government." A copy of the judgment is enclosed (Paper (H)). The plaintiffs then obtained an order from Mr. Justice Roche, giving them liberty to join the Republic of Colombia as defendants, and dispensing with service of the amended writ on the plaintiffs undertaking to notify the Colombian Minister of the writ and proceedings and to send him a copy of the writ (Paper (I)). This they did by writing a letter to the Minister and enclosing a copy of the writ. The Minister replied that he was in communication with His Majesty's Government about the matter, and addressed a further note to the Secretary of State (Paper (J)), in which the point of view of his Government is fully set forth.

9. In these circumstances it is clear that the Colombian Government will not take any steps to take part in the proceedings, either to raise the principle of diplomatic privilege or to defend the case on its merits, and look to His Majesty's Government to see that nothing is done which might injure their interests. The Court of Appeal carefully abstained from indicating what would happen in the event of the Colombian Government ignoring the proceedings, but it is obvious that should the Court decide to hear the case in the absence of the Colombian Government and ultimately make an order for the delivery of the emeralds to the plaintiffs, a diplomatic situation of considerable difficulty would arise. Lord Curzon doubts whether he would be justified in running the risk of such a result, for although the bank will presumably continue to defend the proceedings, it may be doubted whether the Court, even if it allowed the point of diplomatic privilege to be put forward by the bank, would attach as much weight to it as if it were made either by the Colombian Government or by His Majesty's Government on their behalf, and it seems in any case unlikely that the bank would be in a position to make a full defence of the case on the merits.

10. In these circumstances his Lordship is anxious to obtain your opinion as to what is the proper course to pursue. It has been suggested that it might be possible for the Attorney-General to appear in the proceedings, and if not to argue the merits of the case, at any rate to put forward the point of diplomatic privilege. The opinion of the Treasury Solicitor (Paper (B)) is opposed to this course, but it may be considered that the judgment of the Court of Appeal has modified the circumstances in which that opinion was given, and if it be thought that His Majesty's Government are bound to take some steps in the matter, it is not apparent what other course is open to them.

11. The authorities on the point are discussed in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and it does not seem necessary to go into them further. As the joinder of the Colombian Government and the communication to the Colombian Minister of the writ were effected in consequence of the judgment of the Court of Appeal and the order of Mr. Justice Roche, it is presumed that sections 3 and 4 of "The Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708," would not apply to those actions.

12. In these circumstances his Lordship would be grateful if you would take the enclosed papers into your consideration, and would favour him with your opinion on the following points:—

- (1.) Whether His Majesty's Government should take any steps to see that the case of the Colombian Government is presented to the Court—

- (a.) On the point of diplomatic privilege,
- (b.) On the merits.

- (2.) If so, what is the proper course to pursue.
- (3.) Generally.

I have, &c.

R. H. CAMPBELL

List of Papers.

- (A.) Colombian Minister to Lord Curzon, December 8, 1920 (T 14042).
- (B.) Opinion of Treasury Solicitor (T 391).
- (C.) Lord Curzon to Colombian Chargé d'Affaires, January 13, 1921 (T 391).
- (D.) Colombian Chargé d'Affaires to Lord Curzon, February 18, 1921, with enclosures (T 2042).
- (E.) Amended Writ (T 4307).
- (F.) Colombian Minister to Colombian Chargé d'Affaires, April 4, 1921 (T 3876).
- (G.) Colombian Chargé d'Affaires to Lord Curzon, April 15, 1921, without enclosure (T 4353).
- (H.) Judgment of Court of Appeal (T 4533).
- (I.) Order of Mr. Justice Roche, May 5, 1921 (T 5933).
- (J.) Colombian Minister to Lord Curzon, May 9, 1921 (T 5501).

Report.

We agree with the opinion of the Treasury Solicitor that it is undesirable for the Government to intervene in legal proceedings in which a foreign Sovereign is interested, and we do not think that it would be advisable for the Government to take any steps in this case. In our opinion sections 3 and 4 of "The Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708," have no application, and there is no substance in the point of diplomatic privilege.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
June 15, 1921.

GENERAL

[T 1443]

No. 1^a.

[File 211/1921]

[January 25, 1921.]

[Treasury.]

Instructions to the Law Officers to Advise.

A QUESTION has arisen with regard to the construction of article 18 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, upon which the advice of the Law Officers is desired.

Article 18 of the Covenant provides that—

"Every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any member of the League shall be forthwith registered with the secretariat, and shall, as soon as possible, be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until registered."

Registration of treaties, &c., under article 18 of League of Nations Covenant.

GENERAL.

The interpretation which is sought to be put by the League upon article 18 may be gathered from the third paragraph of a memorandum which has been issued by the League, the terms of which are as follows:—

“(3.) The provision that ‘every treaty or international engagement shall be forthwith registered with the secretariat’ leads to the following conclusions as regards the material which requires registration. This material comprises not only every formal treaty of whatsoever character and every international convention, but also any other international engagement or Act by which nations or their Governments intend to establish legal obligations between themselves and another State, nation or Government.”

It is understood that the League are anxious to adopt an extensive interpretation of article 18. At the same time it is understood that the League does not claim to give an authoritative pronouncement as to the interpretation of article 18. The Foreign Office have, the Treasury are informed, been advised that the wording of article 18 is so comprehensive as to render useless any endeavour to embark on negotiations with the object of limiting the scope of the article to the registration of international engagements or treaties of first-class importance only.

As the Law Officers will observe, the interpretation put upon article 18 by paragraph 3 of the League's memorandum appears to be sufficiently wide to cover every engagement entered into between the Government of this country and the Government of another State.

It is difficult to follow the precise significance of the expression in the League's memorandum, “international engagement or Act by which nations or their Governments intend to establish legal obligations between themselves and another State, nation or government,” inasmuch as no engagement between States can be regarded as legal obligations in the sense of being legally enforceable by any municipal tribunal. The meaning may, however, it is submitted, perhaps be that the terms of article 18 include not only treaties and conventions of a formal nature, but agreements or arrangements of so definite a nature as would be enforceable by legal process in a municipal court of law if entered into between private persons subject to the jurisdiction of such court.

The scope of such an interpretation would seem to be very wide, and might, it is suggested, render it necessary, for example, to register with the League a three-months' Treasury bill given by the French Government to the British Treasury, and it is felt by the Treasury that considerable difficulty and inconvenience might arise from the adoption of so wide an interpretation of article 18, and, in particular, such an interpretation would apparently include transactions of a class or classes with which the Treasury are concerned, and of which the following examples may be given to the Law Officers by way of illustration:—

(a.) Agreements have been negotiated, or are in process of negotiation, between the Treasury (or other Departments of the Government) and Allied Governments for the settlement of claims and counter-claims in respect of goods supplied and services rendered during the war. Divergent views have naturally been held on both sides as to the rights and liabilities of the Governments concerned in connection with such claims and counter-claims, and compromises have been necessary for the purpose of arriving at a settlement, and have been reached sometimes as a result either of discussion of each item in dispute or, in cases where the materials for discussion could be obtained only by a wholly disproportionate expenditure of time and money, on a broad view of the interests of the parties. Such settlements when arrived at are frequently included in a formal document, which may be signed by an official or officials of the Department of State of each Government concerned in the negotiations. In other cases the arrangement rests upon correspondence.

It is submitted that agreements under head (a), while constituting an obligation upon one of the parties to them to pay the amount at which outstanding claims have been settled, cannot reasonably be classed as treaties or international engagements within the intention of article 18. In some cases payment of the amount involved will have been made, and in others bills for the amount payable will have been given, before it would be possible to register the agreement, and the sole effect of registration would be to advise other countries of the settlement reached without serving in any way the purpose of the insertion of the article in the Covenant.

GENERAL.

(b.) Agreements relating to money advances made by or to this country, and including arrangements made by the Treasury with the Finance Department of other Governments with regard to loans, as, e.g.:—

1. With Japan for the repayment of the yen loan.
2. With Argentine for the repayment of the pesos loan.
3. With Uruguay for the repayment of the dollar loan.
4. With Canada for the repayment of bankers' loan and one or two similar transactions with the American Treasury.

Such agreements or arrangements may be of all degrees of formality and may be contained in a formal schedule signed by an Ambassador, which may or may not be initialled by the Finance Ministers of the Governments concerned. They may be contained in formal documents signed by Prime Ministers or Finance Ministers of the States concerned, or they may in some cases rest only upon correspondence exchanged between Finance Ministers or between the departmental officials of the two Governments. They may relate either to the advances themselves or to the postponement of the date of repayment or to the reduction of the interest to be paid. These agreements or arrangements are of a somewhat different character from those referred to under heading (a), and no doubt some of them might be held to be within the intention of the article. The question of their registration in full involves questions of policy. If it be held that all financial agreements are to be registered, it might well become impossible for any nation to come to the assistance financially of another nation in an emergency. Publication of the agreement under which the assistance is to be given by means of registration with the League will involve a simultaneous publication to the legislative assemblies of the countries concerned, a course which might give rise to serious political difficulty. Further, publication in certain circumstances might entail grave risks to the financial credit of the borrowing country.

On purely national grounds publication of an agreement with a particular country allowing, say, the postponement of the payment of a debt or a reduction in the rate of interest would assuredly produce similar demands from other debtors which it might, on political grounds, be impossible to resist. The result would be that, unless His Majesty's Government are prepared to allow a general postponement of payment and a general reduction of interest, they would be unable to make concessions to a particular country, no matter how desirable such concessions might be.

Moreover, in such cases it would be impracticable to bring the agreement into force until it had been registered with the League under article 18, and publication in Geneva would presumably necessitate publication in this country of agreements or arrangements which it is not at present the practice to deal with in this way.

While no distinction can be drawn in principle between agreements or arrangements of this class on the ground of their formality, those which relate to postponement of the due date or to reduction of interest are, generally speaking, contained in the less formal of the agreements, and those which relate to the actual advances in the more formal. It is in the publication of agreements or arrangements of the former class that the Treasury foresee the greatest inconvenience, and it might be possible to arrive at a defensible line as to registration of agreements or arrangements of this class based upon the formality of the document.

(c.) Agreement for the sale of surplus material. The same considerations apply to agreements falling under this head as those falling under head (a). Further, their publication would inevitably produce complaints should it prove that a lower price had been obtained from one country than from another. They are purely commercial transactions.

It is submitted for the consideration of the Law Officers that the interpretation placed upon the terms of article 18 of the Covenant by paragraph 3 of the League's memorandum gives too wide a scope and effect to the words which are employed in article 16, and it is suggested for consideration whether the meaning of the expression “international engagement” is not to some extent limited and confined to international engagements of a particular character or class, which would not embrace agreements or arrangements such as those indicated under heads (a), (b) and (c) (or at any rate some of them) by the word “treaty” which immediately precedes the words “international engagement.” The words “international engagement” must, it is suggested, be construed ejusdem generis with the word “treaty” which they follow.

GENERAL.

The Law Officers are requested to advise:—

1. Whether the expression "every treaty or international engagement" contained in article 18 of the Covenant of the League of Nations includes only treaties or engagements of a particular nature, class or character, e.g., such treaties and engagements as are ratified by Governments as a whole, and, if so, to what nature, class or character of treaty or international engagement is the operation of article 18 limited.
2. Whether or not departmental agreements or arrangements of the classes referred to respectively in heads (a), (b) and (c) above come within the operation of article 18 of the Covenant; and
3. Generally on the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

The commentary on the Covenant under the heading "Treaties and Understandings" on p. 17 suggests that articles 18-21 should be taken together as describing the new conditions which must govern international agreements. Article 21 excepts certain international engagements, of which illustrations are given.

If the inclusive interpretation suggested in paragraph 3 of the memorandum were to prevail, no effect could be given to the terms of article 21.

There must be some limitations therefore to be placed on article 18. Probably it was intended to carry into effect the first of President Wilson's fourteen points—"open covenants of peace openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view." The questions put to us are by no means free from doubt, but on the whole we are of opinion that—

1. Article 18 is limited to treaties and engagements arranged through diplomatic channels, but it does not apply to bargains merely terminating differences and not involving any continuing obligation, even if they are arranged through diplomatic channels.
2. None of the arrangements under the classes referred to in heads (a) and (c) come within the scope of the article, however they may be made, and merely departmental agreements, not arranged through diplomatic channels, are also outside its operation.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

*Law Officers' Department,
January 25, 1921.*

[W 8000]

No. 1^B.

Colonial Office.]

[File 1308/1921]

[May 31, 1921.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, May 5, 1921.

WITH reference to your report of the 24th December last* relative to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation, I am directed by Mr. Secretary Churchill to transmit to you a copy of a despatch on the subject addressed by Viscount Milner to the Governor-General of Canada on the 21st January, together with a copy of a despatch in reply which has been received from the Governor-General.

2. It will be seen that the Canadian Government do not share the view that, in matters relating to the enforcement of the treaty obligations of Canada, the desired powers are already conferred by section 132 of the British North America Act, and that they also regard as undesirable and inadequate the expedient of proceeding in accordance with the principle of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Peninsular and Oriental Navigation Company v. Kingston. Further, they state that, in the absence of any acceptable suggestion for the improvement of the form of enactment, they adhere to that originally proposed.

* Confidential 11810, p. 56.

Proposed amendment of British North America Act: Powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canadian Parliament.

GENERAL.

3. In these circumstances Mr. Churchill would be obliged if, after taking into consideration the papers accompanying this letter and those forwarded with the previous references, you could either suggest another formula for submission to the Canadian Government or state, for communication to the Canadian Government, precisely what the objections are to the formula originally proposed.

4. In connection with the allusions to "nationals" in the penultimate paragraph of letter accompanying the Governor-General's despatch of the 2nd March, I am to transmit to you a copy of a Bill "to define Canadian nationals," introduced into the House of Commons of Canada by the Minister of Justice on the 1st March, 1921, together with the debates on the Bill so far as received (viz.: 1st March, pp. 421-422; 4th March, p. 616; 8th March, pp. 679-684; 10th March, pp. 805-826) and a pamphlet containing the Immigration Act. As regards clause 1 (a) of the Bill, I am to refer to section 2, sub-sections (d) and (f), of the Immigration Act (pp. 8 and 9 of the pamphlet). You will observe that in the second reading debate on the 8th March (Hansard, p. 680) Mr. Doherty remarked:—

"Should the legislation which this House asked last year to have passed by the British Parliament clearing up any doubt as to the extra-territorial effect of our legislation be enacted, as I have every reason to believe it will be, it will then be important to have a clear-cut definition of who are the people who may be affected by that legislation."

I am, &c.
H. LAMBERT.

List of Papers.

1. Colonial Office to Governor-General of Canada, Secret, January 21, 1921.
2. From Governor-General of Canada to Colonial Office, Secret, March 2, 1921.
3. Canadian Bill No. 17, 1921
4. Extracts from debates in Canadian House of Commons, March 1, 4, 8 and 10, 1921.
5. Canadian Immigration Act.

Report.

We cannot suggest any other formula which would at the same time satisfy the desires of the Canadian Government and be free from objection on constitutional grounds. It appears from paragraph 3 of the letter of the 1st March, 1921, from the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Dominion of Canada desires the same powers of extra-territorial legislation as are possessed by the Imperial Parliament, and the objections to the formula originally proposed are those indicated in the Law Officers' Report of the 13th July, 1920, namely, that if this formula were construed as giving the Canadian Parliament the power of extra-territorial legislation generally with regard to all the matters mentioned in section 91 of the British North America Act, provided only that the legislation could be said to concern the peace, order and good government of Canada, it would reverse the fundamental rule that colonial legislation must, prima facie, relate exclusively to the colony, and might possibly, and even probably, lead to a serious conflict of laws as between the various self-governing dominions if the other dominions were placed on the same footing in this respect as that upon which Canada desires to be placed.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 31, 1921.*

[W 7574]

No. 1^c

[Ministry of Labour.]

[File 756/1921]

[June 1, 1921.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

HEREWITH :—

1. Copy Treaty of Versailles (now with you);
2. Copy draft conventions and recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference at its first annual meeting;
3. Copy pamphlet entitled "Labour and the Peace Treaty"; and
4. Copy "Hansard," vol. 134, No. 129.

The Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel are requested to advise in connection with certain matters which arise out of the labour clauses (Part XIII) of the Treaty of Versailles (which clauses are reproduced textually in the subsequent Treaties of Peace with the ex-enemy Powers).

1. Chapter 1 of Part XIII, which is entitled "Organisation," deals with the establishment of—

- (a.) A General Conference of representatives of the members (the members being the members of the League of Nations and certain other States).
- (b.) An International Labour Office.

Chapter 2, which is entitled "Procedure," deals with the procedure to be followed by the Conference, the undertakings of the members with regard to proposals which have been adopted by the Conference, and the procedure which may follow the default of any member to carry out his undertakings. Article 405 of this chapter is set out in full below, and great difficulties have arisen in regard to the interpretation of this article and as to the position of the Crown thereunder :—

"ARTICLE 405.

"When the Conference has decided on the adoption of proposals with regard to an item in the agenda, it will rest with the Conference to determine whether these proposals should take the form : (a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the members.

"In either case a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present shall be necessary on the final vote for the adoption of the recommendation or draft convention, as the case may be, by the Conference.

"In framing any recommendation or draft convention of general application the Conference shall have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organisation, or other special circumstances make the industrial conditions substantially different, and shall suggest the modifications, if any, which it considers may be required to meet the case of such countries.

"A copy of the recommendation or draft convention shall be authenticated by the signature of the President of the Conference and of the Director, and shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. The Secretary-General will communicate a certified copy of the recommendation or draft convention to each of the members.

"Each of the members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the Conference, or, if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment, and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the Conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

"In the case of a recommendation, the members will inform the Secretary-General of the action taken.

"In the case of a draft convention, the member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the Secretary-General, and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

"If, on a recommendation, no legislation or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the member.

"In the case of a federal State, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matter is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that Government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case."

The above article shall be interpreted in accordance with the following principle :—

"In no case shall any member be asked or required, as a result of the adoption of any recommendation or draft convention by the Conference, to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned."

2. The first annual meeting of the General Conference of the members of the International Labour Organisation was held at Washington between the 29th October and 29th November, 1919, and the date of the closing of the meeting has been declared to be the 27th January, 1920.

Having regard to the 5th paragraph of article 405, it will be seen that the undertakings of the members should be carried out by the 27th January, 1921, or, in the case of exceptional circumstances, at the latest by the 27th July, 1921.

A reprint of the draft conventions and recommendations adopted by the Conference is sent herewith.

His Majesty's Government is understood to be desirous of taking such action as may be necessary to give effect to all the draft conventions and recommendations, except a part of the recommendation concerning unemployment on p. 15 of the reprint, the recommendation concerning reciprocity of treatment of foreign workers on p. 17, and the draft convention concerning the employment of women before and after childbirth on p. 18. It does not appear to be desirable that the Government should be under an obligation to bring before Parliament the recommendations and draft convention hereinbefore referred to.

The Government desires to carry out the obligations of the Crown under the Treaty of Versailles, and at the same time to do nothing which can be considered to be an infringement or limitation of the Crown's prerogative.

3. It seems that the following cases will have to be dealt with by the Government as a result of proposals of the Conference :—

(1.) Recommendations which it is desired to adopt—

- (a.) Which require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.
- (b.) To which effect can be given by executive action only.

(2.) Recommendations which it is not desired to adopt—

- (a.) Which require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.
- (b.) To which effect can be given by executive action only.

(1.) Draft conventions which it is desired to ratify—

- (a.) Which, if ratified, require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.
- (b.) To which, if ratified, effect can be given by executive action only.

[8214]

C

(2.) Draft conventions which it is not desired to ratify—

- (a.) Which, if ratified, require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.
- (b.) To which, if ratified, effect can be given by executive action only.

4. In order to ascertain the obligations of this country under article 405, and to decide what is the necessary procedure for giving effect to those obligations, it is first essential to consider what is the correct interpretation of that article, and more especially of the words "the member." In this connection the Law Officers and Counsel are referred to articles 387 and 1 of the treaty, and it is submitted that the effect of these articles is to make the Crown, acting by and through the executive Government, "the member," for it is thought that to identify the Crown for this purpose with the person of the Sovereign would lead to great inconvenience, as it is to be borne in mind that under the Treaty of Versailles a new position is given to the self-governing colonies and India. The case, as laid before the Law Officers and Counsel, is based on the assumption that this submission is correct, but it is understood that an interpretation has been put forward to the effect that the legislative assembly of each country is in reality "the member," from which it would appear that there would be a power in the Secretary-General to communicate a draft convention direct to the proper officer of any legislative assembly with a view to legislation. It is further understood that an extension of this doctrine is contended for under which M. Thomas, Director of the International Labour Office, could himself communicate direct to the legislative assembly of any country.

Recommendations.

The following interpretation is possible:—

"That the Crown has undertaken, within the defined period, to bring any recommendation of the Conference before the authority which is competent to give effect to the recommendation by legislative or executive action, which authority will be the Crown itself or Parliament, according to the nature of the action required to give effect to the recommendation. That, when the recommendation has been brought to the attention of the competent authority in such manner as may be advised by Law Officers and Counsel, the obligation of the Crown ceases."

While it appears to be difficult to interpret this part of the article in any other way, the following considerations appear to be material:—

On the one hand, it would seem that this interpretation conforms with the intention of the framers of these articles if reference is made to the pamphlet entitled "Labour and the Peace Treaty," which is sent herewith, in which certain passages which appear to be material have been marked.

On the other hand, it has to be decided whether the Treaty of Versailles must be taken to override the domestic law of the British Empire, or whether it is right to assume that those who were responsible for the framing of these articles did not intend to infringe the principles of the Constitution in the countries of any of the signatories, and that in signing the Treaty of Versailles any particular signatory did not intend to act in such a manner. The objection, therefore, to this interpretation would seem to be that, in the case of a recommendation which it is not desired to adopt, but which would require legislation in order that effect may be given to it, an obligation would have been placed upon the Crown to bring that recommendation before Parliament. It is for consideration whether it is in accordance with the law and custom of the Constitution that the Crown should be obliged to bring before Parliament a matter which the Crown does not desire should be passed into law, and whether the obligation involved in this interpretation does not involve a limitation of the prerogative of the Crown in this respect.

As, however, it is difficult to see what other interpretation can be placed upon this part of the article, it is possible that the Crown would fulfil its obligations under the treaty by communicating to Parliament the recommendation of the Conference by one of the recognised constitutional methods, that is to say, in the Speech from the Throne, by a communication to both Houses given through a commission under the Great Seal, by message under the Sign Manual or by an oral message delivered, by command, by a Minister of the Crown.

Draft Conventions.

A preliminary difficulty which arises under this head is the correct interpretation of the words "draft convention" and "ratification." Two views appear possible with regard to the correct interpretation of these words in this particular connection:—

- (1.) On the one hand, it has been the view of the British representatives at the Conference of Versailles and at the Washington Conference that the words should not be interpreted in any technical sense, and that the ordinary rules with regard to the ratification of draft international agreements are not applicable in this particular instance.
- (2.) On the other hand, it may be contended that the words are used in their accepted technical signification, that is to say, a draft international convention means a draft international agreement (i.e., an agreement by the emissaries of the Governments concerned), and ratification means the ratification of the agreement of the Government's emissaries which is necessary to complete the validity of the international agreement.

There does not appear to be any definition of these words in any part of the treaty, and therefore it seems at first sight to be somewhat difficult to argue that they are not used here in their usual technical signification; but it is urged in support of the former construction that the Treaty of Versailles does not purport to be an international document upon conventional lines, but is claimed to establish a fresh precedent in international relations and that it should be construed accordingly. It is said further in support of the former view that importance should be attached to the fact that article 405 of the treaty speaks not of a convention but of a draft convention. It seems questionable, however, whether this point carries the matter much further, since presumably a draft instrument must be of the same nature as the final instrument itself. Attention is also drawn to the power given expressly by article 405 to federal States to treat a draft convention as a recommendation. It is said that this, upon the principle expressio unius est exclusio alterius, shows an intention to exclude any other State from having this power; but the weight of this argument in support of the first construction is diminished if it is considered that the second construction involves not so much an election by any State concerned as to whether a proposal adopted by the conference is to be treated as a draft convention or as a recommendation, but involves rather an implicit limitation upon the power of the Conference itself in arriving at a conclusion as to which of the two forms its proposal is to take. There is no doubt that the impression given both at Versailles and at Washington has been that the British view has hitherto been in accordance with the first of the constructions suggested above, and that it may be difficult at this stage to put forward the other view.

If, however, the second view is correct, and the words are to be interpreted in their usual technical signification, the following observations seem to be material:—

A proposal under discussion between two or more sovereign Powers can only become an agreement or convention in the ordinary technical sense when it has been approved by the emissaries or agents of each of those sovereign Powers. It is certainly difficult to see how two or more sovereign Powers can be said to have "come together" until the emissaries or agents of each of them have signified their approval of such "coming together."

It would, therefore, upon this view of the matter, seem necessary to read into paragraph 1 of article 405 an implied limitation on the power of the Conference to determine whether their proposals shall take the form of a recommendation or a draft convention, and that the position would be that, after a decision has been reached by a two-thirds majority of the Conference, it would only be possible for the Conference to formulate that decision as a draft convention as between those members whose Government delegates (as distinguished from the delegates of the employers and workers) had signified their approval thereto, and that in all other cases where the requisite majority had been obtained, the Conference would be obliged to formulate its proposals as a recommendation.

There is no doubt that the Conference at its first annual meeting cannot have considered that this limitation was placed upon its power to determine the form of its proposals, as it has formulated as a draft convention a proposal concerning the employment of women before and after child-birth, which proposal had not the approval of the delegates of the British Government.

A possible answer to the argument in support of the second construction is that the members in agreeing to article 405 have agreed that the two-thirds majority of the Conference shall be the agents of each one of them for signifying their approval to a proposal, and thereby enabling it to be formulated as a draft convention.

If it is considered that there is an implied limitation upon the power of the Conference to decide which form is to be adopted for the proposals upon which the two-thirds majority has agreed, and that the approval of the delegates of the British Government is necessary before a proposal can be formulated as a draft convention so far as the British Government is concerned, it is for consideration by the Law Officers and Counsel whether the draft convention relating to the employment of women before and after child-birth can either be disregarded or be treated as a recommendation.

If, however, it is thought that the view of the Conference itself and of the British representatives at Washington is correct, and that a proposal, to which the delegates of the Crown were not approving parties, can be formulated as a draft convention, or that it is not necessary to consider a draft convention as a draft international agreement in its usual technical signification, other considerations arise. It becomes necessary to ascertain the obligations of the Crown with regard to draft conventions under the 5th and 7th paragraphs of article 405.

There appear to be four possible interpretations of the obligations which have been assumed by the Crown with regard to draft conventions:—

- (1) "That the Crown has undertaken, within the defined period, to bring any draft convention adopted by the Conference before the authority which is competent to ratify the draft convention, which authority under the British Constitution would seem to be the Crown itself. And further that the Crown will, if and when it is ratified communicate the formal ratification to the Secretary-General of the League, and take the necessary legislative or executive action to make effective the provisions of such convention."
- (2) "That the Crown has undertaken, within the defined period, to bring any draft convention adopted by the Conference before the authority which is competent to decide whether enactment of legislation or other action shall be taken to give effect to the draft convention, which authority under the British Constitution would seem to be the Crown itself. And further that the Crown will, if it decides to give effect to the draft convention by the enactment of legislation or other action, ratify the draft convention, communicate the formal ratification to the Secretary-General of the League, and take the necessary legislative or executive action to make effective the provisions of such convention."
- (3) "That the Crown has undertaken, within the defined period, to bring any draft convention adopted by the Conference before the authority which is competent to give effect to the draft convention by legislative or executive action, which authority will be the Crown itself or Parliament, according to the nature of the draft convention. And further that the Crown will, if and when the consent of the competent authority has been obtained, ratify the draft convention, communicate the formal ratification to the Secretary-General of the League, and take the necessary legislative or executive action to make effective the provisions of such convention."
- (4) "That the Crown has undertaken to ratify any draft convention which is adopted by the Conference, and within the defined period to bring it before the authority which is competent to give effect to the draft convention by legislative or executive action, which authority will be the Crown itself or Parliament, according to the nature of the draft convention. And further that the Crown will, if and when the consent of the competent authority has been obtained, communicate the formal ratification to the Secretary-General of the League, and take the necessary legislative or executive action to make effective the provisions of such convention."

It will be seen that the main differences between these four interpretations are as follows:—

In No. (1), the words "authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies" mean the authority which is competent to ratify, and the legislative or executive action necessary comes after ratification and after communication of such ratification to the Secretary-General.

In No. (2), the words "authority or authorities," &c., mean the authority which is competent to decide whether legislation or other action shall be taken to give effect to the draft convention, after which decision ratification may or may not take place, to be followed, if it does, by the necessary legislative or executive action.

In No. (3), the words "authority or authorities," &c., mean the authority which is competent to give effect to the draft convention by legislative or executive action. Ratification comes after submission to, and consent of, the competent authority.

In No. (4), the words "authority or authorities," &c., have the same meaning as in No. (3), but ratification is necessary before submission to the competent authority.

In deciding which (if any) of these interpretations is correct, it may be thought that the following point is worthy of consideration: That the Treaty of Versailles was framed to meet the needs of the Constitutions of the various signatories, and that unless a very definite intention to the contrary is expressed it must be assumed that it was not the intention of the framers or of the signatories to infringe or limit the law or custom of the British Constitution.

The first and second interpretations do not appear to involve a limitation of the Crown's prerogative, nor do they seem to infringe the law and custom of the Constitution. It is for consideration whether, in considering a matter of this kind, the presumption that the framers of the articles and the signatories to the treaty were not attempting to alter the law of the land in the country of any particular signatory should not prevail against the views expressed in the marked passages in the pamphlet entitled "Labour and the Peace Treaty."

If it should be considered that the presumption before referred to must prevail in order to arrive at the correct interpretation of the article, it is only necessary to decide whether the first or second interpretation is more consistent with the wording of the article, but it should be noted that the third interpretation does appear to be in accord with the views expressed in the marked passages in the pamphlet before referred to, and would appear to have been adopted by the Home Secretary when moving the second reading of the Women's and Young Persons (Employment in Lead Processes) Bill (see "Hansard," vol. 134, No. 129, at p. 102, which is sent herewith and marked).

On the other hand, it is questionable whether the article, if so interpreted, is not contrary to the law and custom of the Constitution. The Crown is thereby compelled in certain circumstances to bring before Parliament an international instrument which it does not desire to ratify, and presumably to ratify such instrument if it obtains the consent of Parliament. It would appear that the making and ratification of conventions is part of the Crown's prerogative. It would also appear that, except in cases where a convention seeks to alter the law of the land, or when financial provision is required to give effect to it, there is no necessity for the Crown to submit a convention for the approval of Parliament. In both these respects, therefore, the third interpretation seems to place a limitation on the prerogative of the Crown.

The fourth interpretation also appears to be open to a number of serious constitutional objections.

In the first place, the Crown would seem to have bound itself to ratify a convention subject to the consent of the authority which is competent to give effect to it, although it may be a convention which the Crown does not desire to ratify. Secondly, the Crown may be bound to ratify and submit to Parliament a convention to which it does not desire to give effect.

The Law Officers of the Crown and counsel are requested to advise as follows:—

1. Whether the Treaty of Versailles is to be construed according to the law of England, or whether regard should be had to the intention of those who drafted the treaty as expressed in documents other than the treaty itself.
2. Whether or no the Crown, acting through the executive Government, is to be regarded as "the member" under articles 1 and 387 for the purposes of article 405.
3. Whether and, if so, to what extent the Crown should act through the separate executive Governments—

- (a.) Of the United Kingdom.
- (b.) Of the self-governing colonies.
- (c.) Of India.

4. What are the obligations of the Crown under article 405 in respect of—

(A.) Recommendations—

(1.) Which it is desired to adopt—

(a.) Which require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.

(b.) To which effect can be given by executive action only.

(2.) Which it is not desired to adopt—

(a.) Which require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.

(b.) To which effect can be given by executive action only.

(B.) Draft Conventions—

(3.) Which it is desired to ratify—

(a.) Which, if ratified, require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.

(b.) To which, if ratified, effect can be given by executive action only.

(4.) Which it is not desired to ratify—

(a.) Which, if ratified, require legislation in order that effect may be given to them.

(b.) To which, if ratified, effect can be given by executive action only.

5. What is constitutionally the correct procedure for giving effect to the obligations of the Crown.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

1. The first question upon which we are asked to advise is really whether the obligations imposed upon this country by Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles are to be interpreted in the light of the constitutional law and practice of this country as they existed up to the date of the treaty or whether the treaty itself has imposed some new constitutional practice. In our opinion this country is not bound, nor was it intended that it should be bound, to adopt any other than the usual constitutional methods hitherto in force for the fulfilment of its obligations to deal either with recommendations or with draft conventions.

2 and 3. In our opinion the Crown, acting through the executive Government in the ordinary constitutional manner, is to be regarded as "the member" for the purposes of this part of the treaty. This answer applies in all cases, so that the Crown acts through the executive Governments (a) of the United Kingdom, (b) of the self-governing colonies, (c) of India.

4. We think that recommendations made in accordance with the provisions of article 405 by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present have to be dealt with under the fifth paragraph of the article, whether or not they have obtained the support of the British delegates. In our opinion the obligation involved is as follows:—

- (a.) Where legislation is necessary in order that effect may be given to the recommendations, the authority or authorities within whose competence the enactment of legislation lies means, in our opinion, the whole legislature. It is competent for Members of either House of Parliament to propose measures for enactment. In our opinion, therefore, the obligations imposed by the treaty involve the communication of the recommendations to the legislature even if the Government of the day may not desire that measures in accordance with the recommendations should be enacted. We think that this obligation would be fulfilled by communicating such recommendations to Parliament by a communication made to both Houses of Parliament. We do not think that such communication should be made in the Speech from the Throne, which is the recognised vehicle for the communication to the Houses of the legislative intentions of the Government of the day, but probably the recommendations should be communicated by one of the other methods suggested. The precise method, however, requires further consideration.

If the Government desires to do so, it would, of course, initiate legislation, and adopt the usual procedure to secure its enactment. If it did not desire the enactment, in our opinion the Government would be perfectly free to oppose any measure which might be brought forward in accordance with the recommendations by Members of either House.

- (b.) Where effect can be given to the recommendations by executive action only, we think that the authority within whose competence the matter lies is the Government, and, in our opinion, the seventh paragraph of article 405 contemplates the possibility of such recommendation failing to obtain the approval of the Government. If, therefore, the Government desires not to take executive action, it is, in our opinion, free to abstain from doing so.

5. The provisions of the treaty in regard to draft conventions involve considerations of very great difficulty.

On the whole, we think the expression "draft convention" is not to be given a technical or precise meaning. It remains a "draft" convention until it is ratified by the authority competent to ratify. We think that the intention of the relevant articles is that the requisite majority of the Conference can put forward a form of agreement for the consideration of the proper treaty-making authorities of the signatory States. We do not think it is open to a non-federal State to treat the draft convention submitted to it as a recommendation.

The obligation undertaken by this country seems to us to be that the Crown, acting upon the advice of the executive Government, shall consider any draft convention put forward by the Conference for the purpose of deciding whether or not it will ratify. If it decides to ratify, it must then ratify the convention and take the necessary legislative or executive action to make the provisions effective. It is, of course, equally competent for the Crown not to ratify. Then, under the seventh paragraph of article 405, no further obligation remains. Ratification is, in our opinion, intended to be the considered act of the constitutional treaty-making authority unfettered by the recommendations of the Conference. The decision to ratify is also, we think, a condition precedent to the submission to the legislative authority of any legislative proposals necessary to give effect to the convention.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
CECIL W. LILLEY.

Law Officers' Department,
June 1, 1921.

[W. 7574]

No. 1^b.

[Ministry of Labour.]

[File 756/1921]

[June 10, 1921.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

1. A FURTHER question has arisen with regard to the interpretation of Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles.

One of the conventions reached at the Washington Conference of 1919 dealt with the creation of a 48-hour week, which carried with it the prohibition of overtime except for certain specified seasonal and similar employment. His Majesty's Government, while anxious to support the principle of the 48-hour week, find themselves in considerable difficulty in accepting the text of the conventions as settled at Washington, because the provisions as to overtime would both seriously interfere with agreements upon this subject entered into between the railway companies and the railwaymen's associations, and would, on the other hand, particularly at this juncture, prejudicially affect the general industry of the country. In these circumstances, His Majesty's Government are considering a proposal to notify the Secretary-General of the League their ratification of this particular convention, with certain reservations to meet the points above mentioned.

2. The question which therefore presents itself for consideration is whether, under the terms of article 405, which has been before the Law Officers in another connection,*

* See No. 1^c.

Ratification of International Labour Conventions.
Obligations
under Treaty of Versailles,
Part XIII.

ratification with reservations is competent. This question, therefore, is submitted for the opinion of the Law Officers. The following points appear material :—

In support of the contention that ratification with reservations is inadmissible, it is argued that Part XIII contains no reference to ratification with reservations.

It may be remembered further that under article 405 the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation adopts two kinds of proposals :—

- (a.) Recommendations to be submitted to the members for consideration, with a view to effect being given to them by legislation or otherwise.
- (b.) Draft conventions for ratification.

It is arguable, therefore, that to ratify a convention with reservations is equivalent to treating it as a recommendation and is accordingly inadmissible.

This is believed to be the view of the Director of the International Labour Office, and he has conveyed this view in a letter to the Polish authorities. But it should be remembered that he has no locus standi in questions of interpretation. Under article 423, the final arbiter in such cases is the Permanent Court of International Justice.

3. In support of the opposite contention, on the other hand, it may be remembered that in the case of the Treaty of Versailles the claim of the United States to ratify with reservations was not seriously questioned by the other parties to the treaty.

It is argued further that in the case of ordinary diplomatic conventions it is not unusual to ratify with reservations, and that the international labour conventions are susceptible of similar treatment.

It is noteworthy, also, that certain other members of the Labour Organisation propose to ratify with reservations, or have taken steps which are equivalent to such limited ratification. Thus it is understood that India proposes to ratify the draft convention fixing the minimum age for admission of children to industrial employment with certain reservations. Czechoslovakia desires to ratify the draft convention concerning the night-work of young persons employed in industry with reservations. Poland has expressed a desire to ratify three of the conventions with reservations. Belgium provides an example of action which will be equivalent to ratification with reservation. Owing to constitutional difficulties, France and Belgium are unable to ratify the conventions adopted at Washington. They have therefore reproduced the texts of these conventions as ordinary diplomatic conventions, which were signed on the 24th January, 1921. In the case of Belgium, a Bill ratifying these diplomatic conventions will be introduced in Parliament. At the same time, however, the legislation which has been introduced to give effect to the Hours Convention contains a clause by which the King may abrogate the law temporarily should it be essential in the interests of the nation to increase exports in comparison with imports. South Africa also, to take another example, has informed the director that the Government of the Union has "accepted in principle" the Hours Convention. This appears to open the way for legislation to give effect to the convention, which would not necessarily follow in detail the terms of the convention.

4. The Law Officers and Counsel are therefore asked to advise as to whether Part XIII, and particularly article 405, of the Treaty of Versailles can be legally interpreted so as to admit of ratification of draft conventions with reservations.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

UPON the whole we are disposed to think that the ordinary rules of international law as to the ratification of treaties or conventions between States cannot be applied strictly to conventions coming into existence in pursuance of article 405 of the Treaty of Peace.

It is laid down (see, e.g., "Oppenheim," 3rd edition, 1920, vol. 1, pp. 674 and 675) that there is no such thing as conditional ratifications. A treaty must be either ratified or not ratified. The foundation of this rule seems to be that the treaty or convention is in ordinary circumstances the agreement of the national representatives on behalf of their respective countries, which agreement is signified by the signatures of the representatives. In these circumstances a ratification subject to conditions or reservations involves an alteration of the agreement which may or may not be accepted by the other high contracting party.

In ordinary circumstances, therefore, the effect of conditional ratification can be treated by the other party as a refusal to ratify. On the other hand, the modified terms may be accepted, and the treaty or convention is then treated as an international agreement on the altered terms.

The essential difference between a convention in ordinary circumstances and a draft convention under article 405 is that a draft convention does not, in our opinion, embody even a preliminary agreement between the representatives of the high contracting parties. In these circumstances we incline to the view that the ordinary rules of international law as regards ratification cannot be applied in their full rigour. If that be so, and if policy so requires, it would appear that it is competent to a State desirous of ratifying with reservations a convention under article 405 to take that course.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
CECIL W. LILLEY.

*Law Officers' Department,
June 10, 1921.*

[W 7488]

No. 1^E.

[Board of Trade.]

[File 3421/1921]

June 30, 1921.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. W. Bowstead.

HEREWITH is sent a print of the above-mentioned Bill. The question has arisen as to the extent to which (if at all) the issue of orders made by the Board of Trade under either clause 2 (1) (a) or 2 (1) (b) of the Bill would conflict with any obligations contained in certain commercial treaties granting what is known as most-favoured-nation treatment upon which the Board of Trade desire to be advised by the Law Officers. The following clauses are typical of most-favoured-nation treatment clauses :—

Position of Safeguarding of Industries
Bill as regards most-favoured-nation clauses of British
commercial
treaties.

United States of America (Treaty of 1815).

"Article 2. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe on any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country."

Italy (Treaty of 1883).

"Article 2. No other or higher duty shall be imposed on the importation into the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty of any article the produce or manufacture of the dominions and possessions of His Majesty the King of Italy, from whatever place arriving, and no other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the dominions and possessions of His Majesty the King of Italy of any article the produce or manufacture of Her Britannic Majesty's dominions and possessions from whatever place arriving, than on articles produced or manufactured in any other foreign country."

[8214]

D

Belgium (Modus vivendi of 1898).

"The undersigned has therefore the honour to state that, on this understanding, Her Britannic Majesty's Government will on their part undertake not to make any modification after the 29th July, 1898, in the system actually applied in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the subjects and products of Belgium unless previous notice of any such change shall have been given three months before to the Belgian Government.

"It is clearly understood that the present engagement does not prevent either of the two Governments making in the system actually in force between the two countries such modifications as may be made applicable to all other countries."

Japan (Treaty of 1911).

"Article 7. Articles, the produce or manufacture of the territories of one high contracting party, upon importation into the territories of the other, from whatever place arriving, shall enjoy the lowest rate of customs duty applicable to similar articles of any other foreign origin.

"Article 8. The articles, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom, enumerated in Part 1 of the schedule annexed to this treaty shall not, on importation into Japan, be subjected to higher customs duties than those specified in the schedule.

"The articles, the produce or manufacture of Japan, enumerated in Part 2 of the schedule annexed to this treaty shall be free of duty on importation into the United Kingdom.

"Provided that, if at any time after the expiration of one year from the date this treaty takes effect either of the high contracting parties desires to make a modification in the schedule, it may notify its desire to the other high contracting party, and thereupon negotiations for the purpose shall be entered into forthwith. If the negotiations are not brought to a satisfactory conclusion within six months from the date of notification, the high contracting party which gave the notification may, within one month, give six months' notice to abrogate the present article, and on the expiration of such notice the present article shall cease effect, without prejudice to the other stipulations of this treaty."

Counsel will remember that orders may be made under the provisions of the Bill in two sets of circumstances, and the effect of making an order under section 2 (1) (a) or section 2 (1) (b) of the Bill is different in its application to goods from the country named in the order in that in the event of the order being made under (b) on the ground of deflated rate of exchange the duty becomes applicable to all goods from that country specified in the order, whilst if it be made under (a) on the ground of dumping goods below the cost of production the duty is remitted or returned where there is evidence that the particular consignment in question is sold at a price equal to or exceeding the cost of production as defined in the Bill.

It may very well be that no order under (b) can be made applicable to the countries protected by the existence of most-favoured-nation clauses. To take an example: it would seem that, having regard to the provisions in the Italian treaty, it would be impossible so long as that treaty remains in existence to apply an order imposing a duty of 33½ per cent. under (b) on Italian silk on the ground of the state of the Italian exchange unless the same duty was made applicable to silk of all other origin, whatever might be the condition of the exchange with regard to the country in which the silk originated. It will be appreciated, however, that the countries from which competition arising out of collapsed exchanges is to be feared are in the main either enemy countries such as Germany, Austria or Hungary, in regard to which, of course, no treaty obligations now exist, or new countries such as Finland and Czechoslovakia, with which no treaty obligations have yet been entered into, and the question will not arise.

The case of orders under (a), however, is thought to be different, and it is in regard to such orders that difficulty would arise. The dumping provisions in the Bill will be permanent in character, and it would of course be highly inconvenient if, before effect could be given to them, we found ourselves under the necessity of denouncing any treaty we might have entered into with any country from which dumping was practised. It is suggested that a distinction can be drawn between orders made under (a) and those made under (b). This distinction lies in the fact that, should an order be made in regard to the dumping of any article, then, though that article becomes liable to a duty of 33½ per cent., any consignment of such articles would, in fact, secure exemption under the provisions contained in section 4 of the Bill, provided that it is proved to be sold in the United Kingdom at a price not less than its domestic selling price. It is contended that such an order does not penalise imported articles as a class, but only such articles as are dumped into the United Kingdom. In regard to all other goods of the same description, the duty prescribed in the order is either remitted or returned under section 4, and it is submitted therefore that, in making the order, duties have not been imposed on goods in contravention of most-favoured-nation treatment. For example, what the American Treaty precludes is a different duty on American than, say, Swedish steel, whereas under any order made under (a) American steel pays no higher or other duty than Swedish steel, unless it is dumped. To put it in another way, the Bill in effect gives power to impose a duty on all articles, irrespective of their origin, if they are dumped, and therefore can it be said that a higher or other duty is being imposed upon the goods of any particular country which does not equally apply to the goods of all other countries? It is true that a particular order, while, for example, imposing a duty on American steel, may not at the same time provide for any special duty on, say, Swedish steel, but that is only because evidence of dumping of Swedish steel may not have been forthcoming, but none the less there can be no doubt that, upon the necessary evidence being produced that dumping is taking place from any country to such an extent that employment in the United Kingdom is, or is likely to be, seriously affected, all such dumped articles will be subjected to the imposition of duty. It is assumed that, in the event of evidence of dumping from Sweden being forthcoming, the committee would be entitled to report in favour of a comprehensive order being made including both American and Swedish steel, the necessary steps of course being taken to revoke the previous American order.

It is proposed to make clear in the Bill, by an amendment to clause 9, that an order may relate to more than one country and more than one description of goods by inserting in line 31 on p. 7, after the word "order," the words "either wholly or as respects any country or article to which the order relates."

It is submitted that under the Bill it would be possible to make an order affecting two or more countries from which dumping was taking place if it could be shown that employment was being, or was likely to be, seriously affected by such dumping taken as a whole, even though evidence would fail to show that dumping from any one of the countries taken by itself would have this effect. And this being so, it is further submitted that it would be possible, on further enquiry being made, for the committee to replace a less comprehensive by a more comprehensive order.

It appears very material to consider the attitude which the United States have thought fit to adopt in construing their obligations under the Treaty of 1815. The United States Government have consistently held the view that they are under no obligation to grant to this country any special favours in the matter of customs duties which they had granted in return for specific compensation to other countries, and whilst many of the American treaties contain a reservation on the subject of advantages specially accorded to other countries in return for compensation, the Treaty of 1815, above referred to, contains no such clause. The American official view is that the omission from this and other treaties of such a reservation "by no means indicates in the absence of other evidence that they were meant to guarantee unconditional most-favoured-nation treatment."* The only positive words in the treaty upon which the Americans can and apparently do rely are the words in the preamble, that the convention was concluded "in such a manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory."

Acting on this view of their treaty obligations, the United States Government did in fact, under the Tariff Act of the 24th July, 1897, grant to certain countries in return for compensation reductions in duty on certain articles which they refused to accord to the United Kingdom without compensation.

An agreement was finally made in 1907 by which this country secured a reduced rate on some of these articles, but this was secured in return for facilities granted as regards the entry of samples brought by the commercial travellers of the United States. This agreement and all others made under the 1897 Tariff Act, however,

* Vide pages 398 and 402 of a report of the United States Tariff Commission on Reciprocity and Commercial Treaties.—Washington, 1919.

expired at various dates in 1909 and 1910, being denounced by the American Government on the coming into force of the Payne Tariff of 1909.

The existing American tariff authorises the Government to negotiate trading agreements with various countries, which have to be submitted to Congress for ratification or rejection, but so far as it is known no agreement reducing the rates of duty in favour of any country has been concluded under this Act.

His Majesty's Government has never agreed to the American interpretation of the most-favoured-nation clause. But the American interpretation is cited here to show that they do not attach a strictly literal significance to the phrase "higher or other duties."

Moreover, the fact that the United States have themselves recently adopted an anti-dumping measure may have some bearing on a decision in this matter. Under this measure, on its being certified by the Government that there is dumping of any particular article, that article becomes subject to duties varying with the differences between the dumping price in each case and the true market value in the country of export. It therefore follows that dumped steel from the United Kingdom might be subject to a higher anti-dumping duty than that from France, because the duty is intended to vary with the degree of undercutting aimed at by the dumping. This provision places it in the hands of the American Administration to impose differential duties on British products on their own reading of the evidence. The English Bill, on the other hand, makes the duty chargeable a fixed amount, which is the same for all consignors of the dumped article. It appears, therefore, that the English proposal approximates more closely to the strictest interpretation of the treaty than does the American practice.

In any order made under the English Act some country might not be included, on the ground that it was not dumping at the time that the order was made, but as soon as complaint was made of the dumping that case would be enquired into, and it is intended that on the dumping being proved a new order should replace the old to include that country as stated above.

Further, the action taken under the Sugar Convention may be of some relevancy to the interpretation of most-favoured-nation clauses in commercial treaties. Under this convention the signatory countries agreed to prohibit or impose duties on the importation of bounty-fed sugar, which duties were not the same for different countries, but varied according to the convention's opinion of the extent of the bounty given by each country. Thus, while the duty was the same for each consignment from a given country, the duties varied as between countries, and those varying duties were imposed by the countries signatory to the convention, despite most-favoured-nation clauses in commercial treaties entered into by certain of the countries taxed. It may therefore be held that by international consent most-favoured-nation clauses were assumed not to relate to the measures to prevent unfair competition.

The Law Officers are accordingly requested to advise the Board of Trade—

1. Whether, having regard to the terms of the American Treaty of 1815 and to the construction which the Americans themselves have placed upon that treaty, His Majesty's Government would contravene the most-favoured-nation clause of the treaty by issuing an order under section 2 (1) (a) of the Safeguarding of Industries Bill with regard to articles imported from America, there being no evidence of dumping from other countries at the time of making the order;
2. Whether, having regard to the terms of the Italian Treaty of 1883, the Belgian note of 1898, or the Japanese Treaty of 1911, the issue of orders under either section 2 (1) (a) or section 2 (1) (b) of the Bill with regard to articles imported from Italy, Belgium or Japan, as the case may be, would conflict with the obligations of His Majesty's Government under the treaty or note above referred to; and
3. Generally upon the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. W. Bowstead.

In the light of the information contained in our instructions, we are inclined to think, upon the whole, that measures applied impartially for the prevention of unfair competition cannot properly be considered a contravention of the most-favoured-nation clauses in commercial treaties. We therefore answer the questions as follows:—

1. No, we think not.
2. We think that the issue of orders under section 2 (1) (a) of the Bill with regard to articles imported from Italy, Belgium or Japan would not conflict, but that the issue of orders under section 2 (1) (b) would conflict, with the obligation of His Majesty's Government under the respective treaty or note.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
W. BOWSTEAD.

*Law Officers' Department,
June 30, 1921.*

[A 8195]

No. 1^F.

[File 6/1921]

[July 27, 1921.]

[Inland Revenue]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Reginald Hills.

THERE is a committee appointed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at present sitting and taking evidence in connection with the question as to the liability to United Kingdom taxation of Dominion and foreign Governments and their representatives. What passes before the committee is confidential. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have already appeared before the committee by their representative and may do so again. The following is an extract from the evidence of Mr. Browett, one of the assistant secretaries to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who was their representative before the committee:—

Foreign Governments -
trading in United Kingdom:
liability to United Kingdom
income tax.

"... The situation which may be created when foreign Governments as such carry on or control business or trade operations and derive therefrom income which would unquestionably be liable to taxation in the hands of a private trader.

"(11.) It may be observed that such a situation has been provided for, so far as concerns Germany, Austria, Hungary, Turkey and Bulgaria, by articles in the respective Treaties of Peace. Article 281 of the Treaty of Versailles provides that, if the German Government engages in international trade, it shall not in respect thereof have or be deemed to have any rights, privileges or immunities of sovereignty. Exactly corresponding articles appear in the treaties with the other four countries.

"These treaty provisions appear to be very significant in several aspects.

"If, indeed, the profits of a State's enterprise are in all circumstances necessarily exempt from the municipal taxation laws of other countries, it is easy, in the present times, to see the possibilities of a reductio ad absurdum. For, in the case of a Government nationalising all its industries and not recognising the existence of any purely private trader, the whole of the lawful profits made by its citizens might theoretically be profits of the Government, and therefore exempt. It occurs to the mind, for example, that difficult questions may hereafter arise in regard to trade carried on in this country under the auspices of the Russian Government."

There was put in also, as part of his evidence, a memorandum, of which the following is a copy:—

"Questions which might arise would presumably be considered from the standpoint of international law. In this connection it may be of interest to note that a recent article* in the 'Journal of Comparative Legislation and International Law' suggests that in France, Italy and Belgium (and particularly in the two latter countries) there has for the better part of a century been a tendency to put a narrower interpretation on the privilege of a foreign State. Three passages may be cited:—

* "State Immunity in the Laws of England, France, Italy and Belgium," by Professor F. P. Walton, LL.D., pp. 252-8 in the October 1920 number of the journal.

Italian Law.—So far as I can discover, the Italian courts were the first to adopt the distinction for which so many writers have contended between the sovereign acts of a foreign State and acts by the foreign State of a private nature.

"In a number of cases Italian Courts of Cassation have held that the principle of the independence of sovereign States is not violated by the Italian courts assuming jurisdiction over a foreign State in regard to liabilities incurred by such a State in performing acts which were not by nature governmental (see Journal de Droit international privé (Clunet), 1889, p. 335).

Belgian Law.—The same view has been adopted in Belgium, and is admirably stated in the judgment of the Cour de Cassation de Belgique of the 11th June, 1903 (Sirey, 1904, 4, 16, D. 1903, 2, 401, Journal de Droit international privé (Clunet), 1904, p. 417).

"The action was by a Belgian railway company against the Dutch Government in its character as administrator of the Dutch State Railway, and was a claim for restitution of a sum of money paid under a contract. There was no question of seizure of property, and the Court of Cassation of Belgium assumes, without deciding it, that the property of a foreign State cannot be attached. It declares that, even if this be so, it by no means follows that the Belgian courts are incompetent. If a Belgian citizen gets a judgment against the Belgian State itself, he cannot seize the State property in execution, any more than a French citizen can seize French Government property (Berthelemy, H., Droit administratif, 8th edition, p. 520). All the same, the State pays its debts. Why may we not expect a foreign State to do the same? The moral effect of a judgment is considerable, and the public conscience in the foreign State would not allow it to repudiate its debts. But probably the next step will be to allow the attachment of property of the foreign State if this property is within the jurisdiction, and if it is not of a kind specially appropriated to the State's sovereign activities, such as, e.g., the buildings of an embassy or a battleship.

"This step the Italian courts have already taken in the cases previously mentioned.

"Conclusion The French jurisprudence is against the possibility of making the distinction referred to between sovereign acts and other acts. But the principal case is an old one, and the question there was as to an act which might be considered as of a sovereign character. (Cass. 22, janvier 1849, D. 49, 1, 81.)

"In the eighty years which have elapsed since its date, there has been a decided change in the practices of States, and a consequent change of opinion on the matter among legal writers. The change of opinion among professional writers has led the courts in Belgium, Italy and Egypt to adopt what may be called the new view—that is, that the foreign State as a trader has no immunity, and it is quite likely that the French courts will abandon their former attitude. Already in France, in cases against a foreign State arising out of its administration of a State railway, the custom is for the foreign State not to take the plea of incompetence. (See Cass., le 31 mars 1874, Sirey, 1874, 1, 385; Cass., le 12 novembre 1877, Sirey, 1879, 1, 349; Cass., le 5 mai 1885, Sirey, 1886, 1, 353, Dalloz., 1885, 341.)"

Having regard especially to the apparent tendency in some foreign countries to distinguish the position of foreign Governments when performing acts of a governmental nature from their position when performing acts of a non-governmental nature, such as when trading, &c., the Commissioners of Inland Revenue desire to be advised on the following points:—

1. Whether a foreign Government carrying on trade within the United Kingdom is liable to assessment to income tax in the United Kingdom in respect of (a) the profits of such trade; (b) the buildings, &c., occupied for the purposes of such trade, and, if liable, whether the liability can be enforced.
2. Whether a foreign Government carrying on trade within the United Kingdom—(a) through an agent resident in the United Kingdom, or (b) through an agent resident abroad acting in the United Kingdom through an agent resident in the United Kingdom—is liable to assessment to income tax in the United Kingdom in respect of the profits of such trade in the name of the agent resident in the United Kingdom, and, if so liable, whether the liability can be enforced.

3. Whether a foreign corporation carrying on a business, which in truth and in fact is its own business, is liable to assessment to income tax in the United Kingdom so far as its business is carried on in the United Kingdom when the whole of the shares are held by a foreign Government, either in its own name or in the names of nominees on its behalf, either when such foreign Government had the corporation incorporated for the purpose of acquiring the business of the foreign Government, the foreign Government retaining supreme control in its character of shareholder, or when such foreign Government acquired by purchase all the shares in an already existing corporation.

If the Law Officers are of opinion that any case at all can be made out for liability where the position is one of non-governmental acts by the foreign Government, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue would be glad to be advised on what grounds such case might possibly be made out.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Reginald Hills.

We will answer the questions put to us in their order:—

1. No, in regard to each case put. The answer follows from the opinion given on the 19th September, 1919, in the case of the Siamese Government.

2. No, in regard to each case put. The liability is the liability of the foreign principal who carries on the trade, and the assessment through an agent is merely machinery to hit the foreign principal, who is the true taxpayer.

3. Assuming a corporation like a company registered under the Companies Acts and having relations with its shareholders like those existing between such a company and its shareholders, the mere ownership by a foreign Government of all the shares in the corporation would not, in our opinion, render the corporation exempt from liability in respect of a trade exercised by it in this country. We think this principle is well established by such cases as Kodak (Limited) v. Clark (1903, 1 K.B. 505), Gramophone and Typewriter Company (Limited) v. Stanley (1908, 2 K.B. 89), and the more recent case of Sansom v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the Court of Appeal.

But there may be other circumstances identifying the foreign Government with the corporation besides the mere ownership of the shares, and we must reserve our view of the liability of any particular corporation until the facts are before us.

Generally on the case, it may be noted that Westlake (vol. 1, p. 277) insists upon the wide view which English authorities have taken of the exemption of foreign States and their representatives from the municipal law of this country (illustrated very recently in the "Porte Alexandre," 1920, p. 30), and that this exemption is based in principle upon the equality and sovereignty of all States within the comity of nations (Oppenheim, vol. 1 (3rd edition), p. 197). In this connection we doubt the relevance to income tax questions of the distinction made, in the opinion of the Solicitor-General of New Zealand, between immunity from suit and immunity from legal liability. Jurisdiction of courts, just as much as liability to taxation, depends on law, and the cases which so clearly establish the exemption of foreign States from such jurisdiction involve exemption from law. Foreign States are exempted from taxation under municipal law because taxation is regarded as an infringement of their sovereignty and equality, and, from this standpoint, subjection to income tax and subjection to suit, i.e., to the jurisdiction of courts, do not, in our opinion, materially differ. The English authorities, we may add, give no countenance for present purposes to the distinction suggested between a State in its normal political capacity and the State in its capacity as a trader (see the "Parlement belge" (L.R. 5, P.D. 197) and the "Porte Alexandre" above cited).

In conclusion, we are not to be taken as expressing dissent from the suggestions on policy made in the extracts from Mr. Browett's evidence and memorandum which are before us. It is clear that the development of trading in this country by foreign States raises questions of far-reaching practical importance both to the Revenue and to other Departments of State. All we mean is that, so far as legal liability under the Income Tax Acts is involved, the profits of such trading must be reached by a change in the municipal law of this country, and this change we do not think can be expected from judicial decisions, but will require legislation.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
REGINALD HILLS.

Law Officers' Department,
July 27, 1921.

[W 9304]

No. 1^a.

[File 1308/1921]

[August 5, 1921.]

[Colonial Office.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, July 22, 1921.

Proposed amendment of British North America
Act: Powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canadian Parliament

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Churchill to acknowledge the receipt of your report of the 31st May* relative to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial jurisdiction.

2. Mr. Churchill notes that you are unable to suggest any formula which would at the same time satisfy the desires of the Canadian Government and be free from objection on constitutional grounds. It would not, however, in his opinion, be desirable to object to the formula proposed by the Canadian Government on the constitutional ground that it would reverse the fundamental rule that Colonial legislation must, prima facie, relate exclusively to the Colony. Having regard to the present status of the Dominions, he feels that it can hardly be expected that the Canadian Government should be content that the Canadian Parliament should remain subject to the limitations of a Colonial legislature.

3. He does not himself see any difficulty, in principle, to complying with the wishes of the Canadian Government, as explained in the despatch from the Governor-General of the 1st September, 1920, and in the Debates in the Canadian Parliament enclosed in the Reference of the 2nd November, 1920, especially in view of the statement contained in the despatch of the 1st September, 1920, as to the intention of the words "otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament."

4. Doubts were expressed in regard to the formula proposed by the Canadian Government by certain Departments of His Majesty's Government in the letters forwarded in the Reference of the 2nd November, 1920, but those letters were written before the subsequent explanations of the Canadian Government were communicated to those Departments.

5. Mr. Churchill would, in any event, be reluctant to refuse a request put forward by the Canadian Government with the endorsement of the Canadian Parliament. He would, therefore, be glad to be in a position to inform them that His Majesty's Government will introduce legislation on the lines desired, and if the formula proposed by the Canadian Government does not go beyond the wishes and intentions explained in the despatch of the 1st September, 1920, and in the Debates in the Canadian Parliament, he does not himself see any reason why such intimation should not be made.

6. In these circumstances, he would be glad if you would advise him whether the proposed formula goes beyond the expressed wishes and intentions of the Canadian Government. Should the answer to this question be in the affirmative, and should you still find it impossible to suggest another formula for giving effect to those wishes and intentions, he thinks that it will be necessary to furnish the Canadian Government with a detailed statement of the difficulties to which the proposed formula, as a means of carrying out their wishes and intentions, gives rise, and he would be obliged if you could assist him in this respect.

I am, &c.

H. LAMBERT.

* See No. 1 B.

Report.

The proposed formula does, in our opinion, go beyond the expressed wishes and intentions of the Canadian Government, particularly in view of the doubt as to what would be held to be the effect of the words "otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament." We have already expressed our opinion as to these words in our Report dated the 13th July, 1920.

We have again considered the question of suggesting an alternative formula, and beg to report that an Act of the Imperial Parliament might be passed to amend "The British North America Act, 1867," in terms which would, in our opinion, give effect to the expressed intention of the Canadian Government, as explained by Mr. Doherty and Mr. Newcomb, without being open to objection on constitutional grounds.

We are of opinion that the Address of both Houses of Parliament of Canada may be accepted with the substitution of the following for clause 2 of the proposed Act, namely:—

"2. An enactment of the Parliament of Canada may operate extra-territorially provided that, and in so far as, such extra-territorial operation is ancillary to, and necessary for, its enforcement as a law for the peace, order and good government of Canada."

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
August 5, 1921.

GERMANY.

No. 1^u.

[C 4297]

[File 104/1921]

[January) 192]

[Board of Trade.]

Further Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Branson.

HEREWITH are sent the papers previously laid before counsel, with the opinion thereon and copy of case as settled. A copy of the opinion and of the case as settled by counsel was forwarded to the Board, and the following are copy minutes written in relation thereto:—

"Read. You may be interested to read this case. I do not feel altogether happy about the paragraph at the head of p. 3; this could not be maintained if confronted with the minutes of the sub-commission.

"H. J. H.

"December 31, 1920.

"Mr. Payne."

"I do not think that the part in red brackets at the top of p. 3 should stand. The persons concerned undoubtedly believe that the German legislation was very much on the same lines as English legislation. I believe the statement that most other Allied countries had passed similar legislation before the armistice could not be supported. France, for example, could, I believe, only place property under sequestration.

"H. A. P.

"December 24, 1920.

"The Solicitor."

* Confidential 11810, p. 44.

Restitution
in specie of
British
property in Germany
under article 297
of Treaty of Peace.

"It will be necessary to submit the draft case again to counsel to resettle in the light of the foregoing observations, and, having regard to the opinion, a slight modification may have to be made in the wording of p. 3, which I have indicated by double pencil lines. Before this is done I should be glad if the blanks on p. 6 of the draft case could be filled in.

"T. J. B."

The following memorandum was prepared in the Companies Department:—

"I have obtained from Mr. Park, who assisted Mr. Bowyer with regard to the Trading with the Enemy Committee, the figures of the cases which were considered by the Committee.

"The Law Officers appear to desire the figures relating only to 'The Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916,' and, according to the figures obtained, 979 cases were considered by the committee, of which 71 related to cancellation of contract. This would leave a total of 908 cases. In 554 of these cases winding-up orders were made. In three cases orders were made prohibiting the business from being carried on, and it will be seen that in 98 cases the committee recommended that the enemy interest should be vested for sale to British subjects.

"The figures, therefore, for insertion in the Law Officers' opinion are:—

"Cases considered by the committee	...	908
"Orders to wind up	...	554
"Orders to prohibit business being carried on	...	3
"Cases in which no order was made (except in some cases a vesting order)	...	351

"I attach a copy of the report made by the Trading with the Enemy Committee dated the 16th April, 1918, also a copy of the total figures which have been forwarded to me by Mr. Park."

There has been indicated in counsel's copy of the draft case the amendments suggested in Mr. Payne's minute and the paragraph which may necessitate a consequential alteration indicated in the solicitor's minute. The figures on p. 6 of the draft have also been inserted in pencil, but counsel are not troubled with the reports or figures referred to in the last paragraph of the minute from Companies Department.

The papers were accordingly submitted to Mr. Branson to resettle the draft case, and the following is a copy of his opinion:—

"The new minute placed before me raised a very important question. The submission made on the top of p. 3 of the draft is, in my view, of cardinal importance to the decision of the case, but, on the other hand, of course it would not be proper to put it forward if it does not correctly represent the facts. I think, therefore, that the draft should be resubmitted to the Law Officers. I am not sure whether I am to take Mr. Payne's minute of the 24th December as definite instructions that the sub-committee believed that German legislation was on the same lines as the British, or whether he is merely stating his belief on the question. If the latter be the case, I think that the Law Officers should see the minutes of the sub-committee referred to in Mr. Hutchinson's minute of the 21st December, and should have definite instructions as to what was the belief of the sub-commission on the matter.

"G. A. H. BRANSON.

"The Temple, January 10, 1921."

Mr. Branson's opinion was submitted to the Department for the purposes of obtaining the further information for submission to the Law Officers, and the following is copy of a minute by Mr. Payne:—

"As regards my minute of the 24th December: What was meant was that in my opinion the persons who drew up the reply to the German observations believed that German legislation was on the same lines as English legislation. The reply was not drawn up by the sub-commission, but, so far as I recollect, by myself and the French representative on the sub-commission, and was later approved by the other delegations of the principal Allied and Associated Powers.

No minutes were kept of the discussion in drawing up the reply, and the minutes of the sub-commission in drawing up the clause in the treaty contain no reference to this point. These minutes do, however, indicate that the object of the clause was to exclude British nationals from the right to return of property which had been liquidated in Germany, while according that right to French nationals because German property had not been liquidated in France. (See marked paragraphs on pp. 239 and 244.)"

The following are the paragraphs referred to:—

"Minutes of Second Meeting, March 17, 1919

"In explaining the joint text, the British delegate stated that it included both the French and British views regarding liquidation, and that there was no substantial alteration in principle from the original texts. The principal difference between the original French and British proposals was dealt with in the new project in article Z, paragraph (f). This paragraph provided that where liquidation provisions had not been put into force in an Allied or Associated State, such a State should have the right to demand the return of property of its nationals in Germany which had been sold. For example, France would be able to demand the return of specific property in Germany which had been sold, while England, who had generally wound up enemy property, would be excluded from similar privileges."

"Minutes of Fourth Meeting, March 25, 1919.

"Mr. Payne presented a new wording of article Z, paragraph (g), as follows:—

"(g.) The rights conferred in paragraph (f) are reserved to owners who are nationals of Allied or Associated States within whose territories legislative measures providing for the liquidation of enemy businesses or property were not in operation before the signature of the armistice."

"To this paragraph Mr. Palmer entered a reservation, stating that the position of the United States was that every national of any Allied or Associated State should be entitled to have his property in Germany restored if he so desired.

"The Roumanian and Serbian delegates did not wish article Z, paragraph (g), to exclude the application of paragraph (f) to their respective States, bearing in mind that, owing to the circumstances of the war, it had not been possible up to the present to take measures of liquidation in their countries.

"Mr. Payne desired to have the principle retained, and agreed to try to devise an appropriate wording by which Great Britain would be excluded from the restoration of enemy property which had been wound up, while leaving this course open to Serbia, Belgium, Roumania, the United States and other States in which liquidation had not been put into operation."

The Law Officers and Mr. Branson are requested to consider the foregoing observations and to resettle the draft case.

It should be noted that under the arrangement with the Germans the British case has to be submitted to M. Borell by the 19th January. M. Borell is coming over to London shortly, and it may be possible, of course, to hand it to him; but it will be apparent to counsel that the matter is one of extreme urgency.

The Law Officers and Mr. Branson are requested to settle draft case accordingly.

Opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Branson.

The whole point in the present dispute is whether paragraphs (f) and (g) of article 297 of the Treaty of Versailles enure for the benefit of British nationals, and the draft case was settled by us to support the contention that it did. We now find from the entries on pp. 239 and 244 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Economic Commission—which minutes are now brought to our attention for the first time—that the wording of paragraph (f) was deliberately selected with the intention, in the words of the second minute, of excluding Great Britain from the restoration of enemy property which had been wound up. In view of these minutes, we do not see how it is possible to put forward the argument contained in the draft case in the passage between square brackets, or indeed the argument in the rest of the case either. It may be that something transpired subsequently—which is not before us—which would justify the putting forward of the argument in square brackets, in which event the draft could stand; but the argument in the passage in square brackets is vital to the case, and if it must come out, as it clearly must in view of the minutes in question if they stand unaffected, the whole case may as well be abandoned at once.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
G. A. H. BRANSON.

Law Officers' Department,
January 19, 1921.

JAPAN.

[F 2316]

No. 2.

[File 63/1921]

[June 24, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 17, 1921.

Termination
of Anglo-
Japanese Alliance,
1911.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to submit, for your opinion, the papers shown on the attached list, respecting the date of termination of the Anglo-Japanese Agreement of the 13th July, 1911 (Paper (A)).

2. The first two paragraphs of article 6 of that agreement run as follows:—

"The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature and remain in force for ten years from that date.

"In case neither of the High Contracting Parties should have notified twelve months before the expiration of the said ten years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the High Contracting Parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war, the alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded."

3. On the 8th July, 1920, a joint communication from the Governments of Great Britain and Japan was addressed to the League of Nations to the effect that, if the Anglo-Japanese Agreement of 1911 were continued after the 13th July, 1921, it must be in a form not inconsistent with the Covenant of the League. The text of the joint notification runs as follows:—

"The Governments of Great Britain and Japan have come to the conclusion that the Anglo-Japanese Agreement of the 13th July, 1911, now existing between the two countries, though in harmony with the spirit of the Covenant of the League of Nations, is not entirely consistent with the letter of that Covenant, which both Governments earnestly desire to respect. They accordingly have the honour, jointly, to inform the League that they recognise the principle that, if the said agreement be continued after July 1921, it must be in a form which is not inconsistent with that Covenant."

4. The question has now arisen whether or not the joint notification of the 8th July, 1920, constitutes notice of termination within the meaning of article 6 of the agreement, i.e., whether, in view of that notification, the agreement will expire automatically on the 13th July next, unless renewed in the interval, or will continue in force until one year from the date on which specific notice of termination is given by one of the contracting parties.

5. This Department have hitherto been acting on the assumption that the joint notification should in fact be held to constitute the notice required under article 6. This view has been based on the reasoning that, from the wording of the joint notification, it results that the agreement cannot be continued after the 13th July next in its present form; that consequently it must either be modified—i.e., a new agreement be entered into—or that it must terminate on that date.

6. This view has been definitely placed on record in a note addressed by the Secretary of State to the Japanese Ambassador on the 8th June (Paper (G)).

7. It will be observed, however, from the correspondence enclosed in the present letter (Papers (B), (C), (D), (E) and (F)) that the Japanese Government are inclined to question the view hitherto held by this Department.

8. Earl Curzon would accordingly be glad of an authoritative ruling on the subject; and, the matter being one of considerable urgency, I have the honour to request that he may be favoured with your opinion at your early convenience.

I have, &c.

VICTOR WELLESLEY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Anglo-Japanese Agreement, July 13, 1911 (Treaty Series No. 18, 1911, Cd. 5735).
- (B.) To Sir C. Eliot, No. 104, Telegraphic, May 13, 1921 (F 1797/63/23).
- (C.) Sir C. Eliot, No. 180, Telegraphic, May 21, 1921 (F 1969/63/23).
- (D.) Sir C. Eliot, No. 191, Telegraphic, May 27, 1921 (F 2034/63/23).
- (E.) Sir C. Eliot, No. 198, Telegraphic, May 31, 1921 (F 2025/63/23).
- (F.) Sir C. Eliot, No. 118, Telegraphic, June 7, 1921 (F 2025/63/23).
- (G.) To Baron Hayashi, June 8, 1921 (F 2025/63/23).

Report.

In our opinion the joint communication of the 8th July, 1920, addressed to the League of Nations does constitute a notification within article 6 by both the High Contracting Parties of an intention to terminate the agreement on the 13th July, 1921, unless in the meantime a new agreement should be entered into, and consequently the agreement will expire automatically on the last-mentioned date unless it is renewed in the interval.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
June 24, 1921.

[F 2299]

No. 3.

[File 63/1921]

[July 1, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Lord Chancellor.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the Lord Chancellor, and begs to transmit herewith, for the latter's concurrence, a revised draft of a note to the Japanese Ambassador respecting the Anglo-Japanese Agreement.

Lord Curzon desires to call the Lord Chancellor's special attention to the draft joint notification to be addressed to the League of Nations. Lord Curzon would be glad if these papers could be returned at once, so that the note may reach the Japanese Ambassador not later than to-morrow, the 2nd July.

Foreign Office, July 1, 1921.

Draft to the Japanese Ambassador (as amended by the Lord Chancellor).

Your Excellency,

Foreign Office, 1921.

1. SINCE the despatch of my note to your Excellency of the 27th June respecting the date of termination of the Anglo-Japanese Agreement of the 13th July, 1911, His Majesty's Government have been giving renewed consideration to the question of the interpretation to be placed on the joint notification addressed to the League of Nations by our two Governments on the 8th July, 1920.

[8214]

F

Termination of Anglo-Japanese Alliance,
1911.

2. The opinion expressed by His Majesty's Government on this point in the note above referred to rested on the advice tendered to them by their highest legal experts; but, as a result of a more mature study of the political considerations involved by such a reading of the notification, His Majesty's Government are prepared to waive their original point of view and to fall in with that taken by the Japanese Government as regards the interpretation to be placed on that instrument.

2. His Majesty's Government recognise that the matters referred to are by no means free from difficulty. They have given full consideration to the view expressed by the Japanese Government in the opposite sense to that held by His Majesty's Government; and are no longer prepared to insist upon their own original interpretation when made so clearly aware that the Japanese Government in writing the joint notification to the League of Nations of the 8th July, 1920, had no intention of denouncing the agreement under the terms of article 6 thereof.

3. I therefore hasten to enclose a revised draft of the further notification to the League of Nations, recast so as to meet the altered circumstances of the case.

Joint Notification.

WHEREAS the Governments of Great Britain and Japan informed the League of Nations in their joint notification of the 8th July, 1920, that they recognised the principle that if the Anglo-Japanese Alliance Agreement of the 13th July, 1911, is continued after July 1921 it must be in a form which is not inconsistent with the Covenant of the League, they hereby notify the League, pending further action, that they are agreed that if any situation arises whilst the agreement remains in force in which the procedure prescribed by the terms of the agreement is inconsistent with the procedure prescribed by the Covenant of the League of Nations, then the procedure prescribed by the said Covenant shall be adopted and shall prevail over that prescribed by the agreement.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

[W 10697]

No. 3^d.

[Colonial Office.]

[File 8768/1921]

[September 21, 1921.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, August 22, 1921.

IN your report of the 18th February, 1921,* you advised the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that in your opinion it was impossible, in view of the commercial treaties with Italy and Portugal, and of other treaties in similar terms, to extend to Palestine the preference granted in the United Kingdom to goods grown, produced or manufactured in the British Empire. The report in question further stated that Palestine would appear to fall within paragraph 4 of article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, and not within paragraph 6, and that in your opinion Great Britain as a mandatory was in the position of a trustee of the League.

2. The question has now arisen whether there is any objection, on account of the provisions of the commercial treaties referred to above, to the grant of preference in the United Kingdom to goods grown, produced or manufactured in other territories administered or to be administered under a mandate by His Majesty's Government and the Governments of the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand and the Union of South Africa. The territories in question fall into two categories, viz.:

- (a.) Those which are to be administered under what are known as "B" mandates, i.e., East Africa (British), Togoland (British) and the Cameroons (British). The draft mandates relating to these territories are enclosed herewith; they have not yet been approved by the Council of the League of Nations;

* See No. 5.

- (b.) Those which are administered under what are known as "C" mandates, viz., German South-West Africa, German Samoa, Nauru and the German possessions in the Pacific Ocean situated south of the Equator other than German Samoa and Nauru.

The mandates in respect of these territories have been approved by the Council of the League of Nations. Copies are enclosed herewith.

3. The "B" mandates have been drawn up in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, whilst the "C" mandates have been drawn up under paragraph 6 of the same article.

4. It would appear from your report of the 18th February, already referred to, that the test whether preference in the United Kingdom can be extended to the products of mandated territories is whether such territories are or are not foreign countries in relation to the United Kingdom. The terms of the draft mandates in the case of territories to be administered under "B" mandates, and of the mandates in the case of territories administered under "C" mandates, accordingly require consideration, and I am to call attention to the following paragraphs, viz.: in the case of East Africa (British), articles 3, 7 and 10; in the case of Togoland and the Cameroons, articles 2, 6 and 9; and in the case of the other territories, article 2.

5. I am to request you to be good enough to take the papers into your consideration and advise the Secretary of State whether in your opinion there is any objection to the grant of preference in the United Kingdom to goods which are the produce of—

- (a.) Territories to be administered under "B" mandates (assuming the provisions of the draft mandates remain substantially in their present form);
(b.) Territories administered under "C" mandates.

I am also to ask for any observations which you may be good enough to offer on the subject generally.

I am, &c.

HENRY LAMBERT.

List of Papers.

- (A.)—Draft Mandate for East Africa (British). (Miscellaneous No. 14, 1921.) [Cmd. 1284.]
(B.)—Draft Mandates for Togoland (British) and the Cameroons (British). [Cmd. 1350.]
(C.)—Mandate for German Possessions in the Pacific Ocean, situated south of the Equator, other than German Samoa and Nauru. (Miscellaneous No. 5, 1921.) [Cmd. 1201.]
(D.)—Mandate for Nauru. (Miscellaneous No. 6, 1921.) [Cmd. 1202.]
(E.)—Mandate for German Samoa. (Miscellaneous No. 7, 1921.) [Cmd. 1203.]
(F.)—Mandate for German South-West Africa. (Miscellaneous No. 8, 1921.) [Cmd. 1204.]

Report.

In our opinion there is no objection to the grant of preference in the United Kingdom to the goods which are the produce of (a) territories to be administered under "B" mandates, assuming that the provisions of the draft mandates remain substantially in their present form, or (b) territories administered under "C" mandates. Neither of these classes of territories can in our opinion be regarded as "foreign countries."

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
September 21, 1921.

1921

(32)

NORWAY.

No. 4.

[N 3626]

[File 314/1921]

[March 21, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 10, 1921.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, to request the favour of your advice on the following matter:—

Draft
Mining Regulation-for Spitsbergen.

2. For several years the position of Spitsbergen has presented a problem which it would evidently be desirable to settle. Since the abandonment of certain ancient and rather shadowy claims to sovereignty over the islands, Spitsbergen has been a terra nullius, and no form of government has existed there. Of recent years, however, the reported mineral wealth of the islands has led to their being prospected by companies and individuals of different nationalities, some of whom staked out claims and commenced development work, although in the absence of any form of government it was impossible for them to acquire a definite legal title, and conflicting claims were naturally far from uncommon. Claimants usually notified the claims which they had staked out to the Foreign Office of their own country, and such notification constituted the only means of recording a claim. Among these claimants were two English companies, the Northern Exploration Company and the Scottish Spitsbergen Syndicate.

3. Various attempts have been made in the past to provide for the establishment of some sufficiently settled form of government in the islands and for the settlement of these disputed claims. The last of these attempts was made by a conference which met at Christiania in the summer of 1914, but failed to arrive at an agreement.

4. The question was taken up again at the Peace Conference at Paris, when it was finally agreed that Spitsbergen should be placed under the sovereignty of Norway, subject to the investigation of existing claims by an arbitral commission. With this object a treaty was signed at Paris on the 9th February, 1920, of which a copy is enclosed (Paper A). I am to call your particular attention to the provisions of Articles 6 and 8 and the Annex. You will observe that claimants whose claims have been recognised as valid under the Annex are to receive from the Norwegian Government "a valid title securing to them the exclusive property in the land in question, in accordance with the laws and regulations in force or to be enforced in the territory specified in Article 1 of the present Treaty, and subject to the mining regulations referred to in Article 8" (Annex 1 (9), 2 (11)). Under Article 8 the draft mining regulations referred to were to be communicated by the Norwegian Government to the other Contracting Powers, who were to have the right to propose modifications which were to be submitted if necessary to examination and the decision of a commission. The treaty was not to come into force until the mining regulations had been approved.

5. The Norwegian Government consider the assent of His Majesty's Government to the proposed mining regulations to be of particular importance in view of the extent of the British claims in Spitsbergen, and submitted the draft regulations to them before their official communication to the Powers concerned, in order that, if possible, the Norwegian Government might be in a position to submit regulations to which the approval of His Majesty's Government was already assured. The draft regulations were considered by the Board of Trade, who communicated them to the two English companies for their observations. The Board of Trade are now of opinion (Paper B) that the draft mining regulations in the form shown in that paper, and subject to certain further modifications with which it is not necessary to trouble you, are acceptable. The Scottish Spitsbergen Syndicate have also expressed their willingness to accept the regulations.

6. The Northern Exploration Company have, however, raised the most far-reaching objections (see Papers C and D). Under the system provided for by the mining regulations the right to prospect for minerals will be open to all; a person who has discovered minerals by prospecting may obtain from the authorities a mining claim which gives him the exclusive right to work for minerals in the area covered by the claim, but this right is lost unless a sufficient amount of work is done on the claim. If the claim is located on land the property of which is in someone else, the proprietor has the right to participate in the working of the claim to the extent of one-fourth, sharing expenses and profits. As regards previously acquired claims which have been recognised under Article 6 and the Annex to the Treaty, the position will (under paragraph 35 of the regulations) be that for five years the owners whose title is recognised will have the exclusive right of prospecting, and during that period will be entitled to be granted as many mining claims on their land as they may apply for, subject to certain information as to the mineral deposits which it is proposed to work being given. Mining claims so granted will, however, be subject to the general provision that they are lost by a failure to work them. After the period of five years the proprietors will have the same right as anyone else to prospect and apply for mining claims on so much of their land as is not covered by mining claims which they have already obtained, but this right will not be exclusive, though they will be entitled to participate in the working of a claim on their land granted to anyone else, as explained above.

NORWAY.

33

7. It is to the situation which will thus be created by the mining regulations that the Northern Exploration Company take objection, on the ground that they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Treaty referred to in paragraph 4 above. Their attitude is put quite plainly in their letter of the 27th January to the Board of Trade, which will be found in Paper C, where they state that "in view of paragraph (1), section 9, of the Annex, it would certainly seem that original owners should have the absolute and exclusive right to their properties without liability other than export duty and charges in connection with surveys and with the International Commission," and urge that the mining regulations should be amended in such a manner as to secure to original successful claimants recognised by the Commission, a "clear unfettered title." In other words, they claim to receive a title which will give them the absolute right to develop the land or not as they may please, and to exclude any other person from developing it should they fail to do so. The importance of this contention and of the results which would ensue if it were accepted may be judged from the fact that the company's claims are stated to cover 5,000 square miles, of which only a small portion has so far been developed at all. The views of the Board of Trade on this contention are given in their letter of the 1st February, 1921, which will be found in Paper D.

8. The contention put forward by the company is certainly not in accordance with the intentions with which the Treaty was drafted. There can be no doubt that even had the representatives of the claimants' countries been prepared to put forward any such contention, the Norwegian Government would have refused, and, in his Lordship's opinion, would properly have refused, to accept any such proposal. It was certainly intended that provisions such as those now in question, intended to further the development of the mineral resources of Spitsbergen, might be included in the mining regulations to be enacted by the Norwegian Government, the position of the claimants being amply safeguarded by the provision requiring the regulations to be submitted in draft for the approval of the Powers concerned.

9. In these circumstances, Lord Curzon would have had no hesitation in declining to put forward the contention of the company or to endeavour to obtain an amendment of the mining regulations in the sense desired, but, as will be seen from Paper D, the company, on receiving the Board of Trade's letter of the 1st February, obtained an opinion from Sir John Simon and Mr. Horace Rowlands, which appears to support the company's contention to the fullest extent. It will be seen that these eminent counsel are of opinion that the words of Annex 1 (9) and 2 (11) require that the regulations referred to in Article 8 should be confined to regulations laying down the methods of mining to be adopted and measures to be taken for the protection of workmen, &c. It is not stated in the opinion what meaning is to be attached to the words "the laws and regulations in force or to be enforced in the territories," to which the claimants' title is equally to be subject, and though it is suggested that the regulations might also provide for a scheme for staking out claims in property not already appropriated by the terms of the Treaty to private owners such as the company, it is not clear on this interpretation why the title should be expressed to be subject to such a scheme if it was not to apply to the land in which the claimant's property is recognised. I am to add that his Lordship has not seen a copy of the case submitted to Sir John Simon, but it may be doubted whether the facts were put before him as fully as they have been detailed above.

10. The situation which would arise if this opinion were to be acted upon is discussed in the minutes on Paper D, and I am to add that there can be little doubt that if His Majesty's Government were to insist on the contention of the company, it would result in the Norwegian Government declining to accept the sovereignty over Spitsbergen on such terms, so that the settlement of the status of the islands would again be postponed, a result to be deprecated on every ground. In view, however, of the eminence of the learned counsel consulted by the company, his Lordship feels that before deciding what action to take in the matter it is essential that he should be in possession of your opinion as to whether the interpretation put upon the Treaty by the company is really the correct one.

1921

34

NORWAY.

11. I have therefore to request you to be so good as to take the enclosed papers into consideration and to favour his Lordship with your advice on the following points:—

(1.) Whether the provisions of the mining regulations referred to in paragraph 6 of this letter, and particularly paragraph 35 of those regulations, are inconsistent with the Treaty, and especially with Annex 1 (9) and 2 (11).

(2.) Whether on a proper construction of the Treaty the mining regulations must be confined to matters such as the methods of mining to be adopted and the measures to be taken for the protection of workmen.

(3.) Whether, if your answers to the above questions are in favour of the company's contention, the company are nevertheless entitled to require His Majesty's Government to adopt it and press it on the Norwegian Government, in view of the fact that it is certainly not consistent with the intention of the parties to the Treaty.

12. His Lordship would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

13. The Norwegian Government are pressing for the observations of His Majesty's Government on the draft mining regulations, and his Lordship would therefore be grateful if your opinion could be furnished at your early convenience.

I have, &c.

J. D. GREGORY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Treaty relating to Spitsbergen, February 9, 1920.
- (B.) Board of Trade to Foreign Office, February 5, 1921 (N 1679/314/30). In original with minutes.
- (C.) Northern Exploration Company (Limited) to Foreign Office, February 9, 1921 (N 1895/314/30). In original with minutes.
- (D.) Northern Exploration Company (Limited) to Foreign Office, February 15, 1921 (N 2344/314/30). In original with minutes.

Report.

(1.) In our opinion the provisions in question of the mining regulations are not inconsistent with the Treaty. The Annex 1 (9) and 2 (11) provides that claimants whose claims have been recognised shall have a valid title securing to them the exclusive property in the land, in accordance with the laws and regulations in force or to be enforced in the territories, and subject to the mining regulations referred to in Article 8 of the Treaty. There is nothing in Article 8 restricting the regulations to be made to the matters referred to in the joint opinion of Sir John Simon and Mr. Horace Rowlands, and it seems to us that the regulations objected to by the Northern Exploration Company are not only authorised by the Treaty, but are perfectly proper regulations for a place like Spitsbergen. The joint opinion referred to seems to be based on the assumption that the Treaty ought to be interpreted in the light of the English law of real property.

(2.) No.

(3.) Does not arise. But in any case His Majesty's Government is not bound to press the company's contention on the Norwegian Government in view of the fact that it is known to be contrary to the known intentions of the parties to the Treaty.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
March 21, 1921.

(35)

PALESTINE.

[E 2209]

No. 5.

[File 522/1921]

[February 18, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 8, 1921.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request your advice on the question whether it is possible, consistently with the commercial treaties to which this country is a party, to extend to goods imported from Palestine the preferential duties which are at present enjoyed by goods consigned from and grown, produced or manufactured in the British Empire.

Preferential Treatment
in United Kingdom of goods imported from
Palestine.

2. This question has been raised in a despatch from the High Commissioner (Paper A), and a copy of the "Notice to Importers" which is referred to in Sir Herbert's Samuel's despatch is enclosed (Paper B). The question is discussed in a letter from the Board of Trade of the 10th January (Paper C), and copies of article 2 of the Commercial Treaty with Italy of 1883 and of article 5 of the Treaty with Portugal of 1914, which are referred to in the Board of Trade letter, are also enclosed (Papers D and E).

3. The mandate for Palestine, a copy of which, as submitted to the Council of the League of Nations, is enclosed (Paper F), is to be granted to His Majesty in accordance with article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. Its issue is provided for under article 95 of the Treaty of Sèvres (Paper G), and it will be observed that the conditions of the mandate differ somewhat from those indicated in article 94 (Paper H) for Syria and Mesopotamia, in that it is not provided that Palestine is, like Syria and Mesopotamia, to be provisionally recognised as an independent State subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as it is able to stand alone. Under article 95 the administration of Palestine is to be entrusted "by application of the provisions of article 22" to a mandatory who will be responsible for putting into effect the declaration in favour of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people. The difference between the two forms of mandate foreshadowed by the articles in question is due to the conditions of Palestine as a country whose population is at present predominantly Arab, but in which the Jewish national home is to be established, and it may be doubted whether the mandate can be regarded as exactly corresponding to any one of the three classes of mandate referred to in the 4th, 5th, and 6th paragraphs of article 22 of the Covenant, but no doubt it approximates more nearly to the first class than to either of the others.

4. In these circumstances, the question would appear to turn on whether Palestine is to be regarded as a "foreign country" for the purposes of article 2 of the Commercial Treaty with Italy and article 5 of that with Portugal.

5. I am to request that you will be so good as to take these papers into your consideration and to favour Lord Curzon with your opinion whether, in view of the commercial treaties to which this country is a party, and especially those with Italy and Portugal, it is possible to extend to Palestine the preference now granted to certain goods which are consigned from and grown, produced or manufactured in the British Empire. His Lordship would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

D. G. OSBORNE.

List of Papers.

- (A.)—High Commissioner for Palestine to Foreign Office, No. 93, October 12, 1920. (E 13507/13507/44/1920.)
- (B.)—"Notice to Importers in Great Britain and Ireland." &c. (E 13507/13507/44/1920.)
- (C.)—Board of Trade to Foreign Office, January 10, 1921. (E 522/522/88/1921.)
- (D.)—Anglo-Italian Commercial Treaty, June 15, 1883. Article 2. (Treaty No. 788.)
- (E.)—Anglo-Portuguese Commercial Treaty, August 12, 1914. Article 5. (Treaty No. 1539.)
- (F.)—Draft Mandates for Palestine. (Miscellaneous No. 3, 1921.)
- (G.)—Treaty of Peace with Turkey, August 10, 1920. Article 95. (Treaty Series No. 11, 1920.)
- (H.)—Treaty of Peace with Turkey, August 10, 1920. Article 94. (Treaty Series No. 11, 1920.)

PALESTINE.

Report.

In our opinion it is impossible, in view of the commercial treaties with Italy and Portugal and of other treaties in similar terms, to extend to Palestine the preference to goods grown, produced or manufactured in the British Empire. Palestine would appear to fall within paragraph 4 of article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, and not within paragraph 6, and we think that Great Britain as a mandatory is in the position of a trustee of the League.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
February 18, 1921.

RUSSIA.

[N 4720]

No. 6.

[File 1221/1921]

[April 18, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 13, 1921.

Signature
of Anglo-
Russian
Trade Agreement: Effect as regards recognition of the Soviet Republic.

I AM directed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to inform you that he is anxious to obtain your views as to the effect on the relations between His Majesty's Government and the Soviet Government of the signing of the recent Trade Agreement entered into between Sir Robert Horne, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, and M. Krassin, on behalf of the Soviet Government. This question, which is bound to arise in various connections, has been expressly raised in the accompanying letter from Messrs. Coward, Hawkesley Sons and Chance.

2. In this connection, I am to refer you to a report of a speech by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on the 22nd March last, which appears in No. 28, Vol. 139, of the official report of the Parliamentary Debates in the House of Commons on p. 2518, where Mr. Lloyd George states: "This is purely a trading agreement recognising the Soviet Government as a de facto Government of Russia—which undoubtedly it is."

3. I am also to remind you that, in response to an enquiry made before the signature of the Agreement, a firm of solicitors were informed, after reference to the Attorney-General, "that His Majesty's Government, for a certain limited purpose, regarded the Soviet Government as a State Government in Russia."

4. If it were held to be the case that there has been de facto recognition, the position would appear to Lord Curzon to be similar to that created by the de facto recognition of the Governments of the republics of Latvia and Esthonia, when representatives of those Governments resided in London and conducted diplomatic negotiations with the Foreign Office, although their final recognition as envoys to the Court of St. James was deferred until full de jure recognition was accorded. The creation of such a situation would entail consequences of grave importance.

5. Lord Curzon would therefore be grateful of your opinion on the following questions:—

- (1.) Would it be correct to inform Messrs. Coward, Hawkesley Sons and Chance that His Majesty's Government recognise the Soviet Government as the de facto Government of Russia?
- (2.) If the answer to (1) is in the negative, should Messrs. Coward and Hawkesley be informed that His Majesty's Government recognise that, for a certain limited purpose, the Soviet Government is a State Government in Russia?

RUSSIA.

- (3.) If the answer to (1) is in the affirmative, does it necessarily follow that direct diplomatic relations can be established between representatives of the Soviet Government and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as in the case of the representatives of Latvia and Esthonia referred to in paragraph 4 of this reference?
- (4.) Generally.

I have, &c.
J. D. GREGORY.

List of Papers.

Messrs. Coward, Hawkesley and Co. to Foreign Office, March 21, 1921 (N 3632/1221/38)

Report.

In our opinion—

(1.) It would be correct to inform Messrs. Coward Hawkesley, Sons and Chance that His Majesty's Government recognise the Soviet Government as the de facto Government of Russia.

(2.) Does not arise.

(3.) Yes; we think it necessarily follows that direct diplomatic relations can be established between representatives of the Soviet Government and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK

Law Officers' Department,
April 18, 1921.

[N 13126]

No. 7.

[File 12085/1921]

[November 28, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Foreign Office, November 22, 1921.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, to request that you will favour his Lordship, at your early convenience, with your opinion as to whether the statements of principle contained in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the accompanying draft of an answer which it is proposed to send to M. Krassin, the agent in this country of the Soviet Government of Russia, are sound and whether they are likely to cause embarrassment to His Majesty's Government in the future.

2. The circumstances in which the need for sending the proposed answer to M. Krassin has arisen are as follows:—

3. In October last a conference of representatives of the Powers was held in Brussels for the purpose of considering what measures might be taken to help the starving population in the districts of Russia which are suffering from famine. Among the resolutions adopted by that conference was one to the effect that no help could be given until the Soviet Government had recognised the obligations of its predecessors and the well-established foreign claims arising out of its own actions. The precise terms of the resolution were as follows:—

"The commission feels the difficulty of making specific suggestions in the absence of the necessary information which the Mission of Enquiry proposed at the first meeting was designed to obtain; but, in view of the fact that requests have been made by the Soviet Government for credits in one form or in another, the commission considers it is within its competence to record the following conclusions:—

"(a.) Whatever are the precise dimensions of the famine, no final solution can be found unless economic conditions are established in which normal production and a regular exchange of goods of all sorts are guaranteed within Russia itself; unless the growth of prosperity is stimulated by intensive work; unless confidence exists to a degree sufficient to induce foreign exporters to send goods to Russia.

[8214]

G

RUSSIA.

"(b.) Commercial and financial credit must be based on confidence, and this can only be created and maintained among commercial communities provided debts and obligations are recognised and advances sufficiently secured. These principles apply equally to credits granted by Governments as to private commercial credits.

"(c.) The commission is therefore forced to the inevitable conclusion that the creation of credits to assist exports to Russia will only be practicable on the following conditions:—

"(i.) The Russian Government must recognise existing debts and other obligations arising from established claims.

"(ii.) Adequate security should be afforded for any credit given in the future.

"(d.) If credits are given on these conditions they should be devoted to assisting the import into Russia of those commodities which the commission judges to be most essential, after taking into consideration the report of the Mission of Enquiry.

"(e.) The commission desires to emphasise that in coming to these conclusions it is actuated by no political motive. Its conviction is founded solely on economic considerations of a vital character, and the commission is convinced that only in the manner herein stated will it be possible to extend to Russia public or private credit for the purpose of alleviating the existing distress in Russia and preventing a recurrence in the future."

4. The Soviet Government became aware of this resolution through its publication in the press, and on the 29th October M. Krassin sent to Lord Curzon a note (Paper (A)) indicating the willingness of the Soviet Government to recognise certain classes of obligations; as the terms of this note were thought not to cover the whole field of Russia's obligations, a reply (in Paper (B)) was sent to M. Krassin on the 1st November asking for further information on this point. On the 17th a further note (Paper (C)) was received from M. Krassin, but again no clear statement is made as to the extent of the obligations which the Soviet Government are prepared to recognise.

5. In the circumstances Lord Curzon feels that a clear and specific answer must be insisted upon as to whether or not the Soviet Government are prepared to recognise the principles contained in the resolution of the Brussels Conference. For this purpose he proposes to send the answer of which the draft is enclosed, but, in view of the importance of the principle involved, he would be glad if you would inform him whether you consider the statements made in paragraphs 4 and 5 of that draft to be correct, and whether, if correct, you consider that they are likely to cause embarrassment at any time to his Majesty's Government.

I have, &c.
J. D. GREGORY.

Annex.

Draft Reply to M. Krassin.

November, 1921.

Sir,

I AM directed by the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston to inform you that the communication which you made to me on the 16th November has been carefully considered by His Majesty's Government.

2. In this communication you stated that the problem of Russia's indebtedness is one particular aspect of the general problem of Russia's recuperation, and of the higher issue of the world's recuperation, and that every special question in regard to Russia's debts (including, I presume, the question contained in my letter of the 2nd November), can only be studied at an international conference in conjunction with the whole problem facing mankind. Your communication went on to declare that a people that has freed itself from despotism need not pay the debts of the previous despotic Government, which utilised loans against its own people, but that the Soviet Government agrees exceptionally and upon conditions to recognise State loans concluded by the Tsarist Government before 1914.

RUSSIA.

3. Lord Curzon fears that the meaning of my note of the 2nd November has been imperfectly understood. It is the case that certain aspects of the questions referred to in resolution 5 (c) (1) of the Brussels Conference could not be dealt with by correspondence alone; such aspects (I mention these only for the sake of illustration) as the exact value of an industrial property commandeered by the Soviet Government from a foreign owner, or the value, as collateral, of assets which they might wish to assign as security for a relief credit.

4. But there are certain preliminary questions raised in that resolution which can and should be disposed of without delay. These questions involve no detailed consideration of figures or claims. They raise a clear and simple issue of principle, not of detail, and can be answered plainly and promptly. The first is that of the acceptance by the Soviet Government of the general principle that it is responsible for the fulfilment of the obligations which had been entered into and were binding upon previous Governments in Russia. The accepted rule among civilised States is that contracts made by and debts incurred by a Government are to be regarded as the obligations of the nation it represented and not as the personal engagements of the ruler. Although the form of Government may change, the people remain bound.

5. A further question deals with the recognition of obligations arising from established claims. The forcible expropriation and nationalisation without any compensation or remuneration of property in which foreigners are interested is totally at variance with the practice of civilised States. Where such expropriation has taken place, a claim arises for compensation against the Government of the country. It is to the recognition of these claims that the resolution of the Brussels Conference was directed.

6. The question to which I endeavoured to obtain an answer in my previous letter, and as to which I feel it is essential that there should be no misunderstanding if any real progress is to be made, is whether the Soviet Government is prepared unequivocally to subscribe to the doctrines set forth in paragraphs 4 and 5.

7. His Majesty's Government feel it their duty to express themselves on this subject with the utmost frankness. Acceptance of these doctrines cannot be made the subject of a bargain. They could not accept a position in which recognition of foreign liabilities of the kinds now in question were given in return for an admission of the Soviet Government to a discussion of wider issues. To do so would compromise the object of this correspondence, namely, to find a basis upon which the Soviet Government can reach an accommodation with foreign capital. The discovery of a basis for such an accommodation must precede and not follow discussion of the manner in which effect would be given to the fulfilment of Russia's obligations, if the principle of her liability is admitted; otherwise such discussions would inevitably be barren.

List of Papers.

- (A.) M. Krassin to Foreign Office, October 29, 1921. [N 12085/12085/38/1921.]
(B.) Foreign Office to M. Krassin, November 1, 1921. [N 12085/12085/38/1921.]
(C.) M. Krassin to Foreign Office, November 16, 1921. [N 12733/12085/38/1921.]

Report.

In our opinion, the statements made in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the draft letter to M. Krassin are correct and are not likely to cause embarrassment at any time to His Majesty's Government.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
November 28, 1921.

(40)

TURKEY.

[E 8408]

No. 8.

[File 143/1921]

[July 21, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.Foreign Office, July 8, 1921.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, to request that you will be so good as to furnish his Lordship with your views as to the legal situation which would be created if a British subject were to offer to the Greek representatives in this country to endeavour to enlist persons to serve in the Greek naval or military forces during the present hostilities between Greece and the Turkish Nationalists, or were to take other action which, if the enemy with which Greece is at war were "a foreign State at peace with His Majesty," would constitute an offence under the Foreign Enlistment Act.

2. It is a fact that, the Treaty of Sèvres not having been ratified, Great Britain is still in a state of war with Turkey and may perhaps be regarded as still in alliance with Greece. On the other hand, His Majesty's Government have stated in public and informed the Allied and the Turkish Governments that their attitude in respect of the present Græco-Kemalist hostilities is one of strict neutrality, and to this attitude it is desired to adhere.

3. Lord Curzon would be grateful if, taking into consideration the circumstances referred to in paragraph 2, you would favour him, as early as possible, with your opinion upon the question raised in paragraph 1.

I have, &c.

LANCELOT OLIPHANT.

Report.

In our opinion, notwithstanding the circumstances referred to in paragraph 2 of the Foreign Office letter, Turkey cannot be regarded as a "foreign State at peace with His Majesty" and therefore a "friendly State" within the meaning of "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," and it is not unlawful for British subjects to enlist persons to serve in the Greek forces during the present hostilities between Greece and the Turkish Nationalists.

GORDON HEWART.
E. M. POLLOCK.*Law Officers' Department,
July 21, 1921.*

[E 11600]

No. 9.

[File 143/1921]

[October 18, 1921.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.Foreign Office, September 21, 1921.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by the direction of the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, to request you to favour him with your early opinion on certain questions raised by the apparent intention of the Russian Soviet Government to deliver warships to the Kemalist Turkish Government of Angora.

2. With a view to explain the somewhat complex issues of international law involved, it seems necessary to call attention to the following facts:—

3. His Majesty's Government concluded on the 16th March last a trade agreement with the Russian Soviet Government, a copy of which is transmitted herewith for convenience of reference, together with a copy of the letter addressed by Sir Robert Horne to M. Krassin at the time of its signature explaining the point of view of His Majesty's Government on certain provisions of the agreement. It will be seen that by sub-paragraph (a) of article 1 of the agreement the Russian Soviet Government and

Delivery of war vessels to Kemalist Government
by Russian Soviet Government;
question of action under Anglo-
Russian
Trade Agreement, 1921.

TURKEY.

41

His Majesty's Government reciprocally oblige themselves "to refrain from any attempt by military or diplomatic action or propaganda to encourage any of the people of Asia in any form of hostile action against British interests or the British Empire." This agreement is still in force, but His Majesty's Government have recently instructed the British Trade Commissioner in Moscow, in a despatch a copy of which is enclosed herein, to draw the attention of the Russian Soviet Government to certain apparent breaches of the agreement. It should be mentioned that on the day of the signature of the Anglo-Russian Agreement the Russian Soviet Government signed an agreement with the Turkish Kemalist Government, the constitution and history of which is briefly explained below. A paper giving the substance of the agreement, as known to His Majesty's Government, is also enclosed herein.

4. The principal Allies concluded an armistice with the Turkish Government at Constantinople in October 1918. Certain parts of Turkey were occupied by the principal Allies, and this occupation was extended in March 1920 to Constantinople. On the 10th August, 1920, a Treaty of Peace was signed at Sèvres with the Turkish Government. This treaty has not yet been ratified either by the Turkish Government or by any of the principal Allies.

5. Meanwhile a separate Government in that part of Asia Minor not occupied by the Allies had been constituted in 1920 by a certain Mustapha Kemal. This Government subsequently styled itself the Grand National Assembly. The seat of the Government is at Angora. This Government, while not formally renouncing allegiance to the Sultan of Turkey, regards itself as the sovereign Government of Turkey, in distinction to the Government of Constantinople, with which, however, it does, in fact, for political purposes, remain in close and friendly relations. One of the main objects of the Angora Government was to prevent the entry into force and execution of the Treaty of Sèvres, and, in particular, to drive back the Greek forces who had been sent to occupy the Smyrna area of Asia Minor by the Supreme Council in 1919, an occupation which was subsequently extended in July 1920 in order to drive back the Kemalist forces from the area of the Straits, and force the Turkish Government to sign the Treaty of Sèvres.

6. In the autumn of 1920 the Government of Venizelos fell in Greece, and the succeeding Government ordered a plebiscite, resulting in the return of King Constantine. For political reasons His Majesty's Government and the French Government have not officially recognised the King, but have continued in informal relations with his Government. Partly owing to this change of attitude towards Greece, but principally in order to put a stop to the intermittent warfare between the Kemalist forces and the Greeks, the Supreme Council invited the Greek Government and the Turkish Government at Constantinople to send representatives to a conference in London in February 1921, with a view to agree upon modifications of the Treaty of Sèvres acceptable to both parties. In the hope that the Turkish Government at Constantinople would eventually merge into a united Turkish Government to include the Kemalist Government at Angora, the Supreme Council did not desire to recognise formally the latter, but they invited the Constantinople Government to include in their delegation representatives of the Kemalist Government. It was with such a united delegation that the Supreme Council subsequently negotiated. At the London conference certain proposals were put before both the Greek and Turkish Governments, and it was made clear to both Governments that if hostilities were resumed in Asia Minor the Supreme Council rejected all responsibility. Before final answers to the Supreme Council's proposals were returned, hostilities were resumed in Asia Minor between the Greeks and Kemalist Turks, and towards these hostilities the Supreme Council decided to adopt an attitude of neutrality.

7. Since this renewal of hostilities had taken place in quasi-defiance of the Supreme Council, and while the questions at issue were still sub judice by the Supreme Council, the Principal Allied Governments originally decided to interpret their neutrality in such a way as to prevent any export of arms from the countries of the Principal Allies even by private traders to either combatant, and at the same time to deny either side the ordinary rights of a belligerent in the matter of the visit and search of the vessels of the Principal Allies at sea. By this decision as to neutrality it was assumed that a certain de facto recognition had been given to the Kemalist Government at Angora, as a Government separate from the Turkish Government at Constantinople, with whom His Majesty's Government were still technically in a state of war, suspended by the armistice of 1918. His Majesty's Government have had, however, no direct official relations with the Kemalist Government. Warfare between the Greeks and the Kemalists has continued since the London conference, the Greek Government rejecting an offer of mediation made to them only in June 1921. At a meeting of the Supreme Council in August 1921, it was decided to supersede the policy described in the earlier part of this paragraph by adopting the customary rules of neutrality towards the belligerents, so far as private trade in arms between either belligerent and the countries of the Principal Allies is concerned.

8. The Kemal Government have, since its constitution, adopted a somewhat hostile attitude towards Great Britain, without, however, going to the length of a declaration of war. Although His Majesty's Government had, after the London conference of March 1921, made plain their neutrality towards the Græco-Turkish hostilities, the Kemal Government have preferred to regard His Majesty's Government's attitude of neutrality as hypocritical. Some hostile measures, such as the refusal to allow British vessels to call at Turkish ports in the Kemal areas, have not been permanently applied, but modified according to the changing political situation; but the Kemal Government have seized and still detain more than twenty British subjects as prisoners and have rejected an agreement made by their representative at the London conference in March 1921 for an exchange with Turkish prisoners detained by His Majesty's Government at Malta—an agreement which, on their side, His Majesty's Government had begun to carry out.

9. Without burdening the Law Officers of the Crown with further details, Lord Curzon is satisfied that upon the facts a good case could be made out in support of the thesis that the Kemal Government has been guilty of some "form of hostile action against British interests or the British Empire," but he is doubtful whether action under the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement based upon that case would be consistent with the maintenance of a policy of neutrality towards the Kemalists as belligerents and in harmony with the international practice governing the relations of neutrals towards belligerents.

10. His Lordship would, therefore, be glad to receive your opinion on the following questions:—

- (1.) In the light of the above explanation of the relations of His Majesty's Government with the Turkish Kemal Government, would His Majesty's Government, in view of their declared attitude of neutrality towards the Græco-Kemalist hostilities, be entitled to regard certain acts of the Kemal Government as "hostile action" within the meaning of sub-paragraph (a), article 1, of the Anglo-Russian Agreement?
- (2.) If the answer to the above question is in the affirmative, would His Majesty's Government, knowing that certain vessels of war belonging to the Russian Government were being delivered to the Kemal Government, be entitled (a) to protest against such delivery as a breach of the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, (b) to enforce such protest forthwith, in order to prevent an imminent breach of the agreement, by sinking or seizing these vessels, or (c) to make a diplomatic protest to the Russian Soviet Government?
- (3.) Generally.

11. It will be appreciated that, if any action is to be taken in the matter of the delivery of these vessels, it may have to be taken quickly, and Lord Curzon would, therefore, request that he may be favoured with your opinion at your earliest possible convenience.

I have, &c.
LANCELOT OLIPHANT.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Trade Agreement with Russian Soviet Government, March 16, 1921. [Cmd. 1207.]
- (B.) Sir R. Horne to M. Krassin, March 16, 1921. (N 3438/5/38/1921.)
- (C.) Foreign Office to British Trade Commissioner, Moscow, No. 64, September 7, 1921. (N 10221/5/38/1921.)
- (D.) Summary of agreement between the Russian Soviet and Turkish Kemal Governments, March 16, 1921. (E 9905/143/44/1921.)

Report.

1. In our opinion, in view of the declared attitude of neutrality towards the Græco-Kemalist hostilities, His Majesty's Government are not entitled to regard acts of the Kemal Government as "hostile action" within the meaning of article 1 (a) of the Anglo-Russian Agreement. To put forward a case of breach of the agreement on that basis would, in our opinion, be inconsistent with a policy of neutrality towards the Kemalists.

2. In this view this question does not arise.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
October 18, 1921.

UNITED STATES.

[T 5251]

No. 94.

[File 924/1921]

[April 7, 1921.]

[Home Office.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE question on which the Secretary of State desires the assistance of the Law Officers relates to the national status of a child born in the United States of America of a father who, being at the date of the birth of such child a natural-born British subject, becomes during the minority of that child a naturalised citizen of the United States.

Section 10 (3) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," provided that: "Where the father being a British subject, or the mother being a British subject and a widow, becomes an alien in pursuance of this Act, every child of such father or mother who during infancy has become resident in the country where the father or mother is naturalised, and has, according to the law of such country, become naturalised therein, shall be deemed to be a subject of the State of which the father or mother has become a subject, and not a British subject."

The Act of 1870 was repealed by "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," which came into force on the 1st January, 1915, and section 12 (1) of the latter Act provides that: "Where a person, being a British subject, ceases to be a British subject, whether by declaration of alienage or otherwise, every child of that person, being a minor, shall thereupon cease to be a British subject, unless such child, on that person ceasing to be a British subject, does not become by the law of any other country naturalised in that country."

Title XXX, "Naturalisation," section 2172, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that: "The children of persons who have been duly naturalised under any law of the United States . . . being under the age of 21 years at the time of the naturalisation of their parents shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens thereof . . ."

A Mr. Wharton, a natural-born British subject by virtue of his birth in the United Kingdom, settled in the United States in 1884 with his British-born wife and became a naturalised citizen of the United States in 1896. His son, Mr. D. B. S. Wharton, was born in 1885 in the United States; he was therefore still a minor at the date of his father's naturalisation, and appears to have been resident with his father at and after that date. He has now applied "if possible to take out British naturalisation papers."

Mr. D. B. S. Wharton was at birth a natural-born British subject by virtue of 4 Geo. II, cap. 21, and would appear also to have become a citizen of the United States of America if, as is understood to be the case, the law which obtains in that country is substantially the jus soli, see article 14, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States: "All persons born or naturalised in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside . . ."; and section 1992 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: "All persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are declared to be citizens of the United States."

If he acquired United States citizenship at birth, it may be open to doubt whether his British nationality was terminated, in consequence of his father's naturalisation in National status of child born in the United States of a father who, at date of child's birth, was a natural-born British subject, but, during the child's minority, became a naturalised United States citizen.

UNITED STATES.

the United States, by the operation of section 10 (3) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," and section 2172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America.

It has been the practice in the Home Department, particularly in connection with applications for naturalisation by persons in the position of Mr. D. B. S. Wharton, to regard such persons as not possessing British nationality, and accordingly to entertain such applications. In support of this view it may be urged that, if it be not correct, the fact of birth in the United States of America would confer or impose on an individual a capacity to possess British nationality not enjoyed by an individual (even though a member of the same family) born in British dominions, e.g., it is clear that any children of Mr. Wharton senior, who, having been born in British dominions—whether before or after Mr. D. B. S. Wharton—were still minors at the date of his naturalisation and were then resident in the United States, would cease to be British subjects; and it is equally clear that any other children born to Mr. Wharton outside British dominions after the date of his naturalisation would not possess British nationality.

The questions on which the Secretary of State desires the opinion of the Law Officers are—

1. Has Mr. D. B. S. Wharton lost British nationality under section 10 (3) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870"?
2. If the same set of circumstances arose after "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," came into force, would the individual lose British nationality under section 12 (1) of that Act?

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

In our opinion both of the questions submitted to us should be answered in the affirmative. Section 2172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it is true, seems to contemplate the case of persons who are not already citizens of the United States, but its terms are such as to include persons of dual nationality, and we think that persons in the position of Mr. D. B. S. Wharton do become naturalised in the United States by virtue of the law of that country within the meaning of the quoted sections of the two British Statutes.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

*Law Officers' Department,
April 7, 1921.*

1922

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

(12208)

LAST COPY.

Nothing mutilated or ^{3 removed} ~~altered~~: A.D.M.

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1922.

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked I^A, &c.

AFRICA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	Jan. 4, 1922	Parliamentary sanction for cession of British territory in Jubaland	1

BULGARIA.

I^A	Law Officers and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds [Board of Trade]	June 14,	Position of diplomatic and consular pre-war claims under article 179 of Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria	3
----------------------	---	----------	---	---

EGYPT.

2	Law Officers ..	Oct. 13,	Egypt (Amendment) Order in Council, 1922 ..	4
---	-----------------	----------	---	---

FRANCE.

3	Law Officers ..	July 11,	Imposition of French nationality and French military service on British community in Morocco ..	6
4	Law Officers ..	July 11,	Imposition of French nationality and French military service on British community in Tunis ..	9

GENERAL.

I^A	Law Officers .. [Board of Customs and Excise]	Jan. 18,	Offences committed on foreign vessels outside the 3-mile limit: application of British Customs Acts..	18
5	Law Officers ..	Mar. 21,	Correspondence in war time with (a) prisoners of war or interned civilians; or (b) other persons in enemy countries: general licence ..	22
6	Law Officers ..	Apr. 27,	Correspondence in war time with (a) prisoners of war or interned civilians; or (b) other persons in enemy countries: draft licence and notice to public	24
6^A	Law Officers and Mr. H. M. Givern [Treasury Solicitor]	May 17,	Claim of the Mozambique Whaling Company (Limited) in the War Compensation Court respecting detention of whale oil shipped in steamship "Aros Castle" ..	26
7	Law Officers ..	May 17,	Correspondence in war time with (a) prisoners of war or interned civilians; or (b) other persons in enemy countries: draft licence and notice to public	30

GENERAL—continued.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
7 ^A	Law Officers, Mr. James Wylie and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds [Procurator-General]	June 22, 1922	Detained enemy ships: effect of Privy Council judgment in case of the "Blonde," &c. . . .	32
7 ^B	Law Officers, Mr. James Wylie and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds [Procurator-General]	Dec. 16,	Detained enemy ships: effect of Privy Council judgment in case of the "Blonde," &c. . . .	42

GERMANY.

8	Solicitor-General ..	Dec. 28,	Interpretation of Treaty of Versailles, 1919: paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII	45
---	----------------------	----------	---	----

UNITED STATES.

9	Law Officers ..	Aug. 4,	Right of New Zealand or United States to establish preferential tariffs, &c., in Samoa	46
9^A	Law Officers .. [Home Office]	Oct. 24,	National status of child born in the United States whose father became, during the child's minority, naturalised in the United States on or after March 2, 1907	48

(iv)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1922.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

AEM—EXP.

A.

"Aemme Rickmers," 32-41.
"Annapolis," 22.
"Aros Castle": detention of whale oil shipped in;
claim in War Compensation Court, 26-30.
Attorney-General v. Schiers, 20.

B.

"Barenfels," 32-41.
"Blonde," 32-45.
Botterell and Roche, 42-45.
Bryde, Johan, 27-29.
Bulgaria: position under Treaty of Peace of diplomatic and consular pre-war claims, 3, 4.

C.

Cession: of British territory in Jubaland; parliamentary sanction, 1-3.
"Chile," 33, 34, 36-39.
Civilians, interned: correspondence with, in war time; licence and notice to public, 22-26, 30-32.
Claims: diplomatic and consular pre-war claims; position under Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria, 3, 4.
"Mozambique Whaling Company, in War Compensation Court; for detention of whale oil, 26-30.
Correspondence: in war time with prisoners of war or interned civilians; licence and notice to public, 22-26, 30-32.
"in war time with persons in enemy countries; licence and notice to public, 22-26, 30-32.
"Corsican Prince," 28.
"Cosmopolite," 22-24.
Courts. See Privy Council. Prize Court. War
Compensation Court.
Customs: application of British Customs Acts to offences committed on foreign vessels outside territorial waters, 18-22.

D.

Danziger Rederei Aktien-Gesellschaft, 32-34, 42.

E.

Egypt: Amendment Order in Council, 4, 5.
Enemy countries: correspondence with persons in,
in war time; licence and notice to public, 22-26, 30-32.
Eschert, Carl, 44.
Eschert, Dr. Paul, 44.
Exposito v. Bowden, 23.

FRA—MOZ

F.

France: imposition of French nationality and military service on British community in Morocco, 6-9.
"imposition of French nationality and military service on British community in Tunis, 9-18.

G.

Germany: interpretation of paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 45.
"Gutenfels," 32-41.

H.

"Henry L. Marshal," 18.
"Hercules," 32-45.
"Hoop," 23.

J.

Jubaland: cession of territory in; parliamentary sanction, 1-3.
Jurisdiction: application of British Customs Acts to offences committed on foreign vessels outside territorial waters, 18-22.
"of Prize Court or War Compensation Court in case arising out of right of visit and search.

K.

"Kong Inge," 27.
"Kronprinzessin Cecilie," 32-41.

L.

Laszlo, P., 23.
"Lauterfels," 32-41.
Leroux v. Brown, 22.
"Lutzow," 29.

M.

"Marie Leonhardt," 36, 37.
Maritime Jurisdiction: application of British Customs Acts to offences committed on foreign vessels outside territorial waters, 18-22.
Military service: imposition on British community in Morocco, 6-9.
"imposition on British community
in Tunis, 9-18.
Morocco: imposition of French nationality and military service on British community, 6-9.
Mortensen v. Peters, 19.
Mozambique Whaling Company (Limited): claim in War Compensation Court, 26-30.

(v)

NAT—SEA.

N.

Nationality: French: imposition on British community in Morocco, 6-9.
"French: imposition on British community in Tunis, 9-18.
"of child born in United States whose father became naturalised in United States on or after March 2, 1907, 48, 49.
"Neptunus," 27-29.
New Zealand: right to establish preferential tariffs
in Samoa, 46-48.
"Nieuw Amsterdam," 36.

O.

Order in Council. See Egypt.

P.

"Panariellos," 22, 23.
Parliament: sanction of, for cession of British territory in Jubaland, 1-3.
"Petit Jules," 18.
"Prinz Adalbert," 32-41.
Prisoners of war: correspondence with, in war time; licence and notice to public, 22-26, 30-32.
Privy Council: judgment in case of "Blonde," &c.;
effect on detained enemy ships, 32-45.
Prize Court: jurisdiction in case arising out of right of visit and search, 26-30.
"Prosper," 32-45.

R.

"Rabenfels," 32-41.
Reprisals: interpretation of paragraph 18 of Annex II
to Part VIII of Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 45.
Right of search: jurisdiction of Prize Court or War
Compensation Court in case arising out of, 26-30.
Robson v. Premier Oil Company, 23.
"Rotterdam," 36.
"Roumanian," 29.

S.

"St. Helena," 29.
"St. Tudno," 29.
Samoa: right of New Zealand or United States to establish preferential tariffs in, 46-48.
Schroder, Smidt and Co., 37.
Search. See Right of search.

TAR—ZOL.

T.

Tariffs, preferential: right of New Zealand or United States to establish, in Samoa, 46-48.
Territorial waters: offences committed on foreign vessels outside; application of British Customs Acts, 18-22.
Territory: cession of; parliamentary sanction, 1-3.
Three-mile limit. See Territorial waters.
Treaty of Peace (Bulgaria): position of diplomatic and consular pre-war claims,
3, 4.
" (Germany): interpretation of paragraph 18 of Annex II to
Part VIII, 45.
Tunis: imposition of French nationality and military service on British community, 9-18.

U.

United States: right to establish preferential tariffs
in Samoa, 46-48.
"national status of child born in United States whose father became, during child's minority, naturalised in United States on or after March 2, 1907, 48, 49.

V.

Vessels: foreign: offences committed on, outside
British territorial waters; application of Customs Acts, 18-22.
"detained enemy ships: effect of "Blonde,"
&c., judgment of Privy Council, 32-45.

W.

War: correspondence in war time with prisoners of war or interned civilians; licence and notice to public, 22-26, 30-32.
"correspondence in war time with persons in enemy countries; licence and notice to public, 22-26, 30-32.
War Compensation Court: jurisdiction in case arising out of right of visit and search, 26-30.
"Werdenfels," 32-41.

Z.

"Zollverein," 22.

1922

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1922.

AFRICA.

[A 148/148/60/1922]

No. 1.

[January 4, 1922.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 21, 1921.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, to request you to favour him with your early observations on the following matter:—

2. Negotiations are in progress for the cession to Italy of an area of British territory in Jubaland. Before the annexation of the colony of Kenya, the province of Jubaland formed part of the East Africa Protectorate. That protectorate, proclaimed as such in 1895, consisted partly of land which fell to Great Britain in the partition of tropical Africa into "spheres of influence" and partly of the mainland possessions of the Sultan of Zanzibar which were held by the Protectorate Government subject to a yearly payment. In 1920 the East Africa Protectorate became the colony and protectorate of Kenya, the latter consisting of the Sultan's mainland dominions, including part of Jubaland, and the former of the rest of the territory comprised in the East Africa Protectorate which was formally annexed to His Majesty's dominions by "The Kenya (Annexation) Order in Council, 1920."

3. Under the provisions of the Treaty of London, 1915, the greater part of Jubaland is being transferred to Italy, the rights of the Sultan of Zanzibar in his portion of that territory being acquired by an annual payment, which may, if the Italian Government so desire, be compounded by the payment of a capital sum.

4. The question therefore arises whether, in respect of that portion of Jubaland which forms part of His Majesty's dominions in virtue of the Order in Council above referred to, it is necessary to obtain the approval of Parliament to the cession of territory, or whether it is within the royal prerogative to cede a portion of His Majesty's dominions without reference to Parliament.

5. As you are aware, this question has been discussed on several occasions in Parliament and in the courts, and I am to transmit herewith for your guidance a copy of a memorandum prepared in the Foreign Office in May 1904, from which you will see that the question has been considered on more than one occasion by the Law Officers of the Crown. Reference may also be made to a text-book entitled, "Cases and Opinions on Constitutional Law," by the late Mr. William Forsyth, Q.C., at pp. 182-186, in particular to the following passage on p. 185:—

"It has, I believe, been supposed that a distinction exists between territory acquired by the Crown by conquest or cession which has not been the subject of parliamentary legislation, and territory to which Acts of Parliament have been applied, and it has been thought that the Crown may by its prerogative cede the former but not the latter to a foreign Power."

1527 [9930]

B

AFRICA

I am also to draw your attention to the observations of Sir Alexander Cockburn ("Hansard" 133, pp. 81 and 82), who stated in the House of Commons that colonies might be divided into two classes—such as were acquired by occupancy and such as were acquired by conquest and by cession. He further observed that while there was no question as to the right of the Crown to cede those acquired by conquest and cession, he was aware that there existed considerable difference of opinion as to whether those acquired by occupancy could be alienated otherwise than by an Act of the Legislature. Reference is also invited to the case of Damodhar Gordhan v. Deoram Kangi (1 Appeal Cases, p. 332) where the question was fully argued although no decision was given on the point, the judgment of the lower Court being reversed on a question of fact.

6. Lord Curzon is informed that the last two occasions on which this matter occupied the attention of His Majesty's Government were in 1890 when, on the occasion of the cession of Heligoland by Great Britain to Germany by the Anglo-German Agreement of the 1st July, 1890, Lord Salisbury presented to the House of Lords a Bill entitled "An Act for the Purpose of removing Doubts with respect to the Validity of an Agreement between Her Majesty and the Emperor of Germany," and in 1904 when the Anglo-French Convention of the 8th April, 1904, providing for the transfer to France of certain territory on the West Coast of Africa, was approved by "The Anglo-French Convention Act, 1904." The observations of Mr. Balfour, who took part in the Heligoland debate in the House of Commons, are set out in the Foreign Office Memorandum of May 1904, to which reference is made above.

7. It must be observed, therefore, that the balance of precedent appears to be in favour of the proposition that British territory cannot be ceded without the approval of Parliament, but it is suggested that, in the absence of any authoritative pronouncement on the question, the matter is by no means free from doubt. If Sir Alexander Cockburn's statement that there is no question that the Crown has the right to cede territory acquired by conquest and cession correctly expounds the position in constitutional law, there would seem to be no technical objection to a cession of a portion of Jubaland without parliamentary consent. It may also be noted that, by the provisions of the British Settlements Act of 1887, Jubaland, as a portion of the Kenya Colony annexed by Order in Council in 1920, can be legislated for by Order in Council or by ordinance, and that the territory in question has not been hitherto the subject of parliamentary legislation. Parliament having entrusted the Crown with power to legislate for this territory, it may be permissible to contend that there is no technical reason why such territory should not be ceded without parliamentary consent. In this connection I am to enclose, for convenience of reference, a copy of your report of the 22nd March, 1920, in which you advised the Secretary of State for the Colonies that the colony of Kenya, when annexed, would be a British settlement within the meaning of "The British Settlements Act, 1887."

8. Lord Curzon would therefore be glad if you would take the above matters into consideration, and inform him—

- (1.) Whether it is necessary to obtain the consent of Parliament to the proposed cession to Italy of that portion of Jubaland which forms part of His Majesty's dominions;
- (2.) Whether you have any observations of a general character which you desire to offer on this matter.

I have, &c
H. J. SEYMOUR.

List of Papers.

1. Kenya (Annexation) Order in Council, 1920. (Confidential 11548*.)
2. Foreign Office memorandum as to consent of Parliament to cessions of territory, May 1904. (Confidential 8156.)
3. Report of the Law Officers to the Colonial Office on proposed annexation of part of the territory of the East Africa Protectorate, March 22, 1920.

Report.

1. This is a question upon which, as is shown by the Foreign Office memorandum of May 1904, various views have been expressed from time to time by different Law Officers. We incline to the view that in such a case as Jubaland parliamentary sanction is not necessary for the cession.

BULGARIA.

2. But in view of the differences of opinion of eminent authorities referred to in the memorandum mentioned, and of the precedent of Heligoland, we think that the approval of Parliament to the cession should be sought for, and that it is desirable that such approval should be given by statute.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
January 4, 1922.

BULGARIA.

[C 9281/9281/62/1922]

No. 1^A.

[Board of Trade.]

[June 14, 1922.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

THE opinion of the Law Officers is requested as to whether the diplomatic or consular claims referred to in article 179 of the Treaty of Neuilly-sur-Seine are claims with the payment of which the property, rights and interests of Bulgarian nationals within His Majesty's dominions or protectorates are charged under section 1 (i) (a) of "The Treaty of Peace (Bulgaria) Order, 1920," giving effect to clause 4 of the annex to section 4 of Part IX of the Treaty of Neuilly.

A copy of the claims is appended, and it will be observed that for the most part they are based upon circumstances which, had they occurred during the last war, would have come within the reparation chapter of the treaty, and not under the economic clauses; e.g., claims arising out of the destruction of private property outside Bulgaria during military operations. So far as the last war is concerned, the treaty clearly distinguishes between damage done by acts of war and that done by the application of exceptional war measures, and it is only the latter class of claim the payment of which is charged upon the assets of Bulgarian nationals in this country; and to assign to the diplomatic and consular claims before referred to, which arise out of the Balkan wars, rights which are not given to similar claims arising out of the last war, would be, it is submitted, contrary to the intention of the treaty. In fact the only grounds for suggesting that such claims are entitled to the benefit of the charge are (1) that the words "property, rights and interests" of Allied nationals are used in connection with them, and (2) that the provision of the treaty relating to such claims occurs in section 4 of Part IX, and it is in the annex to this section that the Allied and Associated Powers are given the right to charge the property, rights and interests within their territories belonging to Bulgarian nationals with the payment of certain classes of claims (clause 4). It will be seen, however, that this clause only provides for the payment of claims by Allied nationals with regard to their property, rights and interests in Bulgarian territory, and, as has already been pointed out, a number of the diplomatic or consular claims are with regard to property that never was in Bulgarian territory, a still further number are with regard to property that never was in Bulgarian territory as it now exists or as it existed just prior to the last war. The question would therefore arise as to the meaning of "Bulgarian territory" for the purposes of this clause.

Attention is also drawn to the fact that article 179 does no more than to provide that the determination of these claims is to be undertaken by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal on the application of the Power concerned, and it is suggested that the intention of the treaty was not to place these claims on a stronger footing than they were on before the war, but merely to assign their determination to an impartial tribunal, having regard to the fact of the last war. It is further submitted that no undue importance should be attached to the fact that these claims are mentioned in section 4, since there are also other claims in that section, such as claims for compensation under article 178, which could hardly be said to rank against the charge.

The Law Officers are accordingly requested to advise the administrator of Bulgarian property whether he is entitled to administer and distribute such property on the footing that these diplomatic and consular claims will not be entitled to participate in the benefit of the charge.

[9930]

EGYPT.

April 26, 1922.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

In our opinion, yes.

*Law Officers' Department,
June 14, 1922.*

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.
GAVIN T. SIMONDS.

EGYPT.

[E 11053/3725/16/1922]

No. 2.

[October 13, 1922.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Egypt
(Amendment)
Order in Council,
1922.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 23, 1922.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, to transmit to you herewith the papers noted in the accompanying list relating to a proposed amendment of the Ottoman Order in Council (Paper (A)) in its application to Egypt.

2. The circumstances which render action necessary, and the reasons which have led his Lordship to consider that the proposed Order in Council (Paper (C)) is the most suitable form for it to take, are fully explained in the correspondence with Lord Allenby and the departmental minutes which are sent herewith (Papers (D) to (J)). It is his Lordship's intention, if you are of opinion that the proposed amendment is one which can properly be made, to take steps as occasion presents itself to insert it in the Orders in Council under which His Majesty's jurisdiction is exercised in other extraterritorial countries.

3. I have the honour, therefore, to request that you will take the enclosed papers into consideration, and will favour his Lordship with your opinion as to whether the proposed Order in Council is one which may properly be submitted to His Majesty in Council. His Lordship would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

LANCELOT OLIPHANT.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Ottoman Order in Council, 1910 (Confidential 9745*).
- (B.) Egypt Order in Council, 1915 (Confidential 10598*).
- (C.) Draft Egypt (Amendment) Order in Council, 1922.
- (D.) Lord Allenby, No. 180, March 14, 1922, with enclosures (E 3725/3725/16/1922).
- (E.) Minutes by Sir C. Hurst (2) and Mr. Shearman on E 3725/3725/16/1922.
- (F.) To Lord Allenby, No. 407, April 8, 1922 (E 3725/3725/16/1922).
- (G.) Lord Allenby, No. 415, May 27, 1922, with enclosures (E 5704/3725/16/1922).
- (H.) Minute by Mr. Shearman (dated June 22, 1922) on E 5704/3725/16/1922.
- (I.) To Lord Allenby, No. 782, June 29, 1922 (E 5704/3725/16/1922).
- (J.) Lord Allenby, No. 546, July 13, 1922 (E 7298/3725/16/1922).

Report.

The draft Order in Council as amended by us in red ink* may, in our opinion, properly be submitted to the King for the approval of His Majesty in Council. The reason for the amendment is to introduce "acts" as well as "conduct," as it is the former word rather than the latter which seems appropriate to cover breaches of the Acts of Parliament referred to.

* Printed in italics.

EGYPT.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

*Law Officers' Department,
October 13, 1922.*

ANNEX.

Draft Egypt (Amendment) Order in Council, 1922.

Whereas by treaty, capitulation, grant, usage, sufferance or other lawful means His Majesty the King has jurisdiction in Egypt;

And whereas provision is now made by "The Ottoman Order in Council, 1910" (S. R. and O., 1910, No. 1184) (in this Order referred to as "the Principal Order"), and "The Egypt Order in Council, 1915" (S. R. and O., 1915, No. 141) (in this Order referred to as "the Egypt Order"), for the exercise of such jurisdiction, and it is desirable to amend the said Orders;

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in this behalf by "The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890" (53 & 54 Vict., cap. 37), or otherwise in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

1. This Order may be cited as "The Egypt (Amendment) Order in Council, 1922," and shall be read as one with the Principal Order and with the Egypt Order and with any Order amending the latter.

2. The following provision is substituted in Egypt for article 81 (1) of the Principal Order:—

Where it is proved that there is reasonable ground to apprehend (a) that a British subject is about to commit a breach of the public peace, or that the acts or conduct of a British subject are or is likely to produce or excite to a breach of the public peace, or (b) that a British subject has been guilty of conduct which would in the United Kingdom constitute an offence subject has been guilty of conduct which, or has done or committed such acts as if done or committed in the United Kingdom, would in the United Kingdom constitute an offence under "The Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920" (10 & 11 Geo. V., cap. 46), or under the Vagrancy Acts, or under the Criminal Law Amendment Acts, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict., cap. 69) and 1912 (2 & 3 Geo. V., cap. 20), the court may, if it thinks fit, cause him to be brought before it and require him to give security to the satisfaction of the court to keep the peace, or for his future good behaviour, as the case may require.

3.—(1.) This Order shall take effect as soon as it is first exhibited in the public office of the Supreme Court for Egypt.

(2.) For that purpose the Judge of the Supreme Court shall, on the receipt by him of a certified printed copy of the Order, cause the same to be affixed and exhibited conspicuously in that office. He shall also keep the same so affixed and exhibited during one month from that first exhibition.

(3.) A certified printed copy of this Order shall also be affixed and exhibited in the public offices of the Consular Courts at Cairo and Port Said at the same time as it is first exhibited at Alexandria or as soon thereafter as circumstances admit.

(4.) Proof shall not in any proceeding or matter be required that the provisions of this article have been complied with, nor shall any act or proceeding be invalidated by any failure to comply with any such provisions.

E. M. P.
L. S.

(6)

FRANCE.

[T 8217/224/317/1922]

No. 3.

[July 11, 1922.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

*Foreign Office, June 6, 1922.*Imposition of French nationality and French military service on British community
in Morocco.

IN my letter of to-day's date marked A* I had the honour, by direction of the Earl of Balfour, to transmit for your consideration certain papers relative to Decrees recently promulgated in Tunis, under which the French Government seek to impose French nationality and the consequent obligations of French military service on members of the British community in Tunis. A similar situation has arisen in Morocco (French Zone), but, as the circumstances in some respects differ from those in the case of Tunis, it appears convenient to deal with this further question by means of a separate reference.

2. As regards the position occupied by the French Government in Morocco (French Zone), this apparently amounts to no more than a protectorate over territory which is under the sovereignty of a native ruler, the Sultan of Morocco. An extract (Paper (A)) from the French "Annuaire colonial," an authoritative work, setting forth the method of administration of that territory is enclosed, as well as a copy of the Treaty between France and Morocco referred to therein (Paper (B)), for convenience of reference. His Majesty's Government have formally recognised the French protectorate in Morocco (French Zone), but they preserve their capitulatory rights of jurisdiction as guaranteed by Treaties in the past between Great Britain and Morocco, and these capitulatory rights of jurisdiction are still being exercised by the British Consular Courts in that country.

3. On the 8th November last the Decrees (Papers (C) and (D)) were published in Morocco (French Zone) in the form of (C), an edict in the name of the territorial Sovereign, the Sultan of Morocco, and (D), an edict signed by the President of the French Republic. The former pronounces Moroccan all persons born in Morocco (French Zone) of parents of whom one was also born there, with the exception of the citizens, subjects and ressortissants of the Protecting Power. The latter pronounces French all persons born in Morocco (French Zone) of parents of whom one justifiable "au titre étranger" before the French tribunals of the protectorate was also born there. Certain qualifications are mentioned in the French Decree, but these seem of minor importance.

4. These Decrees, it will be seen, correspond with those issued in the case of Tunis, which forms the subject of the separate reference from this Department of to-day's date, but, as concerns their application to members of the British community in Morocco (French Zone), there is the important difference that, whereas the capitulatory rights of this country in Tunis no longer exist, such rights are still in existence and are being exercised in Morocco.

5. No information has as yet been received to show that active measures are being taken by the French authorities in Morocco (French Zone) to apply these Decrees to members of the British community, who, being justiciable before the British Consular Courts, are apparently outside the terms of the French Decree, save, perhaps, in cases where the maternal parent was of French or other foreign origin, in such way as to have been deemed justiciable before the French tribunals. Failing this, they might be held to come within the range of the Decree of the Sultan of Morocco. But, apart from the fact that the imposition of a Moroccan status on members of that community would be in derogation of the Treaty rights of jurisdiction possessed by His Majesty's Government, it is not understood that this claim is made. The purpose of the French Government would seem to be that as and when the extra-territorial rights of foreign Powers in Morocco (French Zone) cease and determine the French Decree applies—as in the case of Tunis, where such rights have lapsed—to members of the European communities who come within its category.

6. It is to be noted, however, that in the course of the correspondence (referred to more fully hereafter) which has passed between His Majesty's Government and the French Government on the subject of these Decrees in Morocco (French Zone), the latter Government argue that previously to the passing of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," which they contend cannot have retroactive effect, no provision of English law existed beyond the statutory enactments applicable to all foreign countries to conserve the British national status of persons of British descent born in extra-territorial countries. On this point reference is invited to paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Foreign Office letter of to-day's date in the case of Tunis, as showing the view originally entertained by the French Government in this respect.

* No. 4.

FRANCE.

7

7. On the 10th January last His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris addressed to the French Government the note (Paper (E)) intimating that in view of the extra-territorial rights possessed by His Majesty's Government in Morocco they were unable in any way to admit that the Decrees were applicable to persons entitled to British nationality. The correspondence which passed with the French Government is fully set out in Papers (E), (F), (G) and (H), and the points maintained by His Majesty's Government are, it will be seen, in many respects similar to those maintained by them in the case of the Tunis Decrees, as apart from the special Treaty provisions relating to Tunis. The additional points may be summarised as follows:—

- (a.) The legal condition of foreigners in extra-territorial countries is dealt with by eminent authorities. The French writer, Féraud Giraud, says they always preserve their nationality as if they preserved their residence and domicile in the mother country. English law has always taken cognisance of these conditions, and persons of British descent have long been registered as British subjects by His Majesty's Consular officers in those countries. The French assumption that His Majesty's Government regard Moroccan territory as British territory is quite unfounded.
- (b.) While His Majesty's Government make no claim to a jus soli in Morocco they are wholly unable to admit that the French Government can themselves assert such a claim in a country where they occupy only the position of protecting Power in regard to persons who are not only not of French descent but are actually British subjects and entitled to the benefit of capitulatory Treaty rights.
- (c.) The French action both in Tunis and Morocco is evidently founded on the error that these British subjects do not possess British nationality. The French Ambassador's note of the 14th December last (concerning Tunis) in paragraphs 3 and 4 clearly implies this, and that the French Government are fully aware that valid objection would exist if these persons were British subjects. The measures should therefore be withdrawn. If not, the matter must be submitted to arbitration.

8. The latest note of the French Government (Paper (H)) shows that they still maintain their contention that the provisions of English law are insufficient to conserve the British national status of persons of British descent beyond the second generation born in extra-territorial countries. It asserts that the French Government has, conjointly with the Sultan of Morocco, the sovereign right of legislating concerning the nationality of the descendants of foreigners in virtue of their birth in Morocco from the moment that foreign Powers, in accepting the French protectorate, abdicate all title to the maintenance of the prolongation of their privilege of jurisdiction. This sovereign right cannot be referred to arbitration.

9. The refusal of the French Government to admit to arbitration questions affecting the British community in Morocco (French Zone) gives rise to considerations which are set out in paragraph 11 of the separate Foreign Office letter of to-day's date concerning the Tunis Decrees. It seems unnecessary to repeat these considerations in the present letter, but it will be convenient to indicate the paragraphs of the separate letter in which they and the further relevant considerations are set out. I am accordingly to invite reference to paragraphs 11, 12 (1) and (2), 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of that letter as being seemingly applicable also to the questions arising out of the Decrees issued in Morocco (French Zone).

10. As regards paragraph 18 of the separate Foreign Office letter it may be observed that the claim of the French Government referred to therein receives a somewhat fuller development in the latest note of the French Government concerning Morocco, where it is asserted that the French Government has conjointly with the Sultan of Morocco, the sovereign right of legislating upon the nationality of the descendants of foreigners in virtue of their birth in Morocco. This sovereign right it is added cannot be submitted to arbitration.

FRANCE.

11. On this latter point, it should be remarked that since the recognition by His Majesty's Government of the French protectorate over Morocco (French Zone), protracted negotiations passed with the French Government with a view to the conclusion of an arrangement under which Great Britain would relinquish British extra-territorial rights in Morocco (French Zone) in return for a similar surrender of French extra-territorial rights in Egypt. It is material to note that the draft Treaty prepared for the purpose contained a provision which was agreed to by both sides, under which the children of foreigners who enjoyed the privileges attaching to foreigners in Morocco would acquire their own foreign nationality, and would not become Moroccan subjects. This appears to be entirely at variance with the contention now advanced by the French Government in the latter part of their note of the 7th April (Paper (H)).

12. In communicating to you the accompanying papers together with the foregoing observations, I am to ask that you will be good enough to take them into your early consideration, in conjunction with the separate reference of to-day's date relative to the similar Decrees promulgated in Tunis, and favour Lord Balfour with your opinion on the following points:—

- (1.) Are His Majesty's Government entitled to protest against the French and Moroccan Decrees of the 8th November, 1921, so far as those Decrees purport to affect persons in Morocco (French Zone) entitled to British nationality, and if so, on what ground?
- (2.) In the case of British subjects born in Morocco (French Zone) whose claim to British nationality may be founded upon the proviso to section 1 (1) of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," are the objections raised by the French Government to the retroactive effect of this legislation valid?
- (3.) Are the French contentions sound that they possess in conjunction with the Sultan of Morocco the sovereign right of legislating concerning the nationality of the descendants of foreigners in virtue of their birth in Morocco from the moment that foreign Powers accept the French protectorate, and that this sovereign right cannot be referred to arbitration? If not, on what grounds should the French contention be contested?
- (4.) In the event of a claim for arbitration being renewed, what should be the terms of the question or questions to be submitted to the tribunal?

Lord Balfour would also be glad to be favoured with any general observations you may be good enough to make on the questions which have arisen and the course to be pursued.

I have, &c.
G. H. VILLIERS.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Extract from French "Annuaire colonial," 1921, concerning Morocco.
- (B.) Treaty between France and Morocco of March 30, 1912. ("State Papers," Vol. 106, pp. 1023-24.)
- (C.) Decree of the Sultan of Morocco, November 8, 1921. (T 16077/8936/328/1921.)
- (D.) Decree of the President of the French Republic, November 8, 1921. (T 15481/8936/328/1921.)
- (E.) Lord Hardinge to French Government, January 10, 1922. (T 465/465/328/1922.)
- (F.) French Government to Lord Hardinge, February 11, 1922. (T 2123/465/328/1922.)
- (G.) Lord Hardinge to French Government, February 28, 1922. (T 2776/465/328/1922.)
- (H.) French Government to Lord Hardinge, April 7, 1922. (T 4421/465/328/1922.)

FRANCE.

Report.

We refer to our report* in answer to the Foreign Office despatch relating to Tunis and reply to the present questions briefly as follows:—

- (1.) In our opinion, Yes.
- (2.) In our opinion, No.
- (3.) In our opinion, No.

The claim advanced appears to exceed what can be done by a protecting Power in virtue of its protectorate and to confuse sovereign rights therewith.

- (4.) We prefer to postpone the reply to this question until after a consultation,† which would be useful.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

Law Officers' Department,
July 11, 1922.

* No.

† This consultation took place on the 4th August, 1922, when the Law Officers expressed their opinion that the questions to be submitted to arbitration should be as follows:—

1. Is the Government of the French Republic entitled to impose French nationality upon any, and if so what, persons born and resident in the French zone of Morocco who are descendants in the male line of British subjects?
2. Is the Decree of the 8th November, 1921, made by the President of the French Republic, in so far as it purports to impose French nationality upon British subjects, in accordance with international law?

[T 8218/224/317/1922]

No. 4.

[July 11, 1922.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 6, 1922.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Earl of Balfour, to lay before you, for your consideration, the papers noted in the accompanying list relative to Decrees recently promulgated in Tunis (Papers (A) and (B)), under which the French Government seek to impose French nationality and the consequent obligations of French military service on members of the European communities in Tunis.

2. With regard to the position occupied by the French Government in Tunis, this appears to amount to no more than a protectorate over a country which is under the sovereignty of a native ruler, the Bey of Tunis. An extract (Paper (C)) from the French "Annuaire Colonial" for 1921, an authoritative work, setting forth the method of administration of that country, is enclosed, as well as a copy of the Treaty between France and Tunis (Paper (D)) referred to in that extract, for convenience of reference.

3. His Majesty's Government formerly possessed capitulatory rights of jurisdiction in Tunis, but these lapsed either in 1897, as His Majesty's Government contend, or in 1883, as the French Government contend. On the 20th June, 1883, in a note addressed by Lord Granville to the French Ambassador (Paper (E)), His Majesty's Government consented "to waive the rights of this country under the Capitulations and Treaties to the extent which may be required to give full scope to the exercise of civil and criminal jurisdiction over British subjects by the new French tribunals." On the 31st December, 1883, an Order in Council (Paper (F)) was issued abolishing British consular jurisdiction in Tunis in all such matters as come within the jurisdiction of the French tribunals. It was not, however, until 1897, by the Anglo-French Convention of the 18th September, 1897 (Paper (G)), to [9930]

Imposition of French nationality and French military service on British community in Tunis.

determine the relations of Great Britain in Tunis, and to define clearly the Treaty position of Great Britain in that Regency, that the capitulatory rights of this country in Tunis were finally extinguished. The material provisions of that Convention are contained in Article 1, and fall under three heads:—

- (1.) All Treaties between Great Britain and France were extended to Tunis;
- (2.) Great Britain abstained from claiming for its Consuls, subjects and establishments in Tunis other rights and privileges than those secured for it in France; and
- (3.) The treatment of the most favoured nation secured by the afore-mentioned treaties were guaranteed to Great Britain for forty years.

As regards (3), an exchange of notes dated the 8th March/the 23rd May, 1919 (Paper (H)) substituted for this provision an undertaking on the part of the French Government not to accord to the subjects of a third Power a treatment which would not be effectively applicable to British subjects.

4. On the 8th November last the Decrees (Papers (A) and (B)) were published in Tunis in the form of (A) an edict in the name of the territorial sovereign, the Bey of Tunis, and (B) an edict signed by the President of the French Republic. The former pronounces Tunisian all persons born in Tunis of parents of whom one was also born there, with the exception of the citizens, subjects and ressortissants of the protecting Powers, under reserve of Treaty stipulations. The latter pronounces French all persons born in Tunis of parents of whom one, justiciable "au titre étranger" before the French tribunals of the protectorate, was also born there. Certain qualifications are mentioned in the French Decree, but these seem of little importance.

5. There is in Tunis a large community of Maltese origin, who, since the withdrawal in 1883 of the British Consular Courts, have been justiciable before the French tribunals. Under the Decrees of the 8th November last members of that community born in Tunis of parents of whom one was also born there, were required by the French authorities to register themselves forthwith as French, and to come forward to have their names inscribed in the French military registers. These proceedings have given rise to urgent and repeated representations to His Majesty's Government from the Maltese community, who claim as British subjects the protection of His Majesty's Government against the imposition of French nationality, as well as against the measures taken by the French authorities to compel their acceptance of the obligations of the Decrees. These measures are reported by His Majesty's Consul-General in Tunis to have been of a harsh and arbitrary nature, and accompanied by threats, such as the withdrawal of fishing licences, &c., in the event of non-compliance. His Majesty's Government have addressed special representations to the French Government against these oppressive proceedings, but without obtaining from that Government more than a general denial that they exist. His Majesty's Consul-General has now been asked to furnish a comprehensive report and such evidence as is available to substantiate the complaints made. Mr. Sarell has also been informed that His Majesty's Government decline in any way to recognise that the Decrees have any application to British subjects in Tunis, and has been asked to obtain if possible lists of members of the British community registered as French by the French officials.

6. In this connection it is to be noted that the French Government in the course of the correspondence (referred to more fully hereafter) which has passed between them and His Majesty's Government on the subject of these Decrees in Tunis argue that previous to the passing of Section 1 (1) of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914" (Paper (I)), which they contend cannot have a retroactive effect, there was no provision of English law beyond the statutory enactments applicable to all foreign countries which would conserve the British status of persons of British descent born in extra-territorial countries.

7. The argument that the British national status of the members of the community affected had already lapsed indeed forms an important feature of the communications which have been received from the French Government. On the 14th December last a note was received from the French Ambassador (Paper (J)), which, in complaining of the attitude of His Majesty's Consul-General in Tunis in obstructing the operation of the French Decree, argued from the terms of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," that persons of Maltese origin of the second generation born in Tunis do not possess British nationality, and would remain without nationality if the sovereign of the place of their birth did not grant them his. To avoid the profound modification of the régime to which these persons were accustomed the French Decrees substituted for them French nationality in place of Tunisian nationality. It was added: "Une telle mesure ne souffre au point de vue juridique aucune objection dès l'instant qu'elle a pour but de donner une nationalité à des individus qui n'en ont pas."

8. This argument, drawn from the Act of 1914, is of course incorrect, for previous to the passing of that Act, which only became operative on the 1st January, 1915, British nationality extended to two generations born abroad under the Acts 4 Geo. II, c. 21 and 13 Geo. III, c. 21. It would appear, therefore, that the French Government originally proceeded upon a wrong estimate of English law as to nationality, and this view is supported by statements which appeared in the Tunisian press in the course of vigorous propaganda waged there, urging the descendants of British subjects, who had been abandoned by Great Britain, to come under the protecting folds of the French flag. It is also supported by information originally received by His Majesty's Government, that the Italian Ambassador at Paris was told in conversation by the French Government, that the Tunis Decrees were intended to apply to the Maltese community alone. But, however this may be, the French Government have since found it necessary to adopt other though equally questionable arguments to justify the imposition of French nationality on members of the foreign communities born in Tunis.

9. On the 3rd January last, His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, on the instructions of His Majesty's Government, communicated to the French Government a note (Paper (K)), which in pointing out the misapprehension entertained by that Government as to the nationality laws of this country, protested strongly against any attempt to impose French nationality and the obligations of French military service upon members of the British community in Tunis, proceedings which were, moreover, contrary to Article 1 of the Anglo-French Convention of the 18th September, 1897, relative to Tunis (Paper (G)), modified by the notes exchanged on the 8th March/the 23rd May, 1919 (Paper (H)). The correspondence which passed with the French Government is fully set out in Papers (K), (L), (M) and (N), and the points maintained by His Majesty's Government may for convenience of reference be brought under the following heads:—

- (a.) Concerning the British status of those affected.—Children born in extra-territorial countries of British parents are British subjects. Section 1 (1), last paragraph, of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," merely put into statute form what had long existed in the common law.
- (b.) Concerning British Capitulatory rights in Tunis.—These prevailed until 1897. In 1883 His Majesty's Government only consented to French tribunals exercising on their behalf rights they still maintained vis-à-vis the Bey of Tunis.
- (c.) Concerning British Treaty rights under the Convention of 1897.—There is no similarity of treatment of British subjects in Tunis and France, as guaranteed by Article 1, when those in Tunis, on the erroneous assumption that they have no nationality, are compulsorily made French by a French Decree substituted for that of the territorial sovereign. There is apparently no right to impose French nationality on British subjects in Tunis. As for French nationality proper, changes in the past have always been accompanied by a right of option to those newly affected.
- (d.) Further, the notes of the 8th March/the 23rd May, 1919, modifying Article 1 of that Convention accorded to British subjects in Tunis a treatment on demand in effect identical with that of the subjects of any third Power.
- (e.) The difference which has arisen, being exclusively of a legal nature, should be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

10. The last note of the French Government (Paper (N)) deals with these points in the following way:—

- (a.) English common law with regard to nationality can be no more than the ius soli. Any extension beyond this limit assumes the assimilation of foreign territory to British territory, which is contrary to international law.

- (b.) British capitulatory rights of jurisdiction in Tunis terminated in 1883. Lord Granville's note of the 20th June, 1883, said nothing about delegation of jurisdictional rights to France. The Order in Council of the 31st December, 1883 (Paper (F)), suppressed those rights.
- (c.) The object of the French Decree was not to confer nationality on persons of no nationality. It applies to all persons who cannot invoke express Treaty rights. The measure was taken for general reasons by the two Governments of Tunis and France, closely associated (étroitement associés) as protector and protected. Its purpose was to extend to Tunis the French Nationality Law of 1889. Considerations based on past modifications of French law are irrelevant. The law applied in Tunis is the present French law.
- (d.) The most-favoured-nation treatment spoken of in Article 1 of the Convention of 1897, related not to the juridical position of persons, but to the economic treatment of goods. To claim on this ground a treatment superior to that of British subjects in France is contrary to Article 1 of the Convention.
- (e.) The Anglo-French Arbitration Convention of the 14th October, 1903 (Paper (O)), provides for the settlement of certain differences by submission to The Hague tribunal provided inter alia they do not affect the interests of a third Power. But apart from the fact that the interests of a third Power, Tunis, are affected, questions of nationality are too closely associated to the constitution of the State to be deemed wholly juridical. Such appears to be also the English point of view. The right of legislating in matters of nationality has never been referred to arbitration. Accordingly, arbitration is refused.

11. In view of the refusal of the French Government, on grounds which appear to Lord Balfour wholly inadequate, to submit to arbitration questions seriously affecting the welfare of the British community in Tunis, it appears to be desirable to bring the matter before the Council of the League of Nations under Article 11 (second paragraph) or other Article of the Covenant of the League of Nations (Paper (P)). Before doing so, however, his Lordship is of opinion that a further reply should be made to the note of the French Government (Paper (N)). It is suggested that this reply should not deal individually with all their arguments, more particularly those concerning British Nationality Law, on which His Majesty's Government may reasonably claim to be in a better position to judge than the French Government. The other arguments, and more especially the contention that the questions cannot be referred to arbitration because they deal with nationality, which is claimed as a subject within their sovereign legislative power, would, however, require to be more fully dealt with. This contention, it is obvious, merely burks the whole point at issue, which is whether the French Government are entitled to enact legislation in a sovereign State under their protection affecting British subjects, and exposing those British subjects to compulsory service in the French army. In Lord Balfour's opinion the reply to the French contention ought, therefore, to develop the view that a refusal to arbitrate this question, which is wholly juridical, and involves a recognised principle of international law, viz., that a State has no right to impose—outside its territories—the obligations of nationality, still less to insist that a foreign subject shall abandon in its favour his nationality of origin (see Hall, International Law, 7th edition, p. 225), would, if persisted in by the French Government, reduce the Arbitration Conventions, on which hope has been placed as the best means of ensuring the pacific settlement of international disputes, to mere empty words. In this way the refusal of arbitration might be made one of the grounds in the case presented by His Majesty's Government before the Council of the League of Nations, and in this connection Article 13 of the Covenant (Paper (P)) would naturally be relied on in addition to the Anglo-French Arbitration Convention (Paper (O)), or preferably a reference of the matters at issue to the Court of International Justice set up under Article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations would be claimed.

12. Before, however, taking steps in this direction, Lord Balfour considers it would be advisable to examine more fully the contentions on which, for the purpose of the representations addressed to the French Government, His Majesty's Government have hitherto relied. The important points appear to be: (1) the status in English law of the persons of British descent affected; (2) the right of the French Government to impose in the manner adopted in this case French nationality on British subjects in virtue of their birth not on French territory but on that of a sovereign State under French protection; (3) the date of termination of British capitulatory rights of jurisdiction, i.e., whether in 1883 or 1897; and (4) the bearing of Article 1 of the Anglo-French Convention of the 18th September, 1897, on the question which has arisen. On these points the following observations may be made:—

13. The principle of the jus sanguinis, by which nationality is acquired through paternal descent, was unknown to the common law, and before "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," came into effect the operative statutes were "The British Nationality Act, 1730" (4 Geo. II, c. 21), which conferred the status of natural-born British subject upon the son born abroad of a natural-born British father; and "The British Nationality Act, 1772" (13 Geo. III, c. 21), which extended this principle so as to confer the status of British subject also upon the grandson born abroad. It is probable that the majority of the members of the British community in Tunis are, apart from any question of the capitulatory rights of jurisdiction formerly possessed by His Majesty's Government in that country, British subjects in virtue of the Acts of 1730 and 1772, i.e., as being the children or grand-children of persons who were themselves born within His Majesty's dominions.

14. The status of the children born in extra-territorial countries of British subjects forms the subject of the special provision contained in Section 1 (1), last paragraph, of the Act of 1914, which regards such children, whether born before or after the passing of that Act, as born within His Majesty's allegiance. This provision was framed to give effect to the recommendation of your predecessors in their report of the 18th August, 1904 (Paper (Q)), in order to set at rest any doubt which might arise as to the British nationality of the descendants of British subjects beyond the second generation born in the Ottoman dominions or other country in which His Majesty's Government exercised extra-territorial jurisdiction. As will be seen from that report, these persons were, in the view of your predecessors, British subjects at common law. They have accordingly hitherto been treated as such, and have been so registered at His Majesty's consulates in the Ottoman dominions and elsewhere where similar conditions have existed. It is, however, not altogether easy to find definite authority for the proposition that these persons were British subjects at common law. In addition to the argument derived by your predecessors from Calvin's case, reference may perhaps be made to Bacon v. Bacon (1641), Cro. Car. 601; 79 E.R. 1117; and R. v. Busheir, 11 Mod. 167.

15. The terms of Section 1 (1), last paragraph of the Act of 1914, particularly the word "exercises," perhaps raise some doubt as to the application of that clause to cases in which British rights of jurisdiction had already ceased to be exercised before the passing of that Act, and more especially in the case of Tunis, where, assuming British capitulatory rights of jurisdiction to have prevailed till 1897, these rights were from 1884 onwards exercised not by British Consular Courts, but by the French tribunals. It will also be observed from the correspondence which has passed with the French Government that the latter deny that the Act of 1914 can have any retroactive effect. These points, however, seem to be covered by the fact that, if these persons were already British subjects at common law, the clause of the Act of 1914 merely confirms a provision of English law already existing, and it is accordingly on this ground that His Majesty's Government have relied in that correspondence. Moreover, if the view of your predecessors in their report of the 18th August, 1904, is taken in its entirety, it would seem that these persons are, apart from any question of extra-territorial rights, British subjects as being born without the allegiance of any other State, since no nationality law claiming their allegiance has hitherto existed in Tunis. And, in any case, the contention of the French Government that they can only be regarded as British subjects on the assumption that Tunisian territory is regarded as British territory is incorrect, since they are claimed as British subjects not in virtue of having been born on British territory, but in virtue of having been born within His Majesty's allegiance.

16. Before leaving this part of the question, the accompanying memorandum (Paper (R)), prepared by the Home Office in 1919 on the interpretation of Section 1 of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," may be found useful, more especially as regards the significance of the words "born within His Majesty's allegiance," as used in the proviso thereto.

17. With regard to the French Decrees of the 8th November last, it appears to Lord Balfour that there is no warrant in international law for the exercise by the French Government of what amounts to a jus soli in a country which is not French territory, in virtue of the protectorate they have established over it. Theoretically, French citizens are as much foreigners in Tunis as are British subjects. The position appears to be analogous to what might happen, e.g., in Egypt, if, having maintained their protectorate over that country, and having by agreement obtained from other Powers a waiver of their capitulatory rights of jurisdiction while preserving their own, His Majesty's Government were then to decree that all Europeans of the second generation born in Egypt were British subjects. Such a proceeding would seem to conform neither to the jus soli nor to the jus sanguinis, the principles on which nationality law is founded, and it is easy to foresee that any such measure would have given rise to strong representations from foreign Powers, whose subjects were affected, and more particularly from the French Government itself.

18. It is of interest to observe the progressive development of the French claim in the course of the correspondence which has taken place. In the note of the French Ambassador of the 14th December last (Paper (J)), concerning Tunis, it is said that the members of the Maltese community affected being without nationality would necessarily continue in this state if the Sovereign of the place of their birth did not grant them his. By substitution the French Decree preserved for them a European status. No objection, it was added, could be entertained to such a measure from the juridical point of view from the moment that the purpose was to give a nationality to persons who had none. In the later note of the French Government of the 22nd March (Paper (N)) this explanation is referred to as incidental and as only concerning the faculty of application of the measure, which had been taken by the two Governments of France and Tunis closely associated as protector and protected. Contrariwise, in another passage of that note the interests of Tunis are referred to by the French Government as those of a third Power. In the same note it is asserted that a question which intimately concerns the exercise of sovereign legislative rights cannot be referred to arbitration.

19. As regards the date at which the capitulatory rights of jurisdiction formerly possessed by Great Britain in Tunis ceased, the contention of His Majesty's Government rests on the qualifications set forth in the note addressed by Lord Granville to M. Tissot on the 20th June, 1883 (Paper (E)), which, in consenting to waive the rights of this country under the Capitulations and Treaties, did so only to the extent which might be required to give full scope to the exercise of civil and criminal jurisdiction over British subjects by the new French tribunals. It was added that His Majesty's Government did not believe it would be expedient to extend the change beyond what was required by the circumstances of the case, and they acceded to the request of the French Government subject to this and the other reservations mentioned in that note. (Certain further papers (Papers (S) and (T)) are enclosed as showing more fully the position which existed in Tunis at the time.) For these reasons His Majesty's Government have maintained throughout the recent correspondence with the French Government that the changes which took place in 1883 amounted to no more than a consent on their part that the French tribunals should exercise capitulatory rights of jurisdiction, which they still maintained vis-à-vis the territorial Sovereign, the Bey of Tunis.

20. But even if it should be found that His Majesty's Government are in the circumstances which happened in 1883, unable now to maintain this contention, it does not appear that the situation would be very materially altered. There can be no question that British capitulatory rights of jurisdiction existed at any rate till the end of 1883, and if persons of British origin born in that country previous to 1884 are deemed to have been born within His Majesty's allegiance, it would seem that their children and grandchildren born in Tunis after that date possess British nationality, in virtue of the Acts 4 Geo. II, c. 21, and 13 Geo. III, c. 21 (repealed only by the Act of 1914), as being the children and grandchildren born abroad of persons who were by the common law natural-born British subjects. This would apparently suffice to cover the great part of the British community in Tunis with the exception of children of tender age.

21. The last point concerns the bearing of the Anglo-French Convention of the 18th September, 1897, relative to Tunis (Paper (G)) on the question. As mentioned in paragraph 3 above, the relevant provisions of Article 1 of that Convention fall under three heads: (1) Treaties between Great Britain and France were extended to Tunis; (2) Great Britain abstained from claiming for its subjects other rights and privileges than those secured for it in France; and (3) the most-favoured-nation treatment secured by the above-mentioned treaties was guaranteed for forty years. As regards (1), the only treaty of importance extended appears to be the Convention with France of the 28th February, 1882 (Paper (V)), "to regulate the commercial and maritime relations of the two countries as well as the status of their subjects." This Treaty which is still in existence provided in Article 1 for most-favoured-nation treatment in certain matters of commerce, as well as "the enjoyment of all legal rights and privileges"; and these most-favoured-nation rights would under (3) be extended to British subjects in Tunis for forty years. As already explained in paragraph 3 of the present letter, however, the exchange of notes of the 8th March/ the 23rd May, 1919 (Paper (H)), replaced this latter provision, and amounted to an undertaking by the French Government not to accord to the subjects or goods of a third Power in Tunis a treatment which will not be effectively applicable to British subjects or goods.

22. This stipulation is of importance as a Convention of the 28th September, 1896, exists between France and Italy, which (Paper (V)), in Articles 1, 2 and 3, provides that Italian subjects in Tunis, who shall be deemed to have preserved under Italian law their Italian nationality, shall be granted the same civil rights as French citizens, and shall be granted exemption from military service. For this reason His Majesty's Government in the course of the correspondence with the French Government have maintained that the notes exchanged in 1919 accord to British subjects in Tunis, on their demand, the same rights as may be accorded to the subjects of any third Power, and although the French Government argue that these notes relate only to economic and not juridical matters, it does not appear to Lord Balfour from the terms of the French note of the 8th March, 1919 (Paper (H)), that there is any good reason why the contention of His Majesty's Government should not be maintained.

23. Finally, as regards the contention of the French Government that the clause (2) of Article 1 of the Convention of 1897 is fully satisfied if British subjects born in Tunis are treated in the same manner as British subjects born in France, and thus regarded as French citizens and liable to French military service, this contention in substance denies the existence of any distinction arising out of birth on Tunisian territory and birth on French territory respectively, and appears to be entirely unsound. By the Decree of the 8th November last, published in Tunis, the French Government profess to apply to that country the French Nationality Law of the 26th June, 1889 (Paper (W)), and in particular that part of it, Article 8, paragraph 3, which enacts that every individual born in France of a foreigner also born there is French. The contention is, therefore, that the law of 1889, which modified the Civil Code of the French Republic of 1803, can be applied to a country under French protection, and that persons born in Tunis in circumstances similar to those set out in Article 8, paragraph 3, of the French Civil Code in regard to persons born in France, may be regarded as French citizens.

24. Moreover, the French Civil Code, which was amended by the French Nationality Law of the 26th June, 1889, decrees in Article 2, which appears to be of general application, "La loi ne dispose que pour l'avenir; elle n'a point d'effet rétroactif." In the note of Lord Dufferin dated the 18th November, 1892 (Paper (W)), enclosing the French Law of the 26th June, 1889, it is stated that the latter law had no retrospective effect; and in practice it did not apply to persons who, having been born in France of a foreigner also born there, had already under the right accorded by the former French Law of the 16th December, 1874, exercised that right at the age of 21 to decline French nationality. Generally, therefore, it may be said that the French Nationality Law of 1889 did not apply to persons of this category who were already of age at the time of its promulgation. In the case of Tunis, on the other hand, the French Government seek not only to apply French Nationality Law to that country, but to apply it to persons of whatever age who may have been born in the past under the conditions named in their Decree.

25. It only remains to add that in the case of other countries whose subjects are affected by the Decrees issued in Tunis, the Greek Government have already addressed a protest to the French Government, and a demand for arbitration, which has been rejected by the latter Government. As regards Italy, there is a large Italian community in Tunis numbering, it is said, 150,000 persons, and the matter has been taken up seriously by the Italian Government, who are disposed to rely on their Treaty rights and are continuing their negotiations with the French Government. According to information recently received from the Italian Embassy here, the Italian Government intend to pursue the matter energetically, and, while ready to concert with His Majesty's Government in diplomatic action, are indisposed at present to resort to arbitration.

26. In communicating to you the accompanying papers with the foregoing observations, I am to request that you will take them into your early consideration, and favour Earl Balfour with your opinion on the following points:—

- (1.) Are His Majesty's Government entitled to protest against the French and

FRANCE.

Tunisian Nationality Decrees of the 8th November, 1921, so far as those Decrees purport to affect persons in Tunis entitled to British nationality, and if so, on what grounds?

- (2.) In the case of British subjects born in Tunis whose claim to British nationality must be founded on the proviso to Section 1 of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914"—
 - (a.) Should 1883 or 1897 be regarded as the date at which His Majesty ceased to exercise jurisdiction over British subjects in Tunis?
 - (b.) Are the objections advanced by the French Government to the retroactive effect of this legislation valid?
- (3.) Are the French contentions sound that as nationality is too closely associated with the constitution of a State to be deemed wholly juridical, the controversy is not one which should be submitted to arbitration? If not, on what grounds should the French contention be contested?
- (4.) In the event of a claim for arbitration being renewed, what should be the terms of the question or questions to be submitted to the tribunal?
- (5.) Do the terms of the notes exchanged with the French Government on the 8th March/the 23rd May, 1919, in substitution for the most-favoured-nation provisions of Article 1 of the Agreement of September 1897, enable His Majesty's Government to claim for British subjects in Tunis all benefits which may be accorded to subjects of third Powers in Tunis in virtue of special Treaty arrangements, or is this privilege confined to commercial matters?

Lord Balfour would also be glad to be favoured with any general observations you may be good enough to make on the questions which have arisen and the course to be pursued.

I have, &c.

G. H. VILLIERS.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Decree of the Bey of Tunis, November 8, 1921. (T 14261/11967/317/1921.)
- (B.) Decree of the President of the French Republic, November 8, 1921. (T 14261/11967/347/1921.)
- (C.) Extract from French "Annuaire Colonial," 1921, concerning Tunis.
- (D.) Treaty between France and Tunis, May 12, 1881. ("State Papers," vol. 72, pp. 247-249.)
- (E.) Lord Granville to M. Tissot, June 20, 1883.
- (F.) Order in Council, December 31, 1883. (4905*.)
- (G.) Anglo-French Convention relative to Tunis, September 18, 1897. (T 1015.)
- (H.) Notes exchanged with France, March 8/May 23, 1919. ("State Papers," vol. 112, pp. 721-722.)
- (I.) British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914. (A.P., 369.)
- (J.) French Ambassador to Lord Curzon, December 14, 1921. (T 15767/11967/317/1921.)
- (K.) Lord Hardinge to French Government, January 3, 1922. (T 1795/224/317/1922.)
- (L.) French Government to Lord Hardinge, January 16, 1922. (T 911/224/317/1922.)
- (M.) Lord Hardinge to French Government, February 6, 1922. (T 1880/224/317/1922.)
- (N.) French Government to Lord Hardinge, March 22, 1922. (T 3725/224/317/1922.)
- (O.) Anglo-French Arbitration Convention, October 14, 1903. (T 1162, "Parliamentary Paper," 497 A.)
- (P.) Covenant of the League of Nations.
- (Q.) Law Officers' Report, August 18, 1904.
- (R.) Home Office memorandum on section 1 of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914."
- (S.) Extract from Memorandum concerning Tunis, October 13, 1898.
- (T.) Memorandum respecting Consular prerogatives in Tunis, July 1902, Confidential. (7748.)
- (U.) Anglo-French Commercial Convention, February 28, 1882. (T 695.)
- (V.) Consular Convention between France and Italy in regard to Tunis, September 28, 1896. ("State Papers," vol. 88, pp. 721-734.)
- (W.) French Nationality Law of June 26, 1889. (Extract from "Parliamentary Paper," 3533.)

Report.

(1.) We are of opinion that His Majesty's Government are entitled to protest against the French and Tunisian nationality Decrees of the 8th November, 1921, so far as those Decrees purport to affect persons in Tunis entitled to British nationality.

We agree with the arguments set out in the Despatch under reply, and generally in the accompanying correspondence on behalf of His Majesty's Government, and also with the Report of the Law Officers dated the 4th August, 1904, subject to the observations below. We desire to add, however, that the question whether persons of British descent born in a foreign country (not being a British protectorate) where His Majesty exercises jurisdiction over British subjects by Capitulation or Treaty are British subjects at Common Law is a difficult and obscure one upon which there is no direct authority. The reasoning, based upon Calvin's case of the Law Officers in their above-mentioned Report is in our opinion a sound application of the principles established in that case, and has some confirmation from the case of Abdul Messih v. Farra, 13 A.C. per Lord Watson at p. 440. But it cannot be affirmed that the law is so clear that another view might not be adopted if the point came up for judicial decision.

In this connection the fact referred to in the Foreign Office Despatch of the 5th May, 1903, that Professor Dicey held a contrary opinion to that of the then Law Officers cannot be overlooked, though his opinion was expressed before the Law Officers wrote theirs.

(2.)—(a.) This question is by no means free from doubt. On the whole, we think there is sufficient ground for regarding 1897 as the date at which His Majesty ceased to exercise jurisdiction over British subjects in Tunis for the reasons given, and upon the arguments advanced in paragraph 19 of the Despatch.

(2.)—(b.) In our opinion, No.

Section 1 of the Act of 1914, in so far as relevant to the present question, is in our opinion declaratory of the Common Law. We have sufficiently indicated under (1), above, the reasons for this view, as well as the measure of difficulty attaching to it.

Further, it must be remembered that the Act of 1914 did not enlarge, but rather restricted the law as enacted by the Statute of 13 Geo. III, Cap. 21.

(3.) In our opinion, No.

The controversy is of the nature contemplated as proper for submission to arbitration both under the Agreement of the 14th October, 1903, and Article 13 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. The difference is clearly of a "legal nature," and it does not concern the interests of Tunis in any sense within the intention of Article 1 of the said Agreement. The only manner in which Tunis's interests are involved is in the question whether France, as protecting Power, is entitled to treat Tunis as her own territory, and in this question Tunis's interests are attacked by France and defended by Great Britain. Further, "the difference" does not, in our opinion, "affect the vital interests, the independence or the honour" of France.

Under Article 13 of the Covenant, the dispute is "suitable for submission to arbitration," and further, it is (in part) a dispute "as to any question of international law" within that Article. The dispute does not relate to the constitution or sovereign rights of the French State, but to its position as protecting Power of Tunis, and its power, as such, to promulgate the Decree in question and thereby to affect persons claiming to be British subjects.

(4.) We postpone answering this question at present as it requires more prolonged consideration, and we would prefer to draw up the question or questions for submission to arbitration after consultation* upon the matter.

(5.) In our opinion, Yes.

The words used are too wide to be restricted to commercial matters only.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

Law Officers' Department,
July 11, 1922.

* This consultation took place on the 4th August, 1922, when the Law Officers expressed their opinion that the questions to be submitted to arbitration should be as follows:—

1. Is the Government of the French Republic entitled to impose French nationality upon any and, if so, what persons born and resident in the Regency of Tunis who are descendants in the male line of British subjects?
2. Is the decree of the 8th November, 1921, made by the President of the French Republic, in so far as it purports to impose French nationality upon British subjects, in accordance with international law?
3. Should 1883 or 1897 be regarded as the date at which His Majesty ceased to exercise jurisdiction over British subjects in the Regency of Tunis?

[9930]

D

4. Do the terms of the notes exchanged between the French Ambassador in London and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, dated respectively the 8th March, 1919, and the 23rd May, 1919, enable His Majesty's Government to claim for British subjects in Tunis all benefits and rights which may be accorded by the Government of the French Republic to subjects of third Powers in Tunis, or are the terms of the said notes confined to commercial matters?

GENERAL.

[T 1219/626/330/1922]

No. 4^a.[Board of Customs and Excise.]

[January 18, 1922.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers.

Offences committed on foreign vessels outside the 3-mile limit:
Application
of British Customs
Acts.

THE question upon which the opinion of the Law Officers is sought is whether certain provisions of the Customs Acts violate the principle of international law that a country may not exercise jurisdiction over offences committed on a foreign ship more than 3 miles from its coasts. The question was raised first in 1911, when the Russian Government apparently quoted section 53 of "The Customs Consolidation Act, 1876," as a precedent for extending the Russian fishery limit from 3 miles to 12 miles from the coast. The matter has been raised again by two specific incidents, viz.: (a) an enactment of the Norwegian Government extending Norwegian territorial waters to a limit of 10 sea miles, with a view to the prevention of the smuggling of intoxicating liquor. It is understood that the Norwegian Government quoted the English Customs Acts as a precedent for such an extension; and (b) the arrest by the United States Government of a British ship, the "Henry L. Marshal," outside the 3-mile limit for the offence of smuggling intoxicating liquor. It is not known that the United States Government have quoted the Customs Acts as a precedent for this seizure, but it is possible that it may be referred to in the negotiations relating to this case.

The question is only of importance in so far as the British Customs Acts may be quoted by a foreign State as a precedent for claiming jurisdiction over offences committed outside the 3-mile limit. The Customs and Excise Department do not attempt to seize or search any foreign vessel outside this limit, or to prosecute for offences committed on a foreign ship or by a foreigner outside it. So far as can be traced, the last case in which the Customs interfered with a foreign vessel outside the 3-mile limit was that of the French vessel, the "Petit Jules," in the year 1850. This case is presumed to have arisen under one of the earlier sections of the Act, 8 & 9 Vict., cap. 87, the statute then in force for the prevention of smuggling. These sections differed greatly from section 179 of the Act of 1876, which is derived from them.

By the directions of the Treasury, the Commissioners now request the opinion of the Law Officers upon this matter. So far as the Commissioners are aware, the only sections which have been quoted, or are likely to be quoted, as involving a claim to jurisdiction over foreign vessels at a distance exceeding 3 miles from the coast of the United Kingdom are sections 53, 135, 141, 142, 147, 169, 179, 180, 181, 189, 190, 229 and 282 of "The Customs Consolidation Act, 1876" (39 & 40 Vict., cap. 36), and section 7 of "The Revenue Act, 1883" (46 & 47 Vict., cap. 55). It will be necessary to deal with the individual sections in some detail.

Section 53.

This section occurs in a part of the Act commencing with section 50 and headed "As to report of Cargo." Section 50 provides that the master of every ship within twenty-four hours of arriving at a port in the United Kingdom from parts beyond the seas is to make due report of his ship, and such report, except in special cases, is to be made before bulk shall be broken. Section 51 imposes a penalty on a master failing to make report, and section 52 deals with a report by the captain of a King's ship which brings into the country goods laden in parts beyond the seas; section 53 provides that the master of every ship (i.e., whether British or foreign) arriving from parts beyond the seas shall at the time of making report answer the questions of the customs officers. If he refuses to answer or "if after the arrival within 4 leagues of the coast of the United Kingdom bulk shall be broken, or any alteration made in the stowage of the cargo of such ship so as to facilitate the unloading of any part of such cargo before report of such ship or cargo, or if any part be staved, destroyed or thrown overboard or any package be opened," the master incurs a penalty. It is submitted that this section is limited in its application to ships which actually arrive at a port in the United Kingdom, and that, if a vessel breaks bulk outside territorial waters, although within 4 leagues of the coast, and proceeds on her voyage to a port in some other country, no penalty under this section is incurred. A ship need not come into a British port unless it is desired to bring her there, but if she does come, the effect of the section is that her master must comply with the conditions on which she is allowed to come, that he must make report in the ordinary course when he arrives, and that he must not arrive having broken bulk within 4 leagues of the coast. This provision seems to be analogous to that in sections 1 and 2 of "The Trawling in Prohibited Areas (Prevention) Act, 1909" (9 Edw. VII., cap. 8), which prescribes the conditions on which a fishing vessel may land fish in the United Kingdom. These provisions are understood to have been framed at the instance of the Foreign Office in consequence of representations made in respect of the conviction of one Mortensen, the foreign master of a foreign vessel, of illegal trawling in the Moray Firth outside the 3-mile limit (Mortensen v. Peters, 43 "Scottish Law Reporter," 872).

Sections 135, 141, 142, 147 and 282, and Section 7 of the Act 46 & 47 Vict., cap. 55.

The first and last of these sections deal with vessels going from one port to another in the United Kingdom, while engaged in a coasting trade. The remaining sections deal generally with coasting ships. It is submitted that these sections do not conflict with international law even though they give a right of interference with a foreign ship outside territorial waters. It has always been conceded by writers on international law that a country is entitled to retain in its own hands exclusively its own coasting trade, and, a fortiori, that it is entitled to impose restrictions upon this trade and to prescribe the conditions upon which foreigners may engage in it.

Section 169.

This section reproduces the provisions of the successive Customs Acts of 1825 (6 Geo. IV, cap. 108, sections 20 and 21), of 1833 (3 & 4 Wm. IV, cap. 53, secs. 16 and 17), of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., cap. 85, secs. 16 and 17), and 1853 (16 & 17 Vict., cap. 107, sec. 199). The provisions of the three earlier Acts are limited specifically to vessels belonging in the whole or in part to British subjects or on board which half the persons are British subjects. The reference to the number of persons on board was presumably intended to apply to those cases where the nationality of the vessel was doubtful. The present section (section 169 of the Act of 1876) does not mention the nationality of the ship or of the persons on board, but it seems obvious from the wording of the section that it was only intended to apply to British craft. Regulations have been made under this section and a copy is sent herewith. Occasional applications for licences under these regulations are received and granted.

Section 179.

This section was intended to reproduce sections 208, 212, 213, 216, 235 and 236 in the Consolidation Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict., cap. 107). It may be divided into three parts:—

- (a.) That dealing with vessels having false bulkheads or places of concealment, or carrying spirits or tobacco in illegal packages;
- (b.) That dealing with vessels from which part of the lading has been thrown overboard, or on which goods have been destroyed to avoid seizure;
- (c.) That dealing with persons found on such vessels or on board one of His Majesty's ships, or a foreign packet carrying mails to the United Kingdom, having on board spirits or tobacco in prohibited packages.

(a.) This deals with vessels found or discovered to have been within certain limits. The earliest section dealing with this subject is section 2 of 6 Geo. IV, cap. 108. That related to (1) vessels found within certain limits acting illegally, and (2) vessels discovered to have been within those limits acting illegally. So far as (1) was concerned, the section undoubtedly involved a claim to seize vessels outside territorial waters; but it is submitted that, with regard to (2), the section only authorised the seizure within territorial waters of such vessels as should come within those limits after doing certain illegal acts outside territorial waters.

On this reading (1) would be repugnant to international law, whereas (2) would be quite reconcilable with it.

The Act 6 Geo. IV, cap. 108, was replaced in 1833 by the Act 3 & 4 Wm. IV, cap. 53. This provided in section 2 for the forfeiture of any vessel "found or discovered to have been" within certain limits. It may be that this was intended to be a mere reproduction of section 2 of the Act 6 Geo. IV, cap. 108, but the reading adopted in late years by the Customs and Excise Department has been that the framers of the Act had deliberately dropped (1) as contrary to international law and had retained (2) as being consistent with it. The Department has assumed that the Act of 1833 only authorised seizure where a vessel was found to have been, or discovered to have been, engaged in illegal acts; that the vessel could only be so found or discovered within territorial waters, and might be forfeited within those waters if before coming within them she had been engaged in illegal traffic. The wording of section 2 of the Act of 1833 is, in this respect, similar to the wording of section 179 of the Act of 1876.

With regard to the construction to be placed upon section 2 of the Act of 1833, the Law Officers are referred to the case of Attorney-General v. Schiers (5 Tyr. 1029).

Quite apart from the meaning of the words "found or discovered to have been," it is submitted that this part of the section does not apply to any foreign vessel outside the 3-mile limit. It will be seen that section 179 of the Act of 1876 applies to vessels which (a) belong wholly or in part to British subjects; or (b) have half the persons on board British subjects; or (c) are not British. It will be remembered that the vessels engaged in smuggling were usually small craft, many of which would not be registered under "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854" (17 & 18 Vict., cap. 104, sec. 19). Even if they were registered, the smuggling vessels might either have no papers on board or only forged papers. If the vessel was British-owned there would be no contravention of international law in declaring it liable to forfeiture for acts done outside the 3-mile limit. If the vessel was definitely not a British vessel, the 3-mile limit was applied strictly by the section. There remained only the doubtful case where the nationality of the vessel either could not be proved or was not known. In such a case, if half the persons on board were British subjects, she was to be treated as a British vessel.

(b.) This part of the section is ungrammatical in its language and extremely difficult to construe. It appears that either some words have been omitted or some words which should have been struck out have been retained upon the consolidation. This part of the section replaces section 216 of the Act of 1853, which was limited in its operation to British ships or to ships whose crew was partly British. It did not mention ships which were clearly foreign. It may be that in the consolidation the reference to British ships or ships of doubtful nationality has been omitted by inadvertence. This supposition seems to gain some force from the words "to prevent seizure" which occur in the latter part of it. It is submitted that these words "to prevent seizure" apply to the throwing overboard of part of the lading as well as to the destruction of goods, and that the words do so apply appears from section 235 of the Act of 1853. It is further submitted that, if articles are thrown overboard or destroyed to avoid seizure, it can only be because they are liable to seizure; they would not be liable to seizure on a foreign ship unless that ship came within territorial waters, and therefore this part of the section does not apply to a foreign ship. If, on the other hand, this part of the section does apply to a foreign ship, the goods on her are not liable to seizure unless she comes within territorial waters, and therefore she cannot be seized under this part of the section for anything done outside these waters.

(c.) This part of the section imposes a penalty upon—

1. British subjects found to have been on board a ship liable to forfeiture under the section within 3 leagues of the coast.
2. Foreigners who have been on such a ship while within 1 league of the coast.
3. Any person who has been on board any vessel in His Majesty's service or on board a foreign post-office packet employed in carrying mails between any foreign country and the United Kingdom having on board spirits or tobacco in illegal packets.

There is a proviso to the section that no person shall be detained whilst actually on board any vessel in the service of a foreign State or country, and a further proviso has been added by 50 & 51 Vict., cap. 7, sec. 1, exempting from prosecution any person who was not concerned in or privy to the illegal act. So far as 1 and 2 are concerned, there appears to be nothing in this part of the section repugnant to international law. So far as a person on one of Her Majesty's ships is concerned, whether a British subject or a foreigner, there is nothing in international law contrary to the detention of such a person on board the ship until he arrives in a British port and is handed over to the Customs authorities for prosecution. So far as the foreign packet is concerned, the section assumes that she will come to this country and the prosecution can only take place in this country. It is submitted that the detention of such a person is not contemplated except in this country, and this is borne out by the proviso that, if the foreign packet is a national ship, a person on board her shall not be detained until he has actually left the ship.

Sections 180 and 181.

There is no statement in section 180 that this applies to any foreign vessel outside territorial waters. The opening words of section 181, "any ship or boat liable to seizure or examination," may include a foreign vessel liable to examination outside territorial waters on the ground that she is engaged in the coasting trade; but unless a foreign vessel is engaged in coasting trade, which is clearly under the jurisdiction of this country, there is nothing in either section to imply that it affects her while outside territorial waters.

Section 189.

This mentions the distance of 5 miles from the sea coast or any tidal river, and it seems clear that this distance of 5 miles is to be measured inland and not in a seaward direction.

The reasons for this construction are as follows:—

1. This section and the preceding section deal with the persons who assemble to assist in the landing, carrying, conveying or concealing of smuggled goods. These persons would not be the crew of the smuggling vessel, but the persons on shore who assemble to receive the cargo and to carry it inland to a hiding-place. They would not assemble at sea.
2. The measure of distance used is the mile, which is a measure of distance on land, and not the league, which is used in sections 53, 134 and 179 to denote the measurement of distance on the sea. The same distinction between the league and the mile runs through the older Customs Acts (see 16 & 17 Vict., cap. 107, secs. 212, 216, 217 and 242 as to leagues, and sec. 244 as to miles. See also 6 Geo. IV, cap. 108, secs. 2 to 6 inclusive as to leagues, and sec. 52 as to miles).
3. Sections 247 and 248 of the Act of 1853, which are embodied in section 189 of the Act of 1876, clearly refer to persons assembling on land.
4. The distance of 5 miles is to be measured from the sea-coast or any tidal river. If the distance is measured inland, there is a definite line from which to measure; there can be no uncertainty whether a given point is 5 miles inland from a tidal river. If the distance is to be measured in a seaward direction, there is no definite line from which to measure. It is impossible to say at what precise point the Severn estuary becomes the Bristol Channel or where the Thames estuary merges in the North Sea. Moreover, it is probable that, if the distance were to be measured in a seaward direction, every point within 5 miles of a tidal river would also be within 5 miles of the sea coast, and there would be no need to mention a tidal river in the section.

Section 190.

This prohibits signalling from a ship or boat, from the coast of the United Kingdom, or within 6 miles of the coast. Here again it seems clear that the 6 miles are to be measured inland from the coast. The following are suggested as the reasons for this construction:—

1. If the 6 miles were to be measured in a seaward direction, the signal must be from a ship or boat, and it would be unnecessary to mention in the section both signalling from a ship or boat and signalling within 6 miles of the coast; the one or the other would have been omitted.

2. The measure of distance is the mile and not the league.
3. Section 192 empowers a person to go on any lands for the purpose of preventing signalling, and this, combined with the power in section 190 to arrest a person making a signal, goes to show that the distance of 6 miles must be measured inland.

Section 229.

This merely regulates the procedure and deals with jurisdiction. It does not mention foreign vessels or make any offence punishable in the United Kingdom which would not have been punishable if this section had been omitted.

The Law Officers are requested to advise—

1. Whether the sections quoted involve a claim to jurisdiction over foreign vessels outside territorial waters.
2. Whether it is considered advisable so to amend any of these sections as to make it clear that no claim to such jurisdiction is advanced.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. It is a rule of construction that statutes must be so interpreted and applied, so far as their language admits, as not to be inconsistent with the comity of nations or the established rules of international law. (See Maxwell, 6th edition, p. 262; Leroux v. Brown, 22 L. J.; C.P. 1, per Maule J., at p. 3; the "Zollverein," Swab. 96, per Dr. Lushington, at p. 98; the "Annapolis," Lush. 295, per Dr. Lushington, at p. 306.) Reading the sections quoted in the light of this rule, we are of opinion that they involve no claim to jurisdiction over foreign vessels outside territorial waters.

2. In our opinion, No.

GORDON HEWART.
ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

Law Officers' Department,
January 18, 1922.

[W 2509/349/50/1922]

No. 5.

[March 21, 1922.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

(Confidential.)
Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 2, 1922.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, to request you to favour him with your opinion on the following matter:—

General
licence for correspondence in war time with
(a) prisoners of war or interned civilians; or
(b) other persons in enemy
countries.

2. The Censorship Sub-Committee of the Committee of Imperial Defence have been considering the desirability of arranging for the issue in any future war in which this country may be engaged of a general licence authorising British subjects to correspond on certain conditions with (a) prisoners of war or interned civilians; or (b) other persons resident in enemy countries, and the committee wish that a definite ruling on the legal position with regard to this matter should be obtained. It appears that in the recent war the situation was not clearly defined and some avoidable confusion thereby arose. The two questions which are submitted for your opinion are whether, in the first place, all correspondence with persons in enemy countries is illegal, and, secondly, whether it is permissible for the Crown to permit British subjects to perform what would otherwise be an illegal act by sending letters to enemy countries.

3. I am to remind you that the question of the legality of correspondence with enemy countries has been raised in the courts on more than one occasion. In the case of the "Panariellos" (31 T.L.R., pp. 326-8), Sir Samuel Evans, in his judgment, quoted a dictum of Lord Stowell in the case of the "Cosmopolite" (4 c. Chr. Rob., p. 10). "It is perfectly well known that by war all communication between the subjects of the belligerent countries must be suspended and that no intercourse can legally be carried on between the subjects of the hostile States but by the special licence of their respective Governments." Sir Samuel Evans continued: "No doubt it was with cases of commercial intercourse that Lord Stowell was dealing in the 'Hoop' and the 'Cosmopolite,' but it will be remembered that in the former he enforced the reason for the rule by reference to the possible consequences of allowing persons to carry on a commercial intercourse, and, under colour of that, to give them the means of carrying on any other intercourse they might think fit." In the case of Robson v. the Premier Oil Company (L.R. 2, Chancery 1915, pp. 134-6), Lord Sterndale made the following observations: "We do not think it necessary to decide whether the principle extends to intercourse, if such there be, which could not possibly tend to detriment to this country or to advantage to the enemy; it is enough to say that, in our opinion, all intercourse which could tend to such detriment or advantage, whether commercial or not, is inconsistent with the state of war between the two countries, and therefore forbidden." Finally, in the proceedings which recently took place with regard to the revocation of the naturalisation certificate issued to Mr. P. Laszlo, it is understood that the court held that a notification made by the Foreign Office at the outbreak of the war as to the conditions under which correspondence with enemy countries should be carried on was of the nature of a general licence legalising such correspondence if in itself of an innocent character. It appears that in 1916 the Foreign Office issued a statement referring the public to certain Post Office regulations. It was further pointed out in the aforesaid notice that private letters to other persons resident in enemy countries could be forwarded through neutral countries, subject to the censorship. The result, therefore, was that the censorship authorities could allow letters to pass through or not in accordance with the policy then pursued by His Majesty's Government, which was to allow certain innocent communications to reach their destinations. A copy of the Foreign Office notification is herewith appended for your consideration.

4. It is suggested that on the outbreak of any future war the most convenient course would be for the Post Office to issue an authoritative statement laying down regulations under which correspondence with the various classes of persons in enemy countries could be permitted. A provisional draft of the directions which are thought to be appropriate in the event of an outbreak of war is transmitted herewith for your information. It is assumed that no statutory authority would be required to sanction this course, and that it would not be necessary to resort to the issue of regulations under some statute of the nature of the Defence of the Realm Act, which was passed for the purposes of the recent war.

5. The Law Officers of the Crown are, therefore, requested to advise: (1) Whether during a state of war all correspondence of whatever nature with persons actually within the territory of an enemy State is technically illegal. (2) If the answer to the first question be in the affirmative, is it within the power of the Crown to permit such correspondence in certain conditions? (3) If the answer to the second question be in the affirmative, whether the publication of regulations by the General Post Office would be a permissible way of licensing British subjects to commit what would otherwise be an illegal act? (4) Whether you consider that the form of the draft directions, which it is proposed should be issued by the General Post Office, appears to you to be generally suitable. (5) I am further to request you to furnish his Lordship with any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer.

I have, &c.

G. H. VILLIERS.

List of Papers.

- (A.)—Foreign Office Notice to the Public, 1915 [4077/File 15/1916].
(B.)—Draft Directions for Use in the Event of an Outbreak of War [W 1536/349/50/1922].

Report.

We answer the questions put to us as follows:—

- 1 and 2. Our answers are in the affirmative.
3. We are of opinion that the publication of regulations by the General Post Office, although perhaps permissible, would not be the appropriate way of licensing British subjects to commit what would otherwise be an illegal act.
4. Subject to our answer to 5 below, yes.
5. In the cases referred to, and in Exposito v. Bowden (7 E. and B. at pp. 781-2), it is laid down that all intercourse with enemies is prohibited on the outbreak of war, and can thereafter be carried on only under the licence of the Crown, which is "an high act of sovereignty" (see Cosmopolite, 4. C. Rob. at p. 11).

We are of opinion that the licence to carry on such intercourse should be given under the authority of a Secretary of State—either for Home or Foreign Affairs.

Such licence may refer to the conditions and regulations laid down and issued by the General Post Office as the code to be followed; but the authority for the exercise of the licence ought to be given by a Secretary of State.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

Law Officers' Department,
March 21, 1922.

[W 3658/349/50/1922]

No. 6.

[April 27, 1922.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

(Confidential.)
Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 20, 1922.

Correspondence in war time with (a) prisoners of war or interned civilians; or (b) other persons in enemy countries: draft licence and notice to public.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, to state that the opinion contained in your report of the 21st ultimo* has been under the consideration of the Censorship Sub-Committee of the Committee of Imperial Defence, and that it has been provisionally decided to recommend that, in case of war with a foreign Power, the Secretary of State for the Home Department should issue—

- (a.) An authority to the Postmaster-General authorising him to accept correspondence to and from certain classes of persons detained or residing in enemy territory; and
- (b.) A notice to the public that such correspondence is, under certain conditions, allowable.

2. The forms of this authority and notice are proposed to be as follows:—

(A.)

Form of Authority to permit British Subjects to communicate with Persons detained or residing in Enemy Territory (including Prisoners of War).

To the Postmaster-General and all others whom it may concern.

Whereas a state of war exists between this country and

And whereas it is unlawful for His Majesty's subjects, save under due authority, to have communication or intercourse with persons in enemy territory;

And whereas it is expedient that postal communication or intercourse should be permitted, subject to such limitations and on such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed:

Now, therefore, I, the Right Honourable , being one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, hereby authorise you, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, to accept, for transmission through the post, letters or other postal packets addressed to, intended for, or emanating from, persons who now are, or hereafter may be, detained or residing in enemy territory or in territory occupied by the enemy, provided—

- (a.) That the transmission of such letters or other postal packets is otherwise lawful; and
- (b.) That such letters or other postal packets comply with such conditions and are submitted to such examination as may from time to time be prescribed.

And for so doing this shall be your sufficient authority.

One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

Whitehall, S.W. 1.

* No. 5.

(B.)

Form of Authority to British Subjects to communicate with Persons detained or residing in Enemy Territory (including Prisoners of War).

Whereas a state of war exists between this country and

And whereas it is unlawful for His Majesty's subjects, save under due authority, to have communication or intercourse with persons in enemy territory;

And whereas it is expedient that postal communication or intercourse should be permitted, subject to such limitations and on such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed:

Now, therefore, I, the Right Honourable , being one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, hereby give notice, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, that letters or other postal packets may be sent to or received from persons who now are, or hereafter may be, detained or residing in enemy territory or in territory occupied by the enemy, provided—

- (a.) That the transmission of such letters or other postal packets is otherwise lawful; and
- (b.) That such letters or other postal packets comply with such conditions as the Postmaster-General may lay down and are submitted to such examination as may from time to time be prescribed.

One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

Whitehall, S.W. 1.

3. I have the honour to enquire, by the direction of the Secretary of State, whether you consider that these forms of authority and notice are sufficient and satisfactory for their purpose, both in consideration of your report under reference and generally.

I have, &c.
R. H. CAMPBELL

Report.

We approve the draft authority and the draft notice as altered and initialled by us.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

Law Officers' Department,
April 27, 1922.

ANNEX.

(A.)

Form of Authority to permit British Subjects to communicate with Persons detained or residing in Enemy Territory (including Prisoners of War).

To the Postmaster-General and all others whom it may concern.

Whereas a state of war exists between this country and

And whereas it is unlawful for His Majesty's subjects, save under due authority, to have communication or intercourse with persons in enemy territory;

And whereas it is expedient that postal communication or intercourse should be permitted, subject to such limitations and on such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed:

Now, therefore, I, the Right Honourable , being one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, hereby authorise you, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, to accept for transmission through the post letters or other postal packets addressed to, intended for or

[9930]

E

emanating from persons who now are or hereafter may be detained or residing in enemy territory or in territory occupied by the enemy, provided—

- (a.) That the transmission of such letters or other postal packets is otherwise lawful; and
- (b.) That such letters or other postal packets comply with such conditions and are submitted to such examination as may from time to time be prescribed [by you, the Postmaster-General].

And for so doing this shall be your sufficient authority.

One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries
of State.

Whitehall, S.W. 1.

As altered:

E. M. P.
L. S.

(B.)

Form of Authority to British Subjects to communicate with Persons detained or residing in Enemy Territory (including Prisoners of War).

Whereas a state of war exists between this country and ;
And whereas it is unlawful for His Majesty's subjects, save under due authority, to have communication or intercourse with persons in enemy territory;

And whereas it is expedient that postal communication or intercourse should be permitted, subject to such limitations and on such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed:

Now, therefore, I, the Right Honourable , being one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, hereby give notice, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, that letters or other postal packets may be sent to or received from persons who now are or hereafter may be detained or residing in enemy territory or in territory occupied by the enemy, provided—

- (a.) That the transmission of such letters or other postal packets is otherwise lawful; and
- (b.) That such letters or other postal packets comply with such conditions as the Postmaster-General may lay down and are submitted to such examination as are from time to time imposed and prescribed [by the Postmaster-General].

One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries
of State.

Whitehall, S.W. 1.

As altered:

E. M. P.
L. S.

[T 11870/2549/350/1922]

No 6^A.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[May 17, 1922.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. H. M. Givcen.

Herewith are sent:—

Claim of the Mozambique
Whaling Company
(Limited) in War Compensation
Court
respecting detention of whale oil shipped in steamship
"Aros Castle."

1. Claim and documents in support.
2. Extracts from Minutes of the Contraband Committee.
3. Foreign Office correspondence.
4. Note written by Sir John Mellor re steamship "Neptunus."
5. Opinion of Counsel re steamship "Neptunus."
6. Note by Mr. Wylie on Detention.

THIS is a claim which has been put forward in the War Compensation Court by the Mozambique Whaling Company (Limited) of Sandjefjord, Norway, for damages arising out of the detention and sale in this country of whale oil shipped in the British steamship "Aros Castle" from Linga-Linga, Portuguese East Africa, in February 1915. The claim amounts to £42,011 19s. 8d.

The "Aros Castle" sailed from Linga-Linga in February 1915 with 3,283 tons 16 cwt. of whale oil, 639 tons 14 cwt. of whale guano and bone meal, and 19 cwt. of whale fins, shipped by the Mozambique Whaling Company (Limited) and consigned to Johan Bryde, the Company's Managing Director at Sandjefjord. She arrived at Falmouth on the 30th March and was examined by the Customs Officers, who reported particulars of the cargo to the Contraband Committee.

The Bills of Lading gave the port of destination as "Falmouth for destination orders," though the consignee was Bryde of Sandjefjord. The Contraband Committee considered that this was a consignment to the United Kingdom, and that therefore whale oil and whale products could not be exported without a licence from the War Trade Department.

At this time whale oil was absolute contraband as a lubricant under the Proclamation of the 12th March, 1915 (The "Kong Inge," 16th January, 1916). When the vessel sailed, it was conditional contraband under the Proclamation of the 23rd December, 1914. The other goods were not contraband.

The reputation of the Consignee, Bryde, was none too good, and he and his Company were not thought to be reliable persons to receive in Norway a consignment of this kind. Part of the whale oil, at any rate, was originally intended for Germany, as is admitted in the correspondence, in which the claimants offered to cancel all their German contracts and to give an undertaking not to re-export the goods to any enemy destination—an offer which was not uncommon during the war, but which had little value after the goods had been detained. Bryde, in fact, was put upon the list of proclaimed enemy firms under the Trading with the Enemy (Extension of Powers) Act, 1915, which came into operation at the end of the year.

In short, there is no doubt but that a good prima facie case could be made on the merits to justify investigation and seizure, if not, perhaps, the ultimate condemnation of the goods.

The Contraband Committee, however, do not appear to have put forward as a ground for detaining the cargo its contraband nature and destination, and it was not formally seized and put into the Prize Court. But undoubtedly that was the real reason for its detention; and the detention was effected by the refusal of a licence to export, as above mentioned, because that appeared to be a simple and sure method.

Bryde subsequently came over to this country and arranged for the sale of the cargo. He now puts forward to the War Compensation Court a claim for loss, on the ground that the price realised here was considerably less than the market price at Sandjefjord. It will be observed in passing that there has been a most inordinate delay in proceeding with the claim, and the claimants' solicitors were warned on the 14th February, 1919, that objection would be taken on that ground.

The point upon which Counsel's opinion is desired is whether such a claim comes within the jurisdiction of the War Compensation Court or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Prize Court.

A claim which has some points of similarity was put forward by the owners of the Dutch steamship "Neptunus," and in that case the then Attorney-General (Sir Gordon Hewart) and Mr. C. W. Lilley advised, so far as procedure was concerned, that the claim in the War Compensation Court should be allowed to take its course. They also advised, however, that on its merits the claim should be settled; and negotiations for a settlement are still in progress, no answer having been put in to the claim in the War Compensation Court. Moreover, there was a special reason in that case for allowing the claim to continue in that Court; for the claimants' solicitors, after fruitless negotiations with the Foreign Office, had asked whether His Majesty's Government would be prepared to allow the claim to be adjudicated upon by the Prize Court, and the Foreign Office had somewhat inadvisedly replied that His Majesty's Government could not agree that this was a case within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court.

The facts of the case of the "Neptunus" were as follows: In the course of a voyage from South America to Holland the vessel called at Falmouth on the 23rd May, 1917, by her owners' orders for examination, under an arrangement between the British Government and the Netherlands Oversea Trust that eastbound vessels should call at Falmouth to receive their clearance (an arrangement which was entered into for mutual convenience, to save the time and trouble that would otherwise be lost by stopping the vessels in the Downs or elsewhere and sending them back to some port for examination). The cargo in that case consisted of linseed, and complicated negotiations were then in progress between the British and Dutch Governments with regard to the import of linseed into Holland. In the result, the cargo was sold in this country, and no claim was put forward by the cargo owners. Neither vessel nor cargo was formally seized and put into the Prize Court, but the vessel was detained for three months before the cargo was discharged, and the shipowners, The Royal Dutch Line, put forward a large claim for demurrage. After receiving the reply of the Foreign Office denying the jurisdiction of the Prize Court as above mentioned, they commenced an action in the King's Bench Division against the Customs Officers concerned. The question was then considered of applying for a transfer of the case to the Prize Court; but after consultation with Counsel it was decided to allow the case to proceed in the King's Bench Division, there being several defences, each of which seemed fatal to the claim, viz.: the Indemnity Act, Public Authorities Protection Act, and "Act of State." The Plaintiffs, however, appear to have realised those difficulties, and took no further step in that action after obtaining the Order for Directions in November 1920. Instead, they put forward a claim in the War Compensation Court in June 1921. Thereupon the opinion of the Attorney-General and Mr. Lilley was sought as to the procedure to be adopted, and they advised that no objection should be taken to the jurisdiction of the War Compensation Court, first, because of the Foreign Office letter above mentioned, and secondly, because they did not think that the objection could be sustained. A copy of their opinion is sent herewith.

With regard to their reasons under the second head, it is respectfully submitted that on further consideration, in a case not prejudged or complicated by such a circumstance as the said Foreign Office letter and which did not on its merits call for a settlement, they might modify their opinion. It is true that there is nothing in the Indemnity Act to say that no claim shall be made before the War Compensation Court in any case where proceedings might be taken in the Prize Court; but the policy of the Act seems to be to leave the Prize Court untouched, that is to say, that any case in which there is jurisdiction in prize should be dealt with by the Prize Court.

Section 2 (1b) speaks of "any prerogative right of His Majesty or any power under any enactment relating to the Defence of the Realm," &c.; and there is a possible question whether the belligerent right of visit and search can be called a prerogative right of His Majesty, inasmuch as that right can be exercised, of course, by any State, even if the State recognises no prerogative like that which is attached to His Majesty; and from the context, the Section, and the Act as a whole, would seem to apply rather to municipal than to international affairs.

Section 3 (a) contains a wide saving clause as regards any matter within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court.

A note written by Sir John Mellor in connection with the steamship "Neptunus" is sent herewith, and contains authority (supported by some of the cases referred to below) for the contention that such a case of detention falls within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, although no formal seizure is eventually made or Writ issued. As it arises out of the belligerent right of visit and search, it should fall within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court on broad principles. That right is a pure jus belli, solely an incident of war; and if the search results in a decision formally to seize the vessel or any cargo, the whole procedure unquestionably comes under the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. It would seem illogical, therefore, if the exercise of the right results in the release of the vessel or goods after the delay necessary for carrying out the search, and a claim arises in respect of such delay, that such a claim should not come before the Prize Court.

In this case, in contradistinction from the case of the "Neptunus," the Claimants' Manager Bryde was referred to the Prize Court in July 1915, when he first put forward a claim to the Foreign Office. In August 1918, nothing further having been heard, he was asked whether he proposed to proceed with the claim in the Prize Court, or whether it might be regarded as abandoned. In February 1919 his Solicitors put forward their view that they could not proceed in the Prize Court, inasmuch as the goods had "never been in Prize." It will be observed, however, that in his reply the Procurator-General did not accept their view, but put it upon them to act as they might be advised.

In July 1919 a communication was made to the Foreign Office by the Norwegian Minister; and on the 28th July the Foreign Office replied that the Claimants should present their claim to the Prize Court, which was empowered to deal with all such matters, and which alone was furnished with the necessary means for investigating such claims.

There is ample authority to the effect that if the Prize Court has jurisdiction, that jurisdiction is exclusive.

In the "Corsican Prince" (1 B. and C. P.C. at pp. 182 ff) Sir Samuel Evans quotes Mr. Justice Storey to the effect that once the Prize Court has acquired jurisdiction over the principal cause, it will exert its authority as to the allowance of freight, damages, expenses and costs in all cases of capture; and "though a mere maritime tort unconnected with capture jure belli may be cognisable by the Court of Common Law; yet it is clearly established that all captures jure belli, and all torts connected therewith, are exclusively cognisable in the Prize Court."

After quoting other authorities and examining the difference between the two different codes or systems of law administered by Prize Courts and Common Law Courts, the President held that the Prize Court alone had jurisdiction to deal with the claim for freight in that case, and that the matter should not be dealt with in the King's Bench Division, where some proceedings had been started by one of the parties.

In the "Roumanian" (1 B. and C. P.C. at p. 547) Lord Parker, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, stated that "this jurisdiction (of the Court of Admiralty by virtue of its commission in prize) was exclusive whether the goods seized as prize were on land or afloat."

One other finding in that case may be useful; on p. 546, it is stated that enemy goods on British ships, whether on board at the commencement of the hostilities or embarked during the hostilities, were always, and still are, liable to be seized as prize, "either on the high seas or in the ports or harbours of the Realm." At the time of seizure, part of the oil in question in that case was still in the vessel at Purfleet, but part of it had been pumped into tanks, which were situated some 100 or 150 yds. from the wharf, but were under the control of the Customs Authorities. In the case of the "Aros Castle," the goods were still on board the vessel when the Customs Officers detained them.

In the "St. Helena" (2 B. and C. P.C. at p. 261), Lord Parker commenced his judgment in the Privy Council by stating that the jurisdiction of the Prize Court attaches in every case in which there has been a seizure in prize, and in exercising this jurisdiction the Court can, and will, deal with all incidental matters, including questions of freight or compensation in lieu of freight.

In the "St. Tudno" (3 B. and C. P.C. at p. 175), Mr. Justice Hill, sitting in Admiralty, and having to consider the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court to entertain a suit touching this vessel, which was in the custody of the Prize Court, again referred to the difference between the law administered in the Prize Court and that administered in other Courts.

In the "Lutzw" (3 B. and C. at p. 339), the Egyptian Prize Court held that the Prize Court ousted the jurisdiction of the Egyptian Municipal Courts in all questions of prize, "the Prize Court jurisdiction being exclusive."

It is therefore submitted, upon the assumption that the original detention of the cargo arose out of the exercise of the belligerent right of visit and search, that the Prize Court is the proper Court to deal with this claim, and has exclusive jurisdiction, so that no claim before the War Compensation Court can succeed.

It is for political or rather international reasons that it is desired to have this and other similar cases dealt with by the Prize Court, which is a Court administering international law, rather than by the War Compensation Court, which is a domestic tribunal. The present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs considers the point of considerable importance, as is shown by the letter from the Foreign Office of the 24th March last, and more fully in Sir John Mellor's note.

It is unfortunate that the letter from the Foreign Office in the case of the "Neptunus" should have prevented a clear issue upon this point in that case, for there was no question but that the detention arose in that case out of the exercise of the right of visit and search, whereas in this case a slight complication may arise from the fact that the Contraband Committee, as is shown by the extract from their minutes herewith, informed Bryde through Mr. Findlay, His Majesty's Minister at Christiania, that their reason for detention was that the consignment amounted, in their opinion, to a consignment to this country, and that once the goods had entered the port of this country to which they were consigned they could not be exported without an export licence. There is no doubt, however, that the real reason for stopping the oil was the desire that it should not reach the enemy; and the detention, in fact, arose in the exercise of the right of visit and search.

It makes no difference that the vessel came into Falmouth voluntarily. In the majority of prize cases during the war, the vessels have called voluntarily either by arrangement between the owners and His Majesty's Government, or, as in numerous cases, for bunkers and the like; in comparatively few cases since the early period of the war have the vessels been intercepted at sea.

That the Claimants understood the real point to be that of enemy destination is clear from the correspondence; and they were several times explicitly informed that the case was considered to be one within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. Counsel is requested to advise:—

- (a.) Whether a case of detention arising out of the exercise of the belligerent right of visit and search comes within the jurisdiction of the War Compensation Court or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Prize Court.
- (b.) Whether this is such a case, or remains, in the circumstances of the detention, within the jurisdiction of the War Compensation Court.

Opinion of the Attorney-General and Mr. H. M. Givcen.

1. We are of opinion that in general cases of detention arising out of the exercise of the belligerent right of visit and search come within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. But it is not possible to say that such jurisdiction is exclusive. There may be cases in which upon the facts the jurisdiction of the War Compensation Court would be open to claimants. We agree with the opinion of the late Attorney-General, dated the 27th July, 1921, that Section 3 (a) of the Indemnity Act does not in such cases exclude the jurisdiction of the War Compensation Court.

2. The loss in this case appears to us to have arisen not from the exercise of belligerent right of visit and search, but from the exercise of authority given to the Customs by their Acts. If this be so, it is open to question whether there was an exercise of any power under any enactment relating to the defence of the Realm so as to bring the claim within the Indemnity Act 2, 1 (b), and the jurisdiction of the War Compensation Court. See also the Schedule, Part II, under which nothing is to be given in respect of loss arising through the enforcement of an order of general application or arising from the conduct of the Claimant himself. The claim in the War Compensation Court will probably fail. In our opinion the points stated in this paragraph should be taken in the Court in answer to the claim.

E. M. P.
H. M. G.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 17, 1922.*

[W 4168/349/50/1922]

No. 7.

[May 17, 1922.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 12, 1922.

I AM directed by the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th ultimo* approving, with certain alterations, a draft form of authority to be issued by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the Postmaster-General, authorising him to accept correspondence to and from certain persons detained or residing in enemy territory in time of war, and a draft notice to the public that such correspondence is, under certain conditions, allowable.

2. These alterations proposed by you were duly considered by the Censorship Sub-Committee of the Committee of Imperial Defence, and I have the honour to submit, for your consideration, certain difficulties which would, in the opinion of the Sub-Committee, be introduced into the system of postal censorship in time of war if they were adopted.

3. It was found during the Great War essential to insist on the fact that postal and cable censorship was exercised by the military authorities, and not by the General Post Office. Not only was the elaborate organisation necessary for its efficient administration most conveniently built up and carried on under military discipline, but it was of great importance that it should be clear to the public, both British and foreign, that censorship—which is naturally repugnant to them—was exercised under military necessity alone, and for this reason the Censorship Sub-Committee have never hesitated to recommend that in any future war such censorship should be under a military chief and organised on military lines, and not be conducted by the General Post Office or any civilian body or office. With this point of view the officials of the Post Office are in full concurrence.

* See No. 6.

Correspondence in war time with (a) prisoners of war or interned civilians; or (b) other persons in enemy countries: draft licence and notice to public.

4. The sub-committee therefore see great difficulty in the alterations in the draft forms suggested by you. They had expressly in the first refrained from stating by whom the requisite conditions and examination of the postal packets should be prescribed; in the second, they had included the words "as the Postmaster-General may lay down" in connection with the conditions of posting, because such preliminary conditions will be issued to the public through the Postmaster-General (though drawn up by the military censors); but on consideration they would even prefer to omit these words. The additions, however, which you have proposed would in effect make it necessary that all the regulations of postal censorship should be issued ("imposed and prescribed") by the Postmaster-General, and would make the public believe that he was responsible for the imposition and administration of the censorship.

5. I have therefore the honour to enquire whether you could propose a form of words not open to this objection. Prints of the previous correspondence are enclosed for convenience of reference.

I have, &c.

C. W. ORDE.

Report.

We approve the draft authority and draft notice as altered and initialled by us in red ink,* excluding all reference to the Postmaster-General, the inclusion of which had made the other modifications suggested advisable.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 17, 1922.*

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

ANNEX.

(A.)

Form of Authority to permit British Subjects to communicate with Persons detained or residing in Enemy Territory (including Prisoners of War).

To the Postmaster-General and all others whom it may concern.

Whereas a state of war exists between this country and ;

And whereas it is unlawful for His Majesty's subjects, save under due authority, to have communication or intercourse with persons in enemy territory;

And whereas it is expedient that postal communication or intercourse should be permitted, subject to such limitations and on such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed:

Now, therefore, I, the Right Honourable , being one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, hereby authorise you, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, to accept for transmission through the post letters or other postal packets addressed to, intended for or emanating from persons who now are or hereafter may be detained or residing in enemy territory or in territory occupied by the enemy, provided—

(a.) That the transmission of such letters or other postal packets is otherwise lawful; and

(b.) That such letters or other postal packets comply with such conditions and are submitted to such examination as may from time to time be prescribed by you, the Postmaster-General.

And for so doing this shall be your sufficient authority.

One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

Whitehall, S.W. 1.

As altered:
E. M. P.
L. S.

* Shown by erased type.

(B.)

Form of Authority to British Subjects to communicate with Persons detained or residing in Enemy Territory (including Prisoners of War).

Whereas a state of war exists between this country and ;
And whereas it is unlawful for His Majesty's subjects, save under due authority, to have communication or intercourse with persons in enemy territory ;
And whereas it is expedient that postal communication or intercourse should be permitted, subject to such limitations and on such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed :
Now, therefore, I, the Right Honourable , being one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, hereby give notice, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, that letters or other postal packets may be sent to or received from persons who now are or hereafter may be detained or residing in enemy territory or in territory occupied by the enemy, provided—

- (a.) That the transmission of such letters or other postal packets is otherwise lawful; and
- (b.) That such letters or other postal packets comply with such conditions as the Postmaster-General may lay down and are submitted to such examination as are from time to time imposed and prescribed by the Postmaster-General.

One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

Whitehall, S.W. 1.

As altered :
E. M. P.
L. S.

[T 7933/373/350/1922]

No. 7^A.

[Procurator-General.]

[June 22, 1922.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. James Wylie and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

HEREWITH are sent :—

Detained
Enemy
Ships : Effect of Privy Council judgment in case of the "Blonde,"
&c.

Judgment of the Privy Council in the "Blonde" group, "Gutenfels" group and "Kronprinzessin Cecilie" and "Prinz Adalbert."
List of ships detained by order of the English and Colonial Prize Courts.
Treaty of Peace Order in Council.
Treaty of Peace.

1. The opinion of the Law Officers is sought on various points in connection with detained enemy ships arising out of the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the "Blonde" and other ships delivered on the 10th February, 1922.
2. The judgment in its terms only refers to—
 - (1.) "Blonde," "Prosper" and "Hercules," three ships belonging to Danzigers, under 1,600 tons, detained under a "Chile" order made by the president of the Prize Court ;
 - (2.) "Kronprinzessin Cecilie" and "Prinz Adalbert," two ships originally condemned by the president of the Prize Court but detained until further order by the Privy Council on appeal ; and
 - (3.) "Gutenfels," "Barenfels," "Rabenfels," "Werdenfels," "Lauterfels" and "Aemme Rickmers," six ships in respect of which a similar order was made by the Privy Council on appeal from the Prize Court in Egypt.
3. Of these groups the "Blonde," "Prosper" and "Hercules" were all ships under 1,600 tons. They belonged to the Danziger Rederei Aktien-Gesellschaft, a shipping company registered and carrying on business at Danzig, which city became a free city under the Treaty of Versailles. But the judgment of the Privy Council expressly stated that the contention that the appellants were in any special position on this account is groundless, and that it was not explained by the appellants why proceedings which were regular from the beginning should be frustrated as against the captors by a stipulation in the treaty which does not deal with their rights but is directed to another and very different object. The principles laid down, therefore, are of general application to all detained ships, not merely to those owned by Danzigers ; and counsel are asked in their opinion to deal with the position created by this judgment on the assumption that it applies to all ships originally detained under a "Chile" order, not merely to those which were the subject of the recent proceedings in the Privy Council, as it is probable that the owners of all ships at one time detained under a "Chile" order will seek to reopen their cases so as to obtain the advantages given by the Privy Council to the owner of the ships before them.

4. Put quite shortly, the judgment of the Privy Council divides the classes of ships into two main categories : (1) those of 1,600 tons and over ; and (2) those under 1,600 tons.

(1.) Those of 1,600 Tons and over.

The judgment at p. 13 states that article 244 [sic] and Annex III of Part VIII of the treaty operated to transfer the property in all ships of 1,600 tons and upwards to the Allied and Associated Powers, and at the conclusion of the judgment, p. 16, the Board used the following language :—

"As their Lordships understand that His Majesty's Government have come to arrangements with the Allied and Associated Powers with regard to the shipping surrendered and transferred under the treaty and that no question now arises as between them in relation thereto, they think that the proper course is to discharge the orders for detention previously advised by their Lordships and to release the vessels to the Crown as the present owner."

5. All these ships were requisitioned by order of the Prize Court [whether temporarily or permanently]. Those in the Prize Court in this country were requisitioned without appraisalment on an undertaking given by the Procurator-General to pay the appraised value into court when required so to do. It is believed the same course was taken with regard to the ships requisitioned in the Colonial or Egyptian Prize Courts, though apparently in some cases the ships have been appraised.

6. With regard to the ships still in the hands of the Crown, it seems clear that, under the Privy Council judgment, they are to be released to the Crown as the present owner, as a sort of trustee for the Allied and Associated Powers, and presumably they will have to be dealt with by the Reparation Commission.

7. As to the ships no longer in the hands of the Crown, these were either—

- (a.) Sunk by enemy action or by perils of the sea ;
- (b.) Sold by the Shipping Controller ; or
- (c.) In the case of the "Prinz Adalbert," sold by the marshal, after condemnation, at the request of the Crown.

8. Of the eight ships over 1,600 tons dealt with by the Privy Council, four were sunk by enemy action. This was brought to the notice of the Board, during the argument, but they did not, in the operative part of their judgment, say what is to be the form of the order where the vessels are no longer in existence. At p. 13 of the judgment, when dealing with ships under 1,600 tons, they imply that with regard to the ships over 1,600 tons the appraised value of such ships as have been lost are in the same position as the ships themselves. The judgment says :—

"Had they been over 1,600 tons the property and rights of the owners would have been transferred by the operation of the treaty, and they would have had no locus standi to appeal against any order dealing with them or with the money in court, or to be brought into court after appraisalment, in substitution for them. Section 1 of the third annex to Part VIII, being a cession by the German Government, 'so as to bind all other persons interested,' not only binds the German shipowners as persons interested in appraised values brought into, or to be brought into, court, but also binds them in respect of their property in the ships, which, until duly divested by a decree having that effect, remains in them, even though it may be liable to be divested at any time ; accordingly it would be an answer both in regard to detained ships still in specie, whether remaining in the custody of the court or under requisition, and to the funds, which represent them under the practice of the court."

[9930]

F

9. The Reparation Commission in dealing with Annex III of the treaty have only considered ships in existence on the 10th January, 1920, the date when the treaty was ratified. Ships not in existence when the treaty was ratified have not been considered, possibly because of the view tacitly taken as to the meaning of paragraphs 1-3, and possibly as a result of paragraph 8 of Annex III, which reads as follows:—

"Germany waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss or damage of any German ships or boats [in French: 'Toutes pertes ou dommages subis par lesdits navires ou bateaux'], exception being made of payments due in respect of the employment of ships in conformity with the Armistice Agreement of the 13th January, 1919, and subsequent agreements."

10. If, therefore, the money represented by the appraised values of these ships is paid into court to be delivered to the Crown in order that they may deal with it in the same manner as the ships in being, the Reparation Commission will presumably in its turn merely take the money as an ordinary receipt from Germany on account of reparation, and the British Government will thus in effect, in spite of paragraph 8 of the annex, pay without any further consideration a substantial sum on account of Germany. It will be noticed that at p. 13 of the judgment the Privy Council do not consider that paragraph 8 of this annex of the treaty affects the matter.

11. A possible view is that the value of these ships falls to be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty as being German private property, but this will not be in accordance with the views of the Privy Council.

12. It must be remembered that any money paid into court will come out of the British Exchequer, so it is very desirable, if possible, to adopt a course which would not involve any such payment. It would appear to follow from the judgment of the Privy Council that the undertakings given by the Procurator-General when the ships were requisitioned are discharged by virtue of the Privy Council Order, as would have been the case if the ships had been condemned, and it seems unnecessary for the Procurator-General to take any steps to have the undertakings formally discharged, though it might be prudent to do so.

13. There remains for consideration the case of the "Prinz Adalbert." This ship was condemned by Sir Samuel Evans while under requisition and ordered to be handed to the Crown. She was then returned to the marshal and sold by him at the request of the Procurator-General and the purchase money paid into court, this sale taking place before the judgment of condemnation had been turned into a "Chile" order by the Privy Council. It may be that the proper course is to hand this money to the custodian under article 297, but the question how to deal with this money should be very carefully considered, as it would be awkward if the principle applied to the "Prinz Adalbert" necessitated the Procurator-General paying into court the appraised values of the ships which have been lost, and the better course, from the point of view of the Crown, would be that the undertakings should be discharged and nothing done.

(2.) Ships under 1,600 tons detained under a "Chile" Order.

14. With regard to these ships, the judgment of the Privy Council declared that The Hague Convention is binding, and decreed that in the appeal of the "Blonde," "Prosper" and "Hercules" (which ships were only before the Board) the matter should be remitted to the Prize Court to make such orders as may be necessary for the appraisal of the "Blonde" and "Hercules," which have been lost, and to make a decree releasing those appraised values, and the "Prosper" in specie, to the custodian of enemy property to be delivered up to the claimants if after the lapse of six months no proceedings have been begun for an order for delivery up to the Crown, but otherwise to abide by the final determination of such proceedings.

15. Counsel will remember that during the argument before the Privy Council it was contended among other arguments that, even if the appeals by the shipowners were allowed, the ships or their values fall to be dealt with under article 297 of the Peace Treaty. In their judgment the Privy Council laid down that, while it is clear that ships of 1,600 tons and over are ceded to the Allied and Associated Powers by section 1 of Annex III of Part VIII of the Treaty, it is not so clear that the ships under 1,600 tons fall to be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty. At p. 14 of the judgment, when dealing with this point, the judgment proceeded as follows:—

"It has been urged on the one hand and denied on the other, that an answer can be found to the claim of the Danziger Rederei Aktien-Gesellschaft for the release of these vessels in the application of this article [i.e., article 297] to the ships and funds in question. Beyond observing that the contentions raised on both sides deserve full and careful consideration by the appropriate tribunal, their Lordships do not feel called upon to express any opinion about them, for they are satisfied that the Prize Court is not such a tribunal."

16. It will therefore be necessary for the Crown to take some sort of proceedings in "the appropriate tribunal" with a view to obtaining a decision whether the ships under 1,600 tons in specie, or the appraised values of those lost, can be dealt with under article 297 of the Peace Treaty.

17. The material sections of article 297 are (b) and (i) which are as follows:

"(b.) Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present treaty, the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the present treaty.

"The liquidation shall be carried out in accordance with the laws of the Allied or Associated State concerned, and the German owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights or interests, nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of that State.

"German nationals who acquire ipso facto the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power in accordance with the provisions of the present treaty will not be considered as German nationals within the meaning of this paragraph."

"(i.) Germany undertakes to compensate its nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property, rights or interests in Allied or Associated States."

18. It will be noticed that the last paragraph of section (b) expressly states that German nationals who acquire ipso facto the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power in accordance with the provisions of the treaty will not be considered as German nationals within the meaning of this paragraph. This of course does not apply to nationals in the position of the owners of the "Blonde," "Prosper" and "Hercules," as, although Danzig became a free city by the operation of the treaty, the citizens of Danzig did not acquire the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power. But the whole scheme of section 11 (pp. 59-61) of the treaty dealing with the free city of Danzig may be that persons resident in Danzig shall be able to keep their property, and that their property in Allied countries shall not be subject to the disabilities attaching to such property belonging to German nationals. For instance, article 105 (p. 61) provides that on the coming into force of the treaty German nationals ordinarily resident in the territory will ipso facto lose their German nationality in order to become nationals of the free city of Danzig. Article 106 enables German nationals ordinarily resident in the free city of Danzig to elect for German nationality within a period of two years from the coming into force of the treaty, and such persons will be entitled to preserve their immovable property in the territory of the free city of Danzig, and may carry with them their movable property of every description. This section of the treaty does not deal with property of Danzigers (who up to the time of the coming into force of the treaty were German nationals) within the territories of Allied and Associated Powers, which property, as far as German nationals are concerned, is dealt with in article 297 (b) of the treaty; but, having regard to the scheme of the treaty, it may be difficult to apply to the appropriate tribunal for an order that the "Prosper" and the appraised values of the "Blonde" and "Hercules" shall be dealt with under article 297.

19. The manner in which property coming under article 297 of the treaty should be dealt with is prescribed by "The Treaty of Peace Order in Council, 1919."

20. By section 1, sub-section (xvi), of this Order in Council all property within His Majesty's dominions or protectorates belonging to German nationals at the date when the treaty comes into force, and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation or other dealings therewith are charged—

(a.) With payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by British nationals with regard to their property, rights and interests, including companies and

GENERAL

- associations in which they are interested in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, &c., and that payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by German authorities since the 31st July and before the 4th August, 1914; and
- (b.) With payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by British nationals with regard to their property, &c., in the territories of Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey; and sub-section (xvii) contains provisions with a view to making effective and enforcing the charge created by sub-section (xvi). Sub-section (xvii) (d) enables the Board of Trade by order to vest in the custodian any property, rights and interests subject to the charge or the right to transfer the same.

21. The Order in Council, however, does not provide any machinery or specify any court for deciding the point left open by the Privy Council after the ships, or the money representing them, have been handed over by the Prize Court to the custodian of enemy property. The whole scheme of the Order seems to be that only enemy property is transferred to the custodian, and any property in the custodian's hands must be dealt with by him in the manner laid down in the Order in Council.

22. It is therefore a little difficult to decide what proceedings are contemplated by the Privy Council in the extract from their judgment which is set out above. There is no special judge or court which has the duty of considering what property is enemy property within the meaning of the Order in Council. It is outside the scope of the duties allotted to Younger and Sargent, J.J., under the Trading with the Enemy Acts.

23. The cases which have been recently before the courts, in which the judges have decided whether or not property is enemy property within the meaning of article 297 of the treaty, are believed to have been ordinary actions in the Chancery Division for a declaration, and not therefore assigned to any special judge. It is, however, essential that the Crown, in the cases of these particular three ships, should take some action within six months, unless it is admitted that the property must be handed over to the Danziger claimants.

24. The president has already dealt with a large number of applications, made on behalf of the Procurator-General, to hand over to the custodian enemy property to be dealt with in accordance with the Treaty of Versailles, and he has made the orders asked for. The Procurator-General also applied for a similar order in the case of some securities belonging to citizens of Danzig which had previously been ordered to be detained under the Reprisals Order in Council. This was in the cases of the steamship "Nieuw Amsterdam" (No. 80) and steamship "Rotterdam" (No. 73). The application came before the president on the 21st April, 1921. The Attorney-General and Mr. Bowstead appeared for the Procurator-General and Mr. Balloch for the claimants, being a German bank carrying on business at Danzig, who claimed restitution. The president, however, on the authority of the "Blonde," held that, if these securities were Danziger-owned, it did not differentiate them in any way from the securities held by German citizens, and he made the order. The case is not reported, nor was any detailed judgment given.

As to other detained Ships generally.

25. It is necessary that the Procurator-General should decide what attitude he is to take up should the owners of German ships originally subject to a "Chile" order, but which have since been condemned, apply that their time for appealing shall be extended now that the Privy Council has decided that the orders condemning the "Blonde," "Prosper" and "Hercules" were wrongly made; or, if such owners did not appear in the Prize Court proceedings, on their application for leave to enter an appearance.

26. It may be, in some cases in the colonies, that leave to admit an appeal has been granted or the time for applying to do so extended, but no such order has been made in any case before the president in London.

27. The "Blonde," "Prosper" and "Hercules" were the last of the detained ships brought before the court for condemnation. The first case was the "Marie Leonhardt" (1921 P., p. 1), which was argued before the president in 1920. In that case the "Marie Leonhardt," a ship of 1,466 tons gross, was condemned after full argument. The owners obtained leave to admit an appeal, but they did nothing further, and on the 13th January, 1921, the solicitors for the owners informed the Treasury solicitor that they were instructed not to prosecute the appeal.

GENERAL

28. The owners of the "Marie Leonhardt" ought not now to be allowed to revive their appeal, and, on general principles, none of the other owners should be allowed to reopen their cases; but different questions of policy may apply in these international cases, and it may be that the president will give leave if asked to do so.

It should be remembered, in this connection, that it is understood all the Allied and Associated Powers, with the exception of Great Britain, have either condemned the enemy ships found in their ports at the outbreak of war, or on some pretext or other have refused to hand them back. There seems no reason, therefore, why Great Britain should consider herself bound to give to German claimants more than their strict legal rights.

Cargoes.

29. Another question to be decided is what is to be done with regard to the cargoes which were on board these detained ships at the time of capture. There are only two such cases in England: the "Kronprinzessin Cecilie" and the "Prinz Adalbert;" but the question is of great importance in the Dominions and in Egypt. The smaller ships mostly had no cargoes on board or the property in their cargo was either neutral or British and was released.

30. The "Kronprinzessin Cecilie" and "Prince Adalbert," which were originally condemned by the president, had cargo on board which was also condemned by the president, except in cases where a neutral established that the cargo was neutral owned, and such orders of condemnation were not varied by the Privy Council. It will be appreciated that only a neutral would claim that cargo was neutral owned, and no German owner appeared to ask that the "Chile" order be made in the case of the cargoes.

31. In one case of cargo on board the "Kronprinzessin Cecilie," after the Privy Council had set aside the president's judgment condemning the ship as prize, the neutral claimant of the cargo applied that the president's order condemning the cargo as enemy property should also be set aside and a "Chile" order made; but the board refused to make the order, as the neutral claimant had no right to ask for such an order. This could only be done by the German owner.

32. In the case of part cargoes ex "Barenfels," "Gutenfels" and "Lauterfels," the Egyptian Prize Court made an order that the cargoes—

"be pronounced to have belonged at the time of seizure thereof to enemies of the Crown, and as such or otherwise subject and liable to confiscation or detention, and that such cargo be accordingly delivered to the Crown to be dealt with and sold on the terms of the order of this court relating to enemy cargo on board the above-mentioned ship, dated the 17th day of March, 1915.

"And the Crown or any other party interested in such cargo be at liberty to apply for a final order with reference to the proceeds of the disposal of such cargo."

It is difficult to understand what was meant by this ambiguous order.

33. Messrs. Schroder, Smidt and Co., the German owners of some of the cargo ex "Barenfels" and "Gutenfels," appealed to the Privy Council from an order in these terms, and the board, on the 17th January, 1919, varied the Egyptian order by ordering that the proceeds of sale of the cargo be detained in court until further order. No further order has yet been made or applied for.

34. It is understood that in Egypt there are the proceeds of sale of a considerable amount of cargo ex detained German ships. Presumably the proper course to take with regard to this cargo is to apply that it should be dealt with under article 297 of the Treaty of Peace.

35. The Public Trustee, as the custodian of enemy property, also wishes to be advised as to his position under the "Blonde" judgment. As already stated above, the Privy Council refused to decide whether ships under 1,600 tons should be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty, but granted a period of six months within which time the Crown might apply for an order to that effect.

36. With regard to the ships of 1,600 tons and over, the Privy Council has decided that they are absolutely ceded to the Allied and Associated Powers and made orders of release to the Crown, intimating in the course of their judgment that the appraised values of the ships that were lost should be dealt with in the same way.

37. The Public Trustee wishes to be advised whether he may claim—

- (a.) That ships of 1,600 tons and over, notwithstanding the terms of the Privy Council judgment, may be claimed by him as custodian of enemy property to be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty; or
- (b.) Whether he can make a similar claim in respect of the appraised values of such of these ships as have been lost; and
- (c.) Whether he should make any application with reference to cargo, subject to a "Chile" order.

38. The Reparations Commission represent the Allied and Associated Powers, and would have to be made a party to any claim by the Public Trustee to ships or appraised values. It is not known whether the commission could properly submit, representing as it does a large number of independent States, to the jurisdiction of the British courts, and it might be preferable to attempt, at any rate, first to settle by arrangement with the commission the extent of the rights to which it is entitled.

39. One view indicated above is that the effect of the judgment of the Privy Council is to discharge the undertakings given by the proper officer of the Crown when these ships were requisitioned, and that the Procurator-General is now under no liability to pay the appraised values of such ships into court. It may be, however, that the proper view is that the Procurator-General should pay the value of these ships into court and that the custodian of enemy property should then claim them under article 297 of the treaty, but this course should be avoided, if possible.

On the assumption that the judgment in the "Blonde," &c., applies to all detained ships—

Counsel are requested to advise:

40.—(1.) What attitude should be taken if and when the German owners of ships detained under a "Chile" order and subsequently condemned—

- (a.) Apply that the time within which to admit an appeal from the order of condemnation be extended;
- (b.) In the cases where no appearance has been entered, apply for leave to appear, and for an extension of time in which to admit an appeal.

Ships of over 1,600 tons.

(2.) What should be done with ships of 1,600 tons and over still in the possession of the Crown.

(3.) As regards such ships not in the hands of the Crown, what course should be taken when—

(a.) The ship has been lost while under requisition—

- (i.) When there has merely been an undertaking to pay the value into court;
- (ii.) When in addition to the undertaking the ship has been appraised;
- (iii.) When, in addition to the undertaking, the ship has been appraised and the money paid into court;
- (iv.) When the ship, having been returned to the Marshal, has been sold by him, the proceeds of the sale are in court, e.g., the "Prinz Adalbert."

(b.) When the ship has been sold by the Government Department in the market while under requisition.

(c.) If Counsel are of opinion that in cases (a) (i), (ii) and (iii) above the appraised value should be paid into court, what application should be made to the court, and by whom, to dispose of these appraised values?

Ships under 1,600 tons.

41.—(4.) What should be done with ships of under 1,600 tons in the hands of the Crown, and whether they should be returned to the Marshal in their present condition?

(5.) If such ships are no longer in the hands of the Crown, should their appraised value as at the date of requisition be paid into court?

(6.) If this be done, should the Crown then make an application for the ships, or their appraised values, to be handed out to the custodian of enemy property, to be dealt with by him under article 297 of the treaty, or should the course directed by the judgment of the Privy Council be taken and the Crown merely ask for an order that the ships, or their appraised values, be handed out to the custodian, leaving the disposal of this property to be the subject of some further application to "the appropriate tribunal?" If so, what application should be made, by whom and to what tribunal? How should the rights of the Reparation Commission be dealt with?

(7.) When the "Prosper" and the appraised values of the "Blonde" and "Hercules" have been handed over to the custodian of enemy property, as directed by the judgment of the Privy Council, what application should be made with regard to this property, by whom and to what tribunal?

(8.) As to cargo. Is it the case that the cargoes subject to a "Chile" order are presumably in the same position whether the carrying ship was under or over 1,600 tons?

(9.) What application should be made, and by whom, to deal with such cargo or the proceeds of sale thereof?

(10.) The Public Trustee, as custodian of enemy property, wishes to be advised—

- (a.) Whether it is incumbent upon him to take any action with regard to the ships under 1,600 tons or the appraised values thereof, or whether he should take no action until an order is made by the appropriate court.
- (b.) With regard to the ships of 1,600 tons and over, whether he should make any application—

(i.) That such ships in being should be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty instead of under Annex III of Part VIII.

If so, what steps should be taken to deal with the rights of the Reparation Commission?

(ii.) With regard to the appraised values of such ships not in existence or in the hands of the Crown, whether he should make any application for such proceeds to be handed over to him to be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty? If so, to what tribunal?

(c.) As regards cargo the subject of a "Chile" order, whether he should make any application to deal with such cargo or its appraised value, and, if so, what?

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. James Wylie and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

Questions to Counsel.

Counsel's Answers.

(1.) What attitude should be taken if and when the German owners of ships detained under a "Chile" order and subsequently condemned—

(1.) Any such application should, in our opinion, be opposed.

(a.) Apply that the time within which to admit an appeal from the order of condemnation be extended?

(b.) In the cases where no appearance has been entered apply for leave to appear and for an extension of time in which to admit an appeal?

Ships of over 1,600 Tons.

(2.) What should be done with ships of 1,600 tons and over still in the possession of the Crown?

(2.) Ships of 1,600 tons and over still in possession of the Crown should be treated in all respects as if the condemnation order were valid.

(3.) As regards such ships not in the hands of the Crown, what course should be taken when—

(3.) (a) (i) and (ii). No steps should be taken.

(a.) The ship has been lost while under requisition—

(i.) When there has merely been an undertaking to pay the value into court?

Questions to Counsel.

- (ii.) When, in addition to the undertaking, the ship has been appraised?
- (iii.) When, in addition to the undertaking, the ship has been appraised and the money paid into court?
- (iv.) When the ship, having been returned to the Marshal, has been sold by him, the proceeds of the sale are in court, e.g., the "Prinz Adalbert."
- (b.) When the ship has been sold by the Government Department in the market while under requisition?
- (c.) If counsel are of opinion that in cases (a) (i) (ii) and (iii) above the appraised value should be paid into court, what application should be made to the court, and by whom to dispose of these appraised values?

Counsel's Answers.

(iii) and (iv). Application should be made by the Procurator-General for payment out to him of these moneys.

(b.) No steps should be taken.

(c.) See our previous answer.

Ships under 1,600 Tons.

(4.) What should be done with ships of under 1,600 tons in the hands of the Crown, and whether they should be returned to the Marshal in their present condition?

(5.) If such ships are no longer in the hands of the Crown, should their appraised value as at the date of requisition be paid into court?

(6.) If this be done, should the Crown then make an application for the ships, or their appraised values, to be handed out to the custodian of enemy property to be dealt with by him under article 297 of the treaty, or should the course directed by the judgment of the Privy Council be taken and the Crown merely ask for an order that the ships, or their appraised values, be handed out to the custodian, leaving the disposal of this property to be the subject of some further application to "the appropriate tribunal"? If so, what application should be made, by whom, and to what tribunal? How should the rights of the Reparation Commission be dealt with?

(7.) When the "Prosper" and the appraised values of the "Blonde" and (4.) Ships of under 1,600 tons in the hands of the Crown should, in our opinion, be treated in all respects as if the order for condemnation were valid.

(5.) In our opinion, No.

(6.) In the view that we take, this question does not arise; but, if the appraised value of any ship is paid into court, we think that an application should be made by the Procurator-General for payment out to him upon the footing that the Crown is entitled under article 243 of the Treaty of Versailles; where the ships are of 1,600 tons or over, the Procurator-General may rely on the last paragraph of the judgment of the Privy Council in the "Blonde"; where the ships are under 1,600 tons, he must base his claim on the fact that Germany has not selected the ships of under 1,600 tons to be handed over under article 243 and the Crown has, in default of such selection being made, a better title than anyone else. If the Procurator-General fails upon such an application, it will, we think, be necessary to make an application for payment out to the custodian upon the footing that the money in court is subject to the charge authorised by article 297 of the treaty and imposed by the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919.

(7.) In our opinion, as soon as the Prize Court has made an order releasing to the Questions to Counsel.

"Hercules" have been handed over to the custodian of enemy property, as directed by the judgment of the Privy Council, what application should be made with regard to this property, by whom, and to what tribunal?

(8.) As to Cargo.—Is it the case that the cargoes subject to a "Chile" order are presumably in the same position whether the carrying ship was under or over 1,600 tons?

(9.) What application should be made, and by whom, to deal with such cargo or the proceeds of sale thereof?

(10.) The Public Trustee, as custodian of enemy property, wishes to be advised—

(a.) Whether it is incumbent upon him to take any action with regard to the ships under 1,600 tons or the appraised values thereof, or whether he should take no action until an order is made by the appropriate court?

(b.) With regard to the ships of 1,600 tons and over, whether he should make any application—

(i.) That such ships in being should be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty instead of under Annex III of Part VIII.

If so, what steps should be taken to deal with the rights of the Reparation Commission?

(ii.) With regard to the appraised values of such ships not in existence or in the hands of the Crown, whether he should make any application for such proceeds to be handed over to him to be dealt with under article 297 of the treaty?

If so, to what tribunal?

(c.) As regards cargo the subject of a "Chile" order, whether he should make any application to deal with such cargo or its appraised value, and, if so, what?

Counsel's Answers.

custodian the "Prosper" and the appraised values of the "Blonde" and the "Hercules," an action should be commenced by the Attorney-General in the Chancery Division claiming a declaration that they are subject to the above-mentioned charge.

(8.) In our opinion, Yes.

(9.) In our opinion, application should be made by the Procurator-General to the Prize Court for the release of such cargo or the proceeds to the custodian.

(10.) (a), (b) and (c). In our opinion, No.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.
JAMES WYLIE.
GAVIN T. SIMONDS.

Law Officers' Department,
June 22, 1922.

[T 1430/37/350/1923]

No. 7^B.

[Procurator-General.]

[December 16, 1922.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. James Wylie and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

HEREWITH are sent:—

Papers previously before counsel.
King's Order, dated the 3rd March, 1922.
Opinion of Law Officers and other counsel given the 22nd June, 1922.*
Writ in Chancery Division.
Opinion of Mr. Gavin Simonds.

Detained
Enemy
Ships: Effect of Privy Council judgment in case of the "Blonde,"
&c.

Counsel is referred to question 7 and counsel's reply thereto of the case submitted to the Law Officers* as a result of the judgment of the Privy Council affecting these vessels. On the 20th March, 1922, the Registrar made an order directing the Marshal to appraise the "Blonde" and "Hercules" as at date of requisition, and on the 19th April, 1922, the "Blonde" was accordingly appraised as on the 5th February, 1915, at the sum of 3,945*l.*, and the "Hercules" as on the 13th February, 1915, at the sum of 7,342*l.*

On the 17th July, 1922, the Prize Court made an order directing that the Crown do forthwith pay into court the appraised values of the "Blonde" and "Hercules," and that such appraised values together with the "Prosper" be released to the Custodian of Enemy Property to be by him dealt with as prescribed by the order of the Privy Council, dated the 3rd March, 1922, subject to retention from the appraised values of the costs of the seizure, detention and appraising of the "Blonde" and "Hercules," and to the payment of the costs of the seizure and detention of the "Prosper."

The appraised values of the "Blonde" and "Hercules" were paid into court and ultimately released together with the "Prosper" in specie to the Custodian of Enemy Property. In accordance with the opinion of the Law Officers and other counsel that an action should be commenced in the Chancery Division claiming a declaration that the appraised values of the two first-named vessels and the "Prosper" are subject to the charge authorised by article 297 of the Treaty of Peace and imposed by the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, an action was commenced, and a writ issued claiming a declaration that the property rights and interests of the defendants in the German steamship "Prosper" and in the appraised values of the German steamships "Blonde" and "Hercules" and the moneys representing such appraised values, are subject to the charge authorised by the Treaty of Versailles and imposed by section 1 (16) of the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919.

An appearance was entered by the defendant company Danziger Rederei-Aktien-Gesellschaft. Counsel will also further recollect that in consultation with the Law Officers on the 2nd June, 1922, that suggestion, which met with approval, was that after the Chancery proceedings had been launched, negotiations should be opened with a view to coming to a settlement upon the terms of the release of the surviving ship if no claim were made for the value of the two lost ships, i.e., "Blonde" and "Hercules," this being a suggestion which had previously been made by Messrs. Botterell and Roche on behalf of the owners in letters of the 13th and 31st December, 1920. As soon, therefore, as the writ in the Chancery Division had been issued, Messrs. Botterell and Roche were, by letter dated the 1st August, 1922, asked whether their clients would be prepared to consent to a settlement of the points in dispute on the above basis. Messrs. Botterell and Roche replied on the 2nd August as follows:—

"The Treasury Solicitor,

"Exchange Chambers, 24, St. Mary Axe,
"London, E.C. 3, August 2, 1922.

"Dear Sir,

"'BLONDE,' 'PROSPER,' 'HERCULES.'

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, and will ask our clients' instructions upon your suggestion. It is true that when doubt existed as to how

* No. 7A.

[T 3177/1685/381/1924]

No. 7^{AA}

[Colonial Office.]

[November 10, 1922.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, November 8, 1922.

I AM directed by the Duke of Devonshire to lay before you the accompanying copy of a note prepared by the First Parliamentary Counsel, together with the relevant documents, regarding certain questions that will arise as to the future title of His Majesty, the Parliament of the United Kingdom and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, consequent on the establishment of the Irish Free State.

2. I am to request that you will be good enough to take these papers into your consideration and to furnish the Duke of Devonshire, at as early a date as possible, with your opinion upon the questions raised in the last paragraph of the note.

I am, &c.

L. CURTIS.

List of Enclosures.

Note.
Irish Free State (Agreement) Act, 1922.
Act (Constitution) of the Irish Provisional Parliament.

Note by Parliamentary Counsel.

The Constitution of the Irish Free State raises questions as to the use of the expression "United Kingdom" in the future, not only as respects His Majesty's Title, but also in such expressions as "Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," "Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," &c.

Before 1707 there were three Kingdoms: the Kingdom of England, the Kingdom of Scotland and the Kingdom of Ireland.

By "The Union with Scotland Act, 1706" (6 Ann., cap. 11), it was provided that the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland should be united into one Kingdom by the name of Great Britain, and that the United Kingdom of Great Britain should be represented by one and the same Parliament, to be styled the Parliament of Great Britain.

By "The Union with Ireland Act, 1800" (39 & 40 Geo. III, cap. 67), it was provided that the Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland should be united into one Kingdom by the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and that the said United Kingdom should be represented by one and the same Parliament, to be styled the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

By the Articles of Agreement for a Treaty between Great Britain and Ireland it is provided that Ireland shall have the same constitutional status in the Community of Nations known as the British Empire as the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, with a Parliament having powers to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Ireland and an Executive responsible to that Parliament, and shall be styled and known as the Irish Free State; and, subject to the provisions thereafter set out, the position of the Irish Free State in relation to the Imperial Parliament and Government and otherwise shall be that of the Dominion of Canada, and that the law, practice and constitutional usage governing the relationship of the Crown or the representative of the Crown and of the Imperial Parliament to the Dominion of Canada shall govern their relationship to the Irish Free State.

By "The Irish Free State (Agreement) Act, 1922," these Articles of Agreement were given the force of law, and it was provided that no writ should be issued after the passing of the Act for the election of a member to serve in the Commons House of Parliament for a constituency in Ireland other than a constituency in Northern Ireland.

The Irish Free State Constitution provides for the establishment of a separate Parliament for the Irish Free State, and the present Parliament of the United Kingdom will have no greater jurisdiction over the Irish Free State than it has over a self-governing Dominion.

It would appear, therefore, that the union of Parliaments effected by the Irish Act of Union has been dissolved, except so far as Northern Ireland is concerned, and even with respect to Northern Ireland unless Northern Ireland exercises the option of opting out.

It is not equally clear that there is a severance of the Crowns. It was a necessary consequence of the union of Parliaments that the Crowns should be united, but it is not a necessary consequence of the severance of the Parliaments that the Crowns should also be severed.

The King's present Title is: "By the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India."

The words "Emperor of India" are due to an addition made by a proclamation issued under "The Royal Titles Act, 1876," and the words "and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas" to an addition made by proclamation under "The Royal Titles Act, 1901."

With respect to the expression "Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" which, as has already been stated, was given by the Irish Act of Union, if Northern Ireland were not to opt out of the Irish Free State, Parliament would naturally, whether the Crowns had or had not been severed, become the Parliament of Great Britain; and presumably legislation would have to be passed abolishing the representation of constituencies in Northern Ireland in the House of Commons and abolishing the right of Irish Peers to sit in the House of Lords. If, on the other hand, Northern Ireland did opt out of the Irish Free State, though Parliament would theoretically have power to legislate with respect to any matters affecting Northern Ireland, by constitutional practice Parliament would be debarred from exercising the power except with respect to matters excluded from the jurisdiction of the Northern Ireland Parliament. Constituencies in Northern Ireland would continue to return thirteen members to serve in the House of Commons, and Irish representative Peers would continue to sit in the House of Lords.

With respect to the expression "Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland"—a title which was made statutory by "The Consolidated Fund Act, 1816" (56 Geo. III, cap. 98)—the position will be that, if Northern Ireland does not opt out of the Irish Free State, the fund will be confined solely to Great Britain, and the title of the fund will naturally become the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain. If, however, Northern Ireland does opt out of the Irish Free State, the proceeds of certain taxes (income tax, customs and excise duty, and corporation profits tax) will be paid into the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and those proceeds will, subject to certain deductions, be paid over to the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland.

The opinion of the Law Officers is requested as to—

1. Whether the effect of the above-mentioned Articles of Agreement for a Treaty, and the establishment of the Irish Free State in pursuance thereof, affects the union of the Crowns effected by the Act of Union.
2. If so, whether legislation will be required for the purpose of any alteration of the Royal Title that may be necessary.
3. Whether it is advisable to change the expressions "Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" and "Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."
4. If so, what expression should be substituted, and whether legislation is necessary for the purpose.
5. Whether, if any alterations are to be made, they should be made before it is finally ascertained whether Northern Ireland will become part of the Irish Free State or not.

Opinion of the Attorney-General.

1. The answer to the first question is in the negative.
2. The second question does not arise.
- 3 and 5. These are questions of policy rather than of law; but in my opinion it would be advisable to change the expressions referred to. I think it inadvisable to change them more often than is necessary, and therefore I should consider it better not to make alterations until it is finally ascertained whether Northern Ireland will become part of the Irish Free State or not.

4 (a.) The expression to be substituted depends in some measure upon the decision of Northern Ireland under clauses 12 and 14 of the Treaty. If Northern Ireland elects not to join the Irish Free State, the expression "Great Britain and Northern Ireland" would seem to be suitable.

4 (b.) Since the expressions now used are established by Act of Parliament, in my opinion any alteration should be effected by legislation.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.

*Law Officers' Department,
November 10, 1922.*

GENERAL.

43

the Privy Council would interpret The Hague Convention our clients were disposed to agree to a settlement somewhat on the lines now suggested by you, but we can hardly expect that our clients will consider such a settlement appropriate now that the Crown's contention that the ships were liable to condemnation has been definitely rejected. We daresay that when our clients made their suggestion in December 1920, the immediate delivery of the 'Prosper' presented considerable attractions; but the state of shipping is very different to-day.

"We feel sure that our clients will hear with astonishment that the Crown are seeking to have the 'Prosper' and the appraised values of the other ships dealt with as German property, as from what they have told us this movement is in absolute conflict with the policy pursued by this country towards Danzig since the date of the treaty.

"We will write you again when we hear from our clients.

"Yours faithfully,

"BOTTERELL AND ROCHE."

And, further, in reply on the 8th August and 16th October:—

"The Treasury Solicitor.

"Exchange Chambers, 24, St. Mary Axe,
London, E.C. 3, August 8, 1922.

"R.M.G.

"Dear Sir,

"'BLONDE,' 'PROSPER,' 'HERCULES.'

"We have now heard from our clients upon the subject of our letter of the 1st instant. We cannot agree to any settlement which involves a waiver of what they and we consider to be their right to the delivery over of the appraised values of the 'Blonde' and 'Hercules' and of the 'Prosper' in specie, but in order to bring about a prompt settlement of the whole matter they would be willing to agree to the Marshal's charges in connection with the custody of the ships up to the date of requisitionment being paid out of the fund, provided that such charges do not exceed 600l.

"Our clients inform us that when the Armistice was concluded, one of their steamers, which was over 1,600 tons net register, was taken over by the Allied nations on time charter, but when the Peace Treaty came into force and Danzig was created a free State they applied to the Reparations Commission for restitution of their vessel, which was granted. There seems to be no reason why a different policy should be pursued with regard to the three vessels now in question.

"As regards the Marshal's charges, if, as we presume, you contend the rule of the Prize Court is that when a ship is released the party taking the delivery must pay the Marshal's expenses, it would appear that the expenses ought to have been paid by the Requisitioning Department when these ships were released to that Department. As they were obtaining the benefit of the delivery of the ships to them, it seems only fair that they should bear the corresponding responsibilities, especially as they have not been called upon to account for the profits of the ships while under requisition. Our clients therefore are making a considerable concession when they are offering to bear these expenses. We write without prejudice, and subject to the receipt of an early reply.

"Yours faithfully,

"BOTTERELL AND ROCHE."

"The Treasury Solicitor.

"Exchange Chambers, 24, St. Mary Axe, E.C. 3.
October 16, 1922.

"S.J.H.

"Without prejudice.

"STEAMSHIP 'PROSPER'.

"Dear Sir,

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 13th instant. We cannot advise our clients to put forward any other proposal than that suggested in our letter of the 8th August. We hope you will let us have your answer with regard to the question of the form of the bail bond as soon as possible.

"Yours faithfully,

"BOTTERELL AND ROCHE."

GENERAL.

Communications took place between the Procurator-General and the Public Trustee with reference to the advisability of proceeding with the Chancery action, and the following letters passed between these Departments:—

"Storey's Gate, St. James's Park, S.W. 1,
"August 10, 1922.

"Dear Millar,

"DETAINED SHIPS.

"I am in receipt of yours of the 3rd instant, and the only observation I have to offer on the minutes of conference forwarded therewith is that I do not find in paragraph 1 any reference to the proceedings which we are taking for a charging order against 'Prosper' and appraised values of 'Blonde' and 'Hercules' under the Treaty of Peace. As I explained, my intention is, after having launched the proceedings, to endeavour to negotiate a compromise under which we let the 'Prosper' go and keep the appraised values, or at worst get the Marshal's expenses. I hope, if possible, to save the Exchequer from parting with any money in this way. I understand that this action was approved by the Treasury at the meeting, and that the Public Trustee had no objection.

"In paragraph 5 add 'and Foreign Office' to cover Egypt.

"Yours sincerely,

"E. W. H. Millar, Esq.,

"R. W. Woods.

"Treasury, S.W. 1."

"Treasury Chambers, Whitehall,
"August 11, 1922.

"Dear Woods,

"Your letter of the 10th instant as to the conference on detained ships. I do not understand that you were actually taking any proceedings with regard to the three Danzig ships. I understood you to suggest that we ought to be able to withhold payment of the appraised values on the ground that the Danzigers were hostile ex-enemies, and should not be treated in the same way as friendly ex-enemies like the Czechoslovaks.

"The general opinion of the conference was that such a distinction could not be drawn. You suggested, however, that we might at least be able to recover the Marshal's expenses, and I have put a note to that effect at the top of p. 3 of the minutes.

"I do not understand what precisely is meant by a charging order under the Treaty of Peace; but so far as I understand it means an order under article 297 in favour of the Public Trustee as against the private owner. These proceedings are presumably the natural sequel to the judgment; but in any case, as I understand, the Exchequer will have to pay over the appraised values to the Public Trustee. It is for him to decide whether or not he will release them to the owners. His view is, I think, that there was no ground for not doing so. But even if he decides not to release them, the money will not return to the Exchequer, but will go either to meet the claims of British creditors or to increase his surplus, which I think would have to be handed over to the German Government. So far as appraised values are concerned, therefore, I do not understand how there can be any question of saving the Exchequer from parting with any money.

"As regards Marshal's expenses, these, if deducted by Public Trustee, would presumably be repaid to us. I am accordingly sending out the minutes unamended on this point.

"Yours sincerely,

"E. W. H. MILLAR."

It was ultimately decided that the question of pressing the proceedings should stand over until the Public Trustee had been further advised by counsel, and the opinion of Mr. Gavin Simonds is herewith. Reference may also be made to paragraph 18 of the case submitted to the Law Officers.

It may be added that as regards the ownership of the "Blonde," nine 64th shares appear to be held by British subjects (see Privy Council appellants' case record, p. 14), and the appellants' solicitors have now stated that two 64th shares in this vessel, formerly held by Carl Eschert (who died some fifteen years ago), are now held as his successor by Dr. Paul Eschert (a Senator of Danzig and a Member of the Government), who has not opted for German citizenship under the Peace Treaty.

GERMANY.

Counsel is requested to further consider and advise whether the terms of settlement offered by Messrs. Botterell and Roche be accepted, or, alternatively, whether the Chancery proceedings should be pressed forward.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. James Wylie and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

In our opinion the terms of settlement proposed by Messrs. Botterell and Roche should be accepted, except that their clients should, if it can be arranged, be required to pay the whole of the costs and charges of seizure and detention and appraisal. We understand that these charges do not exceed 800*l.*, and by their letter of the 8th August, 1922, they have offered to pay them up to 600*l.*

The Public Trustee should further inform Messrs. Botterell and Roche that he has notice of outstanding claims for necessities supplied to the ships, and that before he can hand over the "Prosper" or the appraised values of the "Blonde" and "Hercules," these claims must be provided for.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.

LESLIE SCOTT.

JAMES WYLIE.

GAVIN T. SIMONDS.

Law Officers' Department

December 16, 1922.

GERMANY.

[C 17791/99/18/1922]

No. 8.

[December 28, 1922.]

Case for the Opinion of the Solicitor-General.

1. DOES the expression "in general such other measures" in paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles signify any measures other than measures such as "economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals" which fall within the limits of the sovereignty of the individual Governments?

2. Is it for the Reparation Commission, under paragraph 12 of Annex II to Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles, to interpret paragraph 18 of that annex?

Foreign Office, December 28, 1922.

Opinion of the Solicitor-General.

1. I think paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the treaty contemplates action by an individual Government only within its own jurisdictional limits. The fact that each Government is given a separate discretion as to the measures it may deem necessary in the circumstances indicates clearly to my mind an intention to restrict "other measures" to such measures as come within the above description.

2. I think it is the duty of the Reparation Commission to interpret the provisions of paragraph 18. I see no warrant for the view that there is a distinction, for the purposes of paragraph 12, between interpretation as against the German Government and interpretation as between the Allied Governments. The explicit language of paragraph 12 in giving the Reparation Commission authority to interpret the provisions of Part VIII appears to exclude the possibility of a rival authority, even in a case under paragraph 18 (if such could ever arise), in which the interests of the German Government were not affected.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

December 28, 1922.

[A 4373/963/45/1922]

No. 9.

[August 4, 1922.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 12, 1922.

Right of New Zealand or United States to establish preferential tariffs, &c.,
in Samoa.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Earl of Balfour, to lay before you, for your consideration, the papers noted on the accompanying list respecting the question whether the Government of New Zealand is entitled, in view of existing treaty rights, to extend to Western Samoa the Dominion tariff, under which preference is given to goods of Imperial origin, and whether the United States Government is entitled to restrict to United States merchant vessels the trade between Tutuila and United States ports.

2. In 1899 an agreement (Paper (A)) was entered into between the United States, Germany and Great Britain, article 3 of which provides that the "signatory Powers shall continue to enjoy, in respect of their commerce and commercial vessels, in all islands of the Samoan group, privileges and conditions equal to those enjoyed by the sovereign Power in all ports which may be open to the commerce of either of them."

3. Article 288 of the Treaty of Versailles provides that "the special rights and privileges granted to Germany by article 3 of the Convention of the 2nd December, 1899, relating to Samoa, shall be considered to have terminated on the 4th August, 1914." The provisions of this article of the 1899 treaty are thus clearly terminated as far as Germany is concerned, and the German possessions in Samoa are now administered by New Zealand under mandate (Paper (B)), the New Zealand Government having applied the New Zealand preferential tariff system to this mandated area.

4. At the end of 1920 the United States Embassy in London, acting on instructions from the United States Government, communicated to Lord Curzon a memorandum (Paper (C)) maintaining that the convention of 1899 was still in effect as far as Great Britain and the United States were concerned, and that any discrimination against imports from the United States would be a violation of article 3 of that convention. It appeared difficult to dispute the view taken by the United States Government that the treaty of 1899 was operative, and, as a result of communications with the Colonial Office, a despatch (Paper (D)) was addressed to the Governor-General of New Zealand indicating this view.

5. The New Zealand Government were, however, of opinion that they were within their legal rights in establishing a preferential tariff in Western Samoa, the ground for this opinion being set forth in a memorandum from the Acting Prime Minister, dated the 4th June, 1921 (Paper (E)); and since the date of this communication the United States Government have again indicated their view that the introduction of the preferential tariff is contrary to the rights still enjoyed by them under the treaty of 1899, though no further arguments on the point were advanced. Advantage has, however, been taken of the presence in this country of Sir Francis Bell, the Attorney-General for New Zealand, to discuss the matter with him, and a memorandum prepared by him on the subject is enclosed (Paper (F)). It may be added, as bearing upon the point raised by Sir Francis Bell in paragraphs 6 and 10 of this memorandum, that it appears from the volume of "Colonial Tariff Policies" recently issued by the United States tariff commissioners, p. 616, that the United States Merchant Marine Act of the 5th July, 1920, provided for the application to Samoa as an island territory or possession of the United States of the laws restricting trade between United States ports to vessels of United States registry (Paper (G)).

6. Sir Francis Bell produces no new arguments wherewith to combat the contention of the United States Government to the effect that the treaty of 1899 is still operative as between Great Britain and the United States, and that its effect must be to prevent the introduction of a preferential tariff in Western Samoa. On the other hand, he shows good grounds for holding that article 3 of the convention must also prevent the United States Government from extending to United States ships any preference at Tutuila. In connection with this latter point, I am to observe that in 1911 it was alleged that the United States authorities had exercised some discrimination against British ships trading between Pago Pago and Leone, in Tutuila. Enquiries were made of the United States Government, who stated that Leone was not a port of entry; but in the course of the correspondence which took place at that time, the United States Government admitted that British ships were entitled to the same treatment as United States and German ships in this respect (Papers (H), (J) and (K)). In the same year a complaint was also made by a British firm that bills of health were being issued gratis by the United States Consul at Apia to United States vessels trading between Apia and Pago Pago (Tutuila), while a charge was made for similar bills of health issued to British vessels trading on the same route. This complaint being brought to the notice of the United States Government, it was decided by the State Department in 1913 that the exaction of fees from British vessels, while United States vessels were exempt, was contrary to article 3 of the treaty of 1899, and instructions were accordingly given for the collection of such fees to be discontinued (Papers (L) and (M)). The United States authorities were thus in 1913 of opinion that the treaty prevented preference in this respect being given to United States ships trading with American Samoa.

7. I am now directed by Lord Balfour to request that you will be good enough to favour him with your opinion generally, and, in particular, on the following questions:—

- (1.) Is article 3 of the treaty of the 2nd December, 1899, still in force as between the United States and the British Empire?
- (2.) If so, is it possible to support the claim of the New Zealand Government to establish a preferential tariff in Western Samoa, from the benefits of which the United States would be excluded?
- (3.) If the treaty is still in force, is His Majesty's Government entitled to claim thereunder that the United States Government may not introduce any system of preference for United States shipping trading to Tutuila, and especially may not assimilate Tutuila to those overseas possessions of the United States the trade between which and the mainland ports of the United States is confined to United States vessels?

I have, &c.

R. SPERLING.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Convention between the United Kingdom, Germany and the United States, December 2, 1899 (T. 1081).
- (B.) Mandate for German Samoa ("Parliamentary Paper" 5061).
- (C.) United States Embassy memorandum, November 18, 1920 (A 8131/8131/45/1920).
- (D.) Secretary of State for the Colonies to Governor-General of New Zealand, January 3, 1921 (A 171/171/45/1921).
- (E.) Prime Minister of New Zealand to Governor-General of New Zealand, June 4, 1921 (A 5897/171/45/1921).
- (F.) Memorandum by Sir F. Bell, June 10, 1922 (A 3890/963/45/1922).
- (G.) Extract from "Colonial Tariff Policies," p. 616.*
- (H.) Despatch to His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, No. 76, Commercial, June 9, 1911, with enclosures (18593/145/1911).
- (J.) Department of State, Washington, to His Majesty's Ambassador, Washington, February 5, 1912 (7164/145/1912).
- (K.) Governor of American Samoa to Secretary of the Navy, Washington, March 26, 1912 (25146/7164/145/1912).
- (L.) Samoa Shipping and Trading Company to United States Consul, Apia, November 23, 1911 (42432/7164/145/1912).
- (M.) Department of State, Washington, to His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, October 15, 1913 (49597/145/1913).

* Paper (G).

Extract from "Colonial Tariff Policies" (p. 616).

The Merchant Marine Act of 5th July, 1920, (section 21), provides for the application to Samoa, as an island territory or possession of the United States, of the laws restricting trade between American ports to vessels of American registry. Vessels owned by Samoans are not entitled to American registry, but are entitled to fly the American flag.

Report.

(1.) We are of opinion that article 3 of the Convention of the 2nd December, 1899, is still in force as between the United States and the British Empire.

(2.) In our opinion, No.

The construction of article 3 is not free from difficulty. We think that its true effect is to impose upon His Majesty the obligation to accord to the United States in respect of its commerce and commercial vessels in all islands of the Samoan group, in which it lies within his power to do so, equal privileges to those enjoyed by British commerce and commercial vessels in those ports of the Samoan group which are under British sovereignty.

This obligation is binding upon the New Zealand Government as representing His Majesty, and precludes that Government from contravening article 3 in any part of the Samoan group which is under its authority, from whatever source derived.

(3.) In our opinion, Yes.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

*Law Officers' Department,
August 4, 1922.*

[T 104/104/345/1923.]

No. 9^d.

[Home Office.]

[October 24, 1922.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

National status of child born in the United States, whose father became,
during the child's minority, naturalised
in United States on or after
March 2,
1907.

IN connection with the Law Officers' Opinion dated the 7th April, 1921,* on the subject of the status of Mr. D. B. S. Wharton, a child born in the United States of America of a natural-born British subject, who during the minority of the child became a citizen of the United States, the Secretary of State desires to obtain the further opinion of the Law Officers in the following circumstances:—

In the case (copy herewith*) on which the Law Officers gave their opinion, reference was made to section 2172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, of which an extract was set out as follows:—

"The children of persons who have been duly naturalised under any law of the United States . . . , being under the age of 21 years at the time of the naturalisation of their parents, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens thereof"

The complete section from which this extract was taken is as follows:—

"The children of persons who have been duly naturalised under any law of the United States, or who, previous to the passing of any law on that subject by the Government of the United States, may have become citizens of any one of the States under the laws thereof, being under the age of 21 years at the time of the naturalisation of their parents, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens thereof; and the children of persons who are now, or have been, citizens of the United States, shall, though born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, be considered as citizens thereof; but no person heretofore proscribed by any State, or who has been legally convicted of having joined the army of Great Britain during the Revolutionary War, shall be admitted to become a citizen without the consent of the legislature of the State in which such person was proscribed."

Since this case was laid before the Law Officers it has been ascertained, as a result of enquiries made unofficially through the United States Embassy, that the first part of the section 2172, that is, the part preceding the first semicolon, which includes the extract as quoted above, was replaced by section 5 of the Citizenship Act of the 2nd March, 1907 (Public No. 193, copy herewith), which is as follows:—

"That a child born without the United States of alien parents shall be deemed a citizen of the United States by virtue of the naturalisation of or resumption of American citizenship by the parent: Provided, That such naturalisation or resumption takes place during the minority of such child; and provided further, That the citizenship of such minor child shall begin at the time such minor child begins to reside permanently in the United States."

* Confidential 11,933, p. 43.

It will thus be seen that the provisions of United States law, upon which the opinion of the Law Officers, dated the 7th April, 1921, was based, though in force at the material time so far as Mr. D. B. S. Wharton was concerned, and therefore presumably effective for the purpose of determining his status, ceased to be in force on the 2nd March, 1907. The new provision introduced by section 5 of the Act of 1907, as above quoted, appears to relate only to children born outside the United States of alien parents. It appears to have no application to children born in the United States of America of alien parents, e.g., natural-born British subjects, who subsequently become naturalised citizens of the United States of America; and there appears to be no other enactment of United States law dealing with the naturalisation of such children.

The question on which the Secretary of State desires the opinion of the Law Officers is—

Whether a British subject born in the United States, whose father became, during that person's minority, naturalised in the United States on or after the 2nd March, 1907 (the date when the United States law of that year came into force), can be regarded as having lost his British nationality under section 10 (3) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," or (where the naturalisation of the father in the United States of America took place after the 1st January, 1915) under section 12 (1) of "The British Naturalisation and Status of Aliens Act, 1914."

Home Office, August 17, 1922.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

It appears that a child born in the United States of British parents does not, by American law, "become naturalised" in the United States on the naturalisation there of the father. Under these circumstances we do not think that the child loses his British nationality either under section 10 (3) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," or under section 12 (1) of the Act of 1914.

It seems, however, probable that the reason why the child does not "become naturalised" by American law is that he was an American national from birth, and that the intention of the Acts of 1870 and 1914 was that a child of dual nationality should, in the case of his father becoming naturalised in the United States of America, lose his British nationality. It is, we think, arguable that section 10 (3) of the 1870 Act and section 12 (1) of the 1914 Act did not in fact carry out such an intention, and, in our view, it would be permissible for the Secretary of State to grant a special certificate under section 4 of the 1914 Act in such a case.

ERNEST M. POLLOCK.
LESLIE SCOTT.

*Law Officers' Department,
October 24, 1922.*

1923

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

(12470)

LAST COPY.

5

Nothing mutilated or removed. Admin.

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1923.

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked I^a, &c.

CHINA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	May 17, 1923	Russian issue of Chinese 5 per cent. Reorganisation Loan of 1913 ..	1

GENERAL.

I^a	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Apr. 11, 1923	Proposed amendment of British North America Act: powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canadian Parliament ..	3
I^b	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	July 21,	Extra-territorial effect of certain Imperial statutes in their application to the Irish Free State ..	5
I^c	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Dec. 31,	Extra-territorial effect of certain Imperial statutes in their application to the Irish Free State ..	7

GERMANY.

2	Law Officers ..	Feb. 3, 1923	Withdrawal of British troops from Rhine territories: effect ..	8
3	Law Officers ..	Apr. 11,	Validity under Treaty of Versailles, 1919, of Franco-Belgian advance into the Ruhr Valley ..	10
4	Law Officers ..	July 30,	Interpretation of Treaty of Versailles, 1919, paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII; and of the Rhineland Agreement ..	15

PALESTINE.

I^a	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Jan. 3, 1923	Preferential treatment in United Kingdom of goods imported from Palestine ..	17
----------------------	--------------------------------------	--------------	--	----

RUSSIA.

5	Law Officers ..	Sept. 19, 1923	Immunity of Soviet official agents from processes of British courts ..	18
---	-----------------	----------------	--	----

TURKEY.

5^a	Law Officers and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds [Board of Trade]	Dec. 27, 1923	Disposal of German and Austrian funds sequestered in Constantinople by Allied Powers ..	21
----------------------	---	---------------	---	----

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1923.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ARM—FUN.

A.

Army, British: withdrawal of troops from Rhine Territories; effect, 8-10.
Attorney-General v. MacLeod, 7.
Austria: disposal of funds sequestered in Constantinople by Allies, 21-23.

B.

Banque de France, 21.
Baxendale v. Bennett, 3.
Belgium: validity under Treaty of Versailles, 1919, of Franco-Belgian advance into Ruhr Valley, 10-15.
Bonds. See Loan.
British North America. See Canada.
Bull and Bull, Messrs., 18, 19.

C.

Canada: amendment of British North America Act, 3, 4.
" powers of extra-territorial legislation for Parliament, 3, 4.
China. See Loan.
Constantinople: Austrian and German funds sequestered by Allied Powers; disposal of, 21-23.
Council of Foreign Bondholders, 2.
Courts, British: immunity of Soviet official agents from processes of, 18-21.
Customs: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from Palestine, 17, 18.

D.

Deutsche Bank, 21.
Deutsche Orient Bank, 21.
Diplomatic privilege: immunity of Soviet official agents from processes of British courts, 18-21.

E.

Extra-territoriality: proposed powers of extra-territorial legislation for Canada, 3, 4.
" extra-territorial effect of certain Imperial statutes in their application to Irish Free State, 5-8.

F.

Fenton Textile Association, 19, 20.
France: validity under Treaty of Versailles, 1919, of Franco-Belgian advance into Ruhr Valley, 10-15.
Funds. See Property.

GER—PRO

G.

Germany: withdrawal of British troops from Rhine Territories; effect, 8-10.
" withdrawal of British member of Rhine-land Commission; effect, 8-10.
" Franco-Belgian advance into Ruhr Valley; validity under Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 10-15.
" Funds sequestered in Constantinople by Allies: disposal of, 21-23.

H.

Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, 2.

I.

Ingham v. Primrose, 3.
Ireland: extra-territorial effect of certain Imperial statutes in their application to Irish Free State, 5-8.

K.

Kogan, Mr. M., 18.
Krassin, L. B., 18-20.

L.

League of Nations: territories under mandates; preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from, 17, 18.
Linklaters and Paines, Messrs., 18, 19.
Loan: Russian issue of Chinese 5 per cent. Reorganisation Loan, 1913; liability of Chinese Government on bonds seized by Soviet Government, 1-3.
London Joint Stock Bank (Limited) v. MacMillan, 3.
Luther v. Sagor, 18.

M.

Mandates: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from territories placed under, 17, 18.
Moscow Narodny Bank, 1.

N.

Nash v. De Freville, 3.

P.

Palestine: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from, 17, 18.
Patey, Messrs. H. W. and S., 18, 19.
Preferential treatment. See Customs.
Property: German and Austrian funds sequestered in Constantinople by Allied Powers; disposal of, 21-23.

1923

(iv)

REP—SOV.

R.

Reprisals: interpretation of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 10-17.

Rhine Territories: withdrawal of British troops; effect, 8-10.

" " withdrawal of British member of Rhineland Commission; effect, 8-10.

" " interpretation of Rhineland Agreement, 1919, 15-17.

" " interpretation of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 15-17.

Ruhr Valley: Validity of Franco-Belgian advance into, 10-15.

Russia. See Soviet Union.

Russo-Asiatic Bank, 1.

S.

Sequestration. See Property.

Smith and Prosser, 3.

Soviet Union: Russian issue of Chinese 5 per cent. Reorganisation Loan, 1913: liability of Chinese Government on bonds seized by Soviet Government, 1-3.

SOV—WIE.

Soviet Union: immunity of official agents from processes of British courts, 19-21.

T.

Treaty of Peace (Austria): application of article 249^e to Austrian funds sequestrated in Constantinople by Allied Powers, 21-23.

" " (Germany): Effect of withdrawal of British troops from Rhine Territories, 8-10.

" " (Germany): validity of Franco-Belgian advance into Ruhr Valley, 10-15.

" " (Germany): interpretation of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII, 10-17.

" " (Germany): application of article 297^e to German funds sequestrated in Constantinople by Allied Powers, 21-23.

Treaty of Saint-Germain. See Treaty of Peace (Austria).

Treaty of Versailles. See Treaty of Peace (Germany).

W.

Wiener Bankverein, 21.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c : 1923.

CHINA.

[F 1537/371/10/1923]

No. 1.

[May 17, 1923.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 7, 1923.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request the favour of your observations on the following matter:—

1. Under an agreement with the Chinese Government dated the 26th April, 1913, five banks (British, German, French, Russian and Japanese) issued in their respective capitals, on behalf of the Chinese Government, a loan of 25,000,000*l.* The bonds of each of the five issues ranked concurrently, and all the coupons were payable at any of the five banks at a fixed rate of exchange.

2. The present case concerns the Russian issue of this loan, issued by the Russo-Asiatic Bank.

3. Owing to the outbreak of war, the exchange of the provisional scrip certificates for definite bonds proceeded slowly, and when the Bolshevik revolution broke out in November 1917 certain of the subscribers to the Russian issue were still in possession of the scrip certificates. The bonds to be issued in return for the scrip had been prepared, and were lying at the Russo-Asiatic Bank in Petrograd awaiting delivery to the parties entitled. When the banks were nationalised in Russia these bonds passed into the power of the Soviet Government.

4. In 1920 the Soviet Government obtained permission from His Majesty's Government to purchase supplies of drugs in this country, and, in payment, to sell bonds of the Russian issue of the 1913 Chinese Government loan to the value of 150,000*l.* The facts stated in the preceding paragraphs were at that time unknown to His Majesty's Government, who had no reason to doubt that the bonds offered for sale by the Soviet Government would be genuine bonds, of which the Soviet Government were entitled to dispose in the ordinary course. On the strength of this permission the Moscow Narodny Bank, on behalf of the Soviet Government, sold in London bonds which had been seized at the Russo-Asiatic Bank, Petrograd, and which were bonds destined for issue in exchange for the scrip certificates.

5. The title to, and authenticity of, these bonds does not appear to have been questioned till 1922, and interest was duly paid on them up to the 1st January of that year. In June 1922 the Chinese Government, having discovered that they were in effect being required to pay interest on two instruments issued in respect of the same obligation (i.e., on the scrip certificates and on the definitive bond), published a notice that payment of the coupons of bonds of the Russian issue would henceforth only be made on proof that such bonds had been delivered prior to December 1917. At the same time, holders still in possession of the provisional scrip certificates received in exchange bonds of a new series called "green bonds" which were recognised as valid by the Chinese Government. These measures have been taken by the Chinese Government at the instance of the consortium of bankers which now controls in great measure the loan operations of the Chinese Government, and a copy of a letter from the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation explaining the steps taken is enclosed.

2161 [11557]

B

6. The result of these measures has been to confirm the rights of the holders of the scrip certificates, and to invalidate the rights of purchasers of the bonds placed on the market by the Soviet Government in the circumstances set out in paragraph 4. These purchasers have protested to the Foreign Office, and request that representations should be made to the Chinese Government to secure recognition of these bonds. Copies of two letters from the Council of Foreign Bondholders are transmitted herewith for your information.

7. The Secretary of State is not aware of any precedents which show whether a bond, which, though good and complete on the face of it, having been deposited with a bank of issue for delivery in return for the scrip certificates, is placed on the market without the fulfilment of this condition, and is then purchased in good faith, constitutes a valid obligation against the party liable under the bond. If it does so it would appear that the Chinese Government may properly be pressed to pay interest on the bonds seized and sold by the Soviet Government irrespective of the liability of the Chinese Government to pay interest on the scrip still held by the original subscribers or on the green bonds now issued to replace that scrip. In this case the Chinese Government would presumably be entitled to claim repayment by the Soviet Government in due course of the sums which they have had to pay on the bonds seized and sold by the latter Government.

8. I am to request that you will be so good as to take this question into your consideration and to favour the Secretary of State with your opinion as to whether, in the circumstances indicated above, the Chinese Government are liable on the bonds seized by the Soviet Government and sold on the London market and purchased in good faith by their present holders.

9. The Secretary of State would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

B. C. NEWTON.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to Foreign Office, June 30, 1922 (F 2218/1196/10/1922).
- (B.) Council of Foreign Bondholders to Foreign Office, February 9, 1923 (F 371/371/10/1923).
- (C.) Council of Foreign Bondholders, March 5, 1923 (F 659/371/10/1923).

Report.

1. The bonds in question in this case are bearer bonds, and by English law are undoubtedly negotiable instruments. The payor is an independent sovereign Government, and, therefore, is under no legal liability unless it chooses to waive its sovereignty and to submit to the jurisdiction of a municipal court. We assume, for the purposes of this opinion, that we are desired to treat the question as if no point as to independent sovereignty were being taken.

2. If the bonds had been issued by the Chinese Government to the various banks the question would, in our opinion, have been free from doubt. A holder in due course of a negotiable instrument is not affected by any defect of title in his transferor, and even if the instrument be stolen he acquires a good title against the parties liable on the instrument.

3. The difficulty in this case arises from the fact that the bonds never were issued by the Chinese Government. It is apparent from the agreement of the 26th April, 1913, that the bonds were received at the banks as agents of the Government in order that the banks might issue them to the persons subscribing to the loan. The bonds now in question were seized by the Soviet Government before they had ever been issued, and the position is, in our opinion, the same as if they had been stolen while in the custody of the Chinese Government. This gives rise to a point of considerable difficulty. It was laid down in Ingham v. Primrose, 7, C.B.N.S. 82, that if a completed negotiable instrument was stolen before issue a holder in due course did acquire a good title, and the parties of the instrument would have no defence to a claim by such a holder. But this decision was doubted by Lord Esher in Baxendale v. Bennett, 3, Q.B.D. 525; and the actual decision in the case was stated by Vaughan Williams, L. J., in Smith v. Prosser, 1907 (2), K.B. 735, to be no longer law. On the other hand, Lord Collins, in Nash v. De Freville, 1900 (2), Q.B. 72, speaks of the judgment in Ingham v. Primrose as at all events sound in principle; and the case is referred to by Lord Finlay and discussed without disapproval in London Joint Stock Bank (Limited) v. Macmillan, 1918, A.C. 777. Byles, on Bills in the 1923 edition, at p. 159, is inclined to think that Ingham and Primrose was correctly decided. By section 21 (2) of "The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882," valid delivery of a Bill is conclusively presumed in favour of a holder in due course; and by section 2 of the same Act issue means the first delivery of a Bill complete in form to a person who takes it as a holder.

In these circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that the law is correctly stated in Ingham v. Primrose, and that by English law a party to a Bill is liable on it to a holder in due course, although it has been stolen from him or from his agent before issue. The present case is further complicated by the fact that the bond was presumably intended to be issued in Russia, and that it was in Russia that the theft took place; but the negotiation of the bond took place in England, and we have come to the conclusion that the liability of the parties upon it to the English holder depends upon English law. For these reasons we answer the question submitted to us in the affirmative.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
May 17, 1923.

GENERAL.

[W 3763/3763/50/1924]

No. 1^A.

[Colonial Office.]

[April 11, 1923.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, January 26, 1923.

WITH reference to your predecessors' Report* of the 5th August, 1921, regarding the proposed amendment of the British North America Act, respecting extra-territorial legislation, I am directed by the Duke of Devonshire to transmit to you a copy of a despatch on the subject from the Governor-General of Canada.

2. The Duke of Devonshire would be obliged if you would advise him whether, in your opinion, the modifications suggested by the Canadian Government in the formula proposed in your predecessors' Report are such as to render the formula open to the objection that it goes beyond the expressed wishes and intentions of the Canadian Government, and, if so, in what respects.

I am, &c.

C. T. DAVIS.

Enclosure.

Governor-General of Canada to the Duke of Devonshire.

My Lord Duke,

Government House, Ottawa, December 19, 1922.

WITH reference to Mr. Churchill's Secret Despatch of the 18th August, 1921, I have the honour to transmit herewith copies of an Approved Minute of the Privy Council for Canada relative to the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation.

I have, &c.

BYNG OF VIMY.

* Confidential 11938, p. 24.

GENERAL

Sub-Enclosure.

Certified Copy of a Report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor-General on December 11, 1922.

(P.C. 2494.)

THE Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a Report, dated the 16th November, 1922, from the Minister of Justice, representing that he has had under consideration the Despatch (Secret) of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies of the 18th August, 1921, with regard to the proposed amendment to "The British North America Act, 1867," respecting extra-territorial legislation. Mr. Churchill states that he has been in communication with the Law Officers of the Crown with a view to the advisability of submitting an alternative form of enactment, and that, after careful consideration, they propose the substitution of the following, viz. :—

"An enactment of the Parliament of Canada may operate extra-territorially, provided that, and in so far as such extra-territorial operation is ancillary to, and necessary for, its enforcement as a law for the peace, order and good government of Canada."

The Minister observes that the amendment originally proposed and as set out in the Order in Council of the 5th February, 1920, is expressed as follows :—

"An enactment of the Parliament of Canada otherwise intra vires, shall operate, and be deemed to have operated, extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same extent as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom."

The Minister, upon careful consideration, finds himself unable to realise the force of the objection to the last-quoted draft which was entertained by the Law Officers of the Crown, and, moreover, he considers the alternative form submitted by Mr. Churchill's despatch unacceptable principally because the validity of the legislation under a power so expressed may be said to depend upon whether the judicial tribunals would consider the legislation necessary; but, adopting the outline of the draft submitted by the Law Officers of the Crown, it would appear to answer the purpose if modified to read as follows :—

"An enactment of the Parliament of Canada, if expressed to operate extra-territorially, shall have, and be deemed to have had, that operation if and in so far as it is a law for or ancillary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

The Minister, therefore, while expressing his preference for the form of enactment as originally framed, submits, by way of compromise, and in order to avoid further discussion, that the draft last herein quoted may be adopted as giving sufficient legislative expression to the extra-territorial authority of the Dominion.

The Committee concur in the foregoing, and submit the same for your Excellency's approval.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Report.

In our opinion the modifications suggested by the Canadian Government do not materially affect the formula proposed by our predecessors, and they may properly be accepted.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
April 11, 1923.*

GENERAL

[W 3763/3763/50/1924]

No. 1^B.

[Colonial Office.]

[July 21, 1923.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.Downing Street, June 29, 1923.

Gentlemen,

I AM directed by the Duke of Devonshire to request you to take into your consideration the position resulting from article 73 of the Constitution of the Irish Free State, which is set out in the schedule to "The Irish Free State Constitution Act, 1922 (Session 2)," with regard to the extra-territorial effect of existing Imperial legislation which is thereby continued in force, and in particular with regard to "The Steam Trawling (Ireland) Act, 1889," and "The Fisheries (Ireland) Act, 1901."

2. Under "The Steam Trawling (Ireland) Act, 1889," bye-laws might be made, and have in fact been made, by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland prohibiting steam trawling within areas specified in such bye-laws outside the 3-mile limit, and the landing in Ireland of any fish caught in contravention of any such bye-laws was made an offence; and under "The Fisheries (Ireland) Act, 1901," penalties were imposed for the contravention of any such bye-laws, irrespective of whether the fish was landed in Ireland, and summonses in respect of offences against the bye-laws might be served anywhere within the United Kingdom.

3. These Acts and the bye-laws made thereunder were in force in the Irish Free State at the date of the coming into operation of the Constitution, and therefore, in accordance with article 73 of the Constitution, until they have been repealed or amended by the Free State Parliament, they remain of full force and effect in that State to the extent to which they are not inconsistent with the Constitution.

4. Section 2 of the Constitution of "The Irish Free State ('Saorstát Éireann') Act, 1922," which is set forth in the schedule to "The Irish Free State Constitution Act, 1922 (Session 2)," provides that the Constitution shall be construed with reference to the Articles of Agreement for a treaty between Great Britain and Ireland, and that, if any provision of the Constitution, or of any law made thereunder, is in any respect repugnant to any of the provisions of the treaty, it shall, to the extent only of such repugnancy, be absolutely void and inoperative.

5. The Articles of Agreement referred to provide that Ireland shall have the same constitutional status as the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, and that the position of the Irish Free State in relation to the Imperial Parliament and Government and otherwise shall be that of the Dominion of Canada.

6. I am to enclose a memorandum which has been prepared in this Department as to various points which arise in the present connection, and to ask for the favour of your report at your early convenience on the following questions :—

- (1.) Whether the Act of 1889, together with the bye-laws made thereunder before December 1922, and the Act of 1901 are continued in force in the Irish Free State under article 73 of the Constitution with the same extra-territorial effect as before the establishment of the Irish Free State.
- (2.) If the answer to the preceding question is in the affirmative—
 - (a.) Whether the Ministry of Agriculture of the Irish Free State (to which Department the functions of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction have been transferred) has power under the Act of 1889 to make further bye-laws with extra-territorial effect;
 - (b.) Whether the Irish Free State Parliament can either amend the Acts of 1889 and 1901 or pass any new legislation in pari materia, in either case with extra-territorial effect.
- (3.) If the answer to question No. (1) is in the negative, what is the present position with regard to the Acts and bye-laws in question.
- (4.) Generally as to the power (if any) of the Irish Free State Parliament under the Articles of Agreement and the Constitution to legislate with extra-territorial effect.

Extra-territorial effect of certain Imperial statutes in their application to the Irish Free State.

7. In this connection I am to refer to your Report of the 11th April* regarding the proposed amendment of the British North America Act respecting extra-territorial legislation, and to enquire what bearing in your opinion the proposed concession to Canada would, in view of the terms of the Articles of Agreement, have upon the powers of the Parliament of the Irish Free State.

I have, &c.
M. STURGIS.

Enclosure.

"The Steam Trawling (Ireland) Act, 1889," and "The Fisheries (Ireland) Act, 1901."

AN important general question is raised in connection with these Acts as to the position with regard to existing Imperial legislation having extra-territorial effect which is continued in force in the Irish Free State by article 73 of the Irish Free State Constitution.

It seems difficult to contend that the Irish Free State Courts would not have jurisdiction to administer that existing legislation (including bye-laws already made thereunder) with the same extra-territorial effect as before the establishment of the Irish Free State.

But two other questions then arise:—

- (a.) Can the Irish Free State executive authority, which has replaced or will replace the "Inspectors of Irish Fisheries," continue to make bye-laws with extra-territorial effect under the first of the two Fishery Acts in question?
- (b.) Can the Irish Free State Parliament either amend these Acts or pass any new legislation in pari materia, in either case with extra-territorial effect?

It is submitted that the Irish Free State Parliament has only the powers of a Dominion Legislature, and that it would be contrary to the treaty that that Parliament should deal with Imperial legislation continued in force in the Irish Free State under article 73 of the Constitution as if it possessed the powers of the Imperial Parliament, and that if it passed any legislation of such a character it would be void under section 2 of the "Constituent Act."

It would, however, be difficult to conceive a more extraordinary anomaly than that the Statute Law which the Irish Free State takes over under article 73 of the Constitution should continue to have the same "Imperial" effect, whilst if the Irish Free State wishes to repeal or amend it it can only substitute Statute Law having "Dominion" effect.

It might perhaps be contended that the executive of the Irish Free State cannot have wider power as to the issue of future statutory rules and orders under the continued legislation than the Irish Free State Legislature could give them by fresh legislation of its own, so that the answer to both questions (a) and (b) is in the negative; but if the answer to question (a) were held to be "yes" and the answer to question (b) to be "no," the anomaly would be even more glaring.

It may be that questions (a) and (b) are unlikely to arise with regard to the Fisheries Acts and bye-laws, and that the Irish Free State will be content to carry on with them as they stand subject to any necessary adaptations; but similar questions seem bound to arise sooner or later with regard to other Acts or rules which are continued in force in the Irish Free State under article 73 of the Constitution, and it would appear expedient for the Secretary of State to consult the Law Officers on the subject.

Report.

1. Our answer is in the affirmative. The Acts in question were enacted by the Imperial Parliament, and there is nothing in the creation of the Irish Free State which prevents their remaining as part of the law of that country.

2 (a). This question has given us considerable difficulty. It may be contended that, since the Imperial Parliament conferred the power to make bye-laws in respect of extra-territorial waters on the Department of Agriculture for Ireland, and since the powers of that Department have now been transferred to the Ministry of Agriculture of the Irish Free State, that Ministry has now, by virtue of the Imperial enactment, the power to make such bye-laws, and that, if the Imperial Parliament does not desire those powers to continue, the remedy is to repeal or modify the Act conferring them. We have, however, come to the conclusion that this not the true view, and that the answer to this question is in the negative. The Irish Free State executive has only authority to act within the limits of that Dominion, and we think that the only powers transferred to the Irish Free State Ministry must be powers to make bye-laws within the limits of the Irish Free State.

* No. 1A.

2 (b). Our answer to this question is in the negative. Dominion Parliaments have only jurisdiction to legislate for matters occurring within the territorial limits of the Dominion (see A.G. v. McLeod, 1891, A.C. 455).

3. This does not arise.

4. In our opinion there is at present no such power.

5. The proposed concession to Canada would alter our answer to question 2 (b). If the proposed concession were made, the Canadian Parliament would have the right to legislate with extra-territorial effect, so long as the particular enactment was a law for or ancillary to the peace, order and good government of Canada. Since the position of the Irish Free State is that of the Dominion of Canada, the Irish Free State would be entitled to claim that it had the same power.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
July 21, 1923.

[W 3763/3763/50/1924].

No. 1^c.

[Colonial Office.]

[December 31, 1923.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, November 13, 1923.

I AM directed by the Duke of Devonshire to refer to the letter from this Department of the 29th June last and your Report* of the 21st July last with reference to the extra-territorial effect of certain Imperial Statutes in their present application to the Irish Free State, in paragraph 5 of which Report you expressed the view that, if the proposal to confer power on the Canadian Parliament to legislate with extra-territorial effect were carried out, the Irish Free State, since its position under the Articles of Agreement for a Treaty between Great Britain and Ireland (which may for convenience be called the Treaty) is that of the Dominion of Canada, would be entitled to claim that it had the same power.

I am to say that the question which was raised by implication in paragraph 7 of the reference from this Department of the 29th June, and which the Secretary of State would now desire to put in an express form, is whether, under Article 2 of the Treaty, the constitutional position of the Irish Free State is to be that of Canada at the date when the Treaty was signed (6th December, 1921), or whether the constitutional relations between the United Kingdom and the Irish Free State are to be affected legally and constitutionally by every change taking place after that date in the constitutional relations between the United Kingdom and Canada.

I am to explain that his Grace is informed that at the time when the negotiations for the Treaty were being carried on it was a fundamental part of the intended settlement that the constitutional relations between the United Kingdom and the Irish Free State should be those actually at that time existing between the United Kingdom and Canada.

It was for this reason, to give one illustration, that, with the concurrence of Lord Hewart (then Attorney-General), the British delegates did not press for any provision in the Treaty as to appeals to the Privy Council, since, in Lord Hewart's opinion, there was no doubt that the then existing position as to appeals from Canada to the Privy Council would be maintained with regard to the Irish Free State, even if appeal to the Privy Council from Canada should at any future time be abolished.

* No. 1B.

Extra-territorial effect of certain Imperial Statutes in their application to the Irish Free State.

It is true that this particular point does not arise on the construction of Article 2 of the Treaty, since the prerogative of the Crown to grant special leave to appeal to the Privy Council has been expressly provided by the proviso to Article 66 of the Irish Free State Constitution, but the question of construction does arise with regard to the proposed extension of the power of the Canadian Parliament, and may arise from time to time with other changes in the constitutional relations between the United Kingdom and Canada.

It is, therefore, one of the greatest possible importance, and I am directed by the Secretary of State to request you to take the construction of the Treaty again into your consideration, and to report whether, on such further consideration, you are able to modify the opinion expressed in paragraph 5 of your Report of the 21st July.

I am, &c.

J. E. MASTERTON SMITH.

Report.

The question raised in the letter of the 13th November is one of great constitutional importance, and also one of considerable difficulty.

We have, however, come to the conclusion, after carefully considering the problem, that the view expressed by Lord Hewart is the true one, and that the opinion expressed in paragraph 5 of our Report of the 21st July should be altered accordingly.

The relevant words occur in Article 2 of the Treaty that "the law, practice and constitutional usage governing the relationship of the Crown, or the representative of the Crown, and of the Imperial Parliament to the Dominion of Canada shall govern their relationship to the Irish Free State." It is of the essence of the British Constitution that the practice and constitutional usage governing the relationship of Great Britain to the self-governing Dominions are growing and developing from year to year; and at first sight it seems very startling to hold that in the case of Southern Ireland the practice and constitutional usage are stereotyped as if existing on a particular date, while with the rest of the Empire they are constantly altering.

We think, however, that the answer to this difficulty is to be found in the reflection that although the Treaty gives to Southern Ireland the practice and constitutional usage as existing between Great Britain and Canada at the date of the Treaty, there is nothing to prevent the development from time to time of that practice and constitutional usage in the same way as it has developed in the past, and will no doubt develop in the future, between Great Britain and the other self-governing Dominions.

The contrary view as to the construction of the Article would involve the difficulty that in theory at least Canada might hereafter surrender some of her present rights of self-government, and that it is very improbable that Southern Ireland can have agreed that her rights should depend upon arrangements made in the future between Great Britain and Canada with regard to which she might not be consulted at all.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
December 31, 1923.

GERMANY.

[C 2266/313/18/1923]

No. 2.

[February 3, 1923.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 31, 1923.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request the favour of your immediate observations on the following matter:—

Withdrawal of
British troops from
Rhine
Territories:
Effect.

1. Article 428 of the Treaty of Versailles provides that, "as a guarantee for the execution of the present treaty by Germany, the German territory situated to the west of the Rhine, together with the bridgeheads, will be occupied by Allied and Associated troops for a period of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present treaty.

It will be noticed that this article provides only for an occupation by "Allied and Associated troops," and makes no specific mention of British troops.

Articles 429 and 431 enumerate the conditions under which the occupation may in certain circumstances be restricted in extent and duration. Article 430 lays down the circumstances in which any part of the occupied territory which has been evacuated may be reoccupied.

Article 432 provides that "all matters relating to the occupation and not provided for by the present treaty shall be regulated by subsequent agreements which Germany hereby undertakes to observe."

2. The only relevant agreement of this nature is the "agreement with regard to the military occupation of the territories of the Rhine," signed by representatives of the United States, Belgium, the British Empire, France and Germany on the 28th June, 1919. Article 1 of this agreement provides that "in accordance with article 428 and the following articles of the treaty of even date, the armed forces of the Allied and Associated Powers will continue in occupation of German territory (as such occupation is defined by article 5 of the Armistice Convention of the 11th November, 1918, as extended by article 7 of the additional convention of the 16th January, 1919) as a guarantee of the execution by Germany of the treaty." Article 2 of this agreement provides that "there shall be constituted a civilian body, styled the Inter-Allied Rhineland High Commission, which, except in so far as the treaty may otherwise provide, shall be the supreme representative of the Allied and Associated Powers within the occupied territory. It shall consist of four members, representing Belgium, France, Great Britain and the United States." Articles 3 and 5 of this agreement provide that "the High Commission shall have the power to issue ordinances so far as may be necessary for securing the maintenance, safety and requirements of the Allied and Associated forces." These ordinances are to "have the force of law," and are to be "recognised as such by all the Allied and Associated military authorities and by the German civil authorities." The civil administration of the occupied areas is to "remain in the hands of the German authorities," and to "continue under German law and under the authority of the Central German Government, except in so far as it may be necessary for the High Commission by ordinance to adapt that administration to the needs and circumstances of military occupation."

3. Owing to the situation which has arisen in the territories occupied under article 428 of the Treaty of Versailles and under the Rhineland Agreement, as a result of the independent action taken by the French and Belgian Governments against Germany, it may become necessary for His Majesty's Government at short notice to weigh the arguments for and against the retention in these territories of the British army of occupation and of the British member of the Rhineland High Commission.

4. In these circumstances your opinion is requested on the following points:—

- (1) In view of the wording of article 428, referred to above, would the withdrawal of the British troops involve a breach of any obligations accepted by His Majesty's Government under that article and under article 1 of the Rhineland Agreement?
- (2) Would the withdrawal of the British member of the Rhineland High Commission involve a breach by His Majesty's Government of article 2 of the Rhineland Agreement?
- (3) Would the withdrawal of the British member of the Rhineland High Commission affect the validity of the Rhineland Agreement as between Germany on the one hand, and France and Belgium on the other?

5. I am also to invite the favour of your observations on any matter which arises generally in the consideration of these questions.

6. Copies of the Treaty of Versailles and of the Rhineland Agreement are enclosed for your information and guidance.

I have, &c.

MILES W. LAMPSON.

[11557]

Report.

IN our opinion the withdrawal of the British troops from the territories of the Rhine would not form a breach of any obligation accepted by His Majesty's Government under the Treaty of Versailles or under the Rhineland Agreement of the 28th June, 1919. The treaty and the agreement gave to the Allied and Associated Powers the right to occupy certain German territory; they did not impose upon any of the Powers an obligation to continue occupation unless they so desired.

2. In our opinion the withdrawal of the British member of the Rhineland High Commission would not involve a breach by His Majesty's Government of article 2 of the Rhineland Agreement. That agreement was not an agreement of the four Allied Powers inter se, but was an agreement between the four Powers jointly on the one hand and Germany on the other. Article 2 and the following articles amount to a grant by Germany of certain defined powers to the body called the Inter-Allied Rhineland High Commission, and article 2 defines the composition of that body. In our opinion there is no obligation on the part of the four Powers to set up the commission or to continue its existence.

3. The withdrawal of the British member of the Rhineland High Commission would not affect the validity of the Rhineland Agreement, but it would destroy the existence of the Inter-Allied Rhineland High Commission. The result would be that there would no longer be any right under the agreement to issue ordinances, since the only body that can issue such ordinances is the High Commission, and that body will no longer exist. It would not be competent to the representatives of France and Belgium under the agreement to issue ordinances authorised by article 3, since they are not the High Commission, which must, by virtue of article 2, consist of the four members representing the four Allied Powers.

4. Ordinances already issued by the High Commission would not be invalidated by the withdrawal of the British commissioner.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
February 3, 1923.

[C 4535/313/18/1923]

No. 3.

[April 11, 1923.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 4, 1923.

Validity
under Treaty of Versailles,
1919, of Franco-Belgian advance into the Ruhr.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you herewith certain papers connected with the French and Belgian advance into the Ruhr, as it seems to his Lordship necessary that the validity of this action on the part of these two Governments and the question whether their action can be reconciled with the Treaty of Versailles should now be considered.

2. On the 23rd February the German Ambassador in London handed to Lord Curzon a lengthy note (Paper (A)) regarding the illegality of the action of the French and Belgian Governments. It is understood that copies of this note were handed to all the Allied Governments. On the 9th March the French Government transmitted to the British Embassy in Paris a memorandum in answer to the German note (Paper (B)).

3. The German note (Paper (A)) deals not only with the legality of the advance into the Ruhr by France and Belgium, but also with the action taken by those Governments within the territory which they have occupied. Questions relating to such action within the Ruhr will, if necessary, be made the subject of a separate reference at a later date. At the present stage your advice is sought only with regard to the questions of the right of one or more of the Allied Governments to take independent action in the nature of a further occupation of German territory and of the right of France and Belgium to take such action in this specific case.

4. The first section of the German note raises three points, of which the first is less important than the others. It is that the decision taken by the French and Belgian Governments and notified to the German Government on the 10th January (see Paper (D)) that they had decided to march into the Ruhr was based on the default declared by the Reparation Commission as having been committed by Germany in the execution of the Reparation Commission's programme for the delivery of timber and coal to France. The note of the Reparation Commission, however, in which this programme was embodied, dated the 21st March, 1922, contained a statement (see concluding paragraph of section 1 of Reparation Commission's note of the 21st March, 1922, p. 57 of 11968—Paper (C)) that any failure on the part of Germany to fulfil these deliveries would entail the payment of additional sums in cash by Germany by the end of 1922 in lieu of the deliveries in kind. The Germans therefore maintain that default on the part of Germany to make the deliveries in accordance with the programme could not justify the application of coercive measures in the form of an occupation of territory, but should be limited to the exaction of sums of money in cash.

5. The French reply on this point is that, as on the 12th July, 1922 (see p. 76 of 11968—Paper (C)), Germany had asked for a moratorium in respect of all cash payments throughout the year 1922, and had made a further application on the 14th November, 1922 (see p. 40 of 12071—Paper (E)), for a moratorium for 1923 and 1924, it was obvious that Germany could not make the further cash payments contemplated in the concluding sentences of the Reparation Commission's decision of the 21st March, 1922, and the Allied Governments were, therefore, entitled to resort to such measures of coercion as the Treaty of Versailles contemplated.

6. The second point raised in the first section of the German note is that even if Germany defaulted in timber and coal deliveries to such extent as to bring into operation paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to the Reparation Section of the treaty, the occupation of further German territory would not be justified.

7. The German argument is set out on p. 2 of the printed memorandum (Paper (A)), and is, put briefly, that in view of the provisions of Part XIV of the treaty, and particularly of article 430, it is clear that paragraph 18 of the annex cannot have contemplated occupation of territory as one of the "other measures which the respective Governments might determine to be necessary in the circumstances."

8. The French reply on this point is very concise. It is that on two occasions the Allied Powers informed the German Government that in certain events the Allies would proceed to a further occupation of German territory, and that the Germans did not protest.

9. This statement in the French note is true, but it may be well to explain the circumstances in which these notifications were made to the Germans.

10. The first notification was contained in article 7 of the Spa Coal Protocol of the 16th July, 1920, of which the text will be found on p. 7 of Paper (F) (12030). The circumstances in which this coal agreement was signed were that Germany was falling seriously into default with her coal deliveries at that time, and was alleging that the principal cause was the shortage of food in the mining districts which rendered it impossible for the miners to work up to their proper capacity. Accordingly, the Allied Powers agreed to make certain advances to the German Government for food for the miners, and the German Government undertook to make increased coal deliveries. Germany was a party to this agreement and, therefore, accepted the provisions of article 7.

11. The second occasion was in article (d) of the Allied ultimatum of the 5th May, 1921 (see p. 1 of 11968—Paper (C)). Upon this occasion the German Government did not, as in the case of the Spa Coal Protocol, formally accept the Allied threat to occupy the Ruhr (see German Ambassador to Mr. Lloyd George, 11th May, 1921, p. 8 of 11968—Paper (C)). Lord Curzon, however, is advised that failure to protest against the inclusion of the provisions about the occupation of the Ruhr in the above two agreements cannot be treated as an admission on Germany's part that mere failure to carry out a reparation obligation under the Treaty of Versailles justifies an occupation of German territory outside the Rhineland.

12. The view hitherto acted upon by this Department is that as the occupation of German territory provided for in Part XIV of the Treaty of Versailles as a guarantee of the execution of the treaty was a joint occupation, and as article 430 provides that a refusal on the part of Germany to observe any part of the reparation obligations justifies only the reoccupation by the Allies as a joint operation of territory evacuated under article 429, a failure on the part of Germany to observe her reparation obligations could not justify an individual Allied Power in proceeding to the independent occupation of German territory outside those parts specified in Part XIV of the treaty. This view is confirmed by the opinion given by the Solicitor-General on the 28th December, 1922 (Paper (M)). Stress has not, however, been laid upon this construction of the treaty for the reason that His Majesty's Government when raising objection to the French advance upon Frankfurt in 1920, did so not on the ground that it was contrary to the treaty (see Papers Nos. 61 and 64, pp. 41 and 46 of 11957—Paper (G)), but merely on the ground that it was a violation of M. Millerand's promise that no such action should be taken by the French, except in co-operation with the other Allies. (It should be recorded in passing that the recent Franco-Belgian independent action in the Ruhr and Rhineland is an even more glaring breach of this promise.) Similarly, when the towns of Ruhrort, Duisburg and Düsseldorf were occupied, towns which still remain in Allied occupation, Great Britain was herself a party to the occupation (see pp. 26 and 27 of 11956, Paper (H)), and Lord Curzon's advisers have always assumed that at the time when such occupation was acquiesced in by His Majesty's Government the question whether such occupation was compatible with article 430 was not considered.

[11557]

c 2

13. The third point raised in section 1 of the German note is that the non-fulfilment by Germany of her reparation obligations cannot give rise on the part of the Allies to measures of coercion which are out of all proportion in their severity to the extent of the German default. The French answer to this point is to deny the allegation that the German default is only modest in extent, and to lay stress on the general failure of Germany to carry out the reparation obligations in the treaty, and maintains in addition that, in any case, on the 26th January of this year the Reparation Commission declared Germany's default to be general (see Paper (J)).

14. The fourth point raised by the German note is that paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Section VIII of the Treaty of Versailles do not justify separate action by individual Allied Governments. The French answer on this point consists very largely of a reference to the action taken by His Majesty's Government on the 29th October, 1920, as indicating the right of Allied Governments to act independently in matters relating to reparations (see p. 2 (b) of Foreign Office memorandum of the 10th January, 1922—Paper (K)).

15. The action taken by His Majesty's Government at that time consisted in announcing that if the contingency arose of action being required under paragraph 18, they would not attempt to seize property acquired by German nationals in the United Kingdom after the coming into force of the treaty. It will be remembered that under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles a charge on all property in Allied territory belonging to German nationals at the date of the coming into force of the Treaty of Peace was imposed for certain purposes, the property being made available for the payment of German debts owing to Allied nationals and of certain claims arising out of the injury to Allied property in Germany during the war owing to the war measures of the German Government. It was for the purpose of encouraging trade that His Majesty's Government decided to make the above announcement. They did so without previous consultation with the Allies. From this incident, the French note argues that as Germany made no protest against the British announcement, she thereby accepted the view that the Allied Governments were entitled to take individual action.

16. The Foreign Office have hitherto acted upon the assumption that the word "respective" in paragraph 18 indicated that the action to be taken under that paragraph was action by the individual Government and was to be taken in the discretion of each such Government. It will be noticed that in paragraph 17 the Reparation Commission is to give notice of default to each of the interested Powers, and paragraph 18 provides that the measures which the Allied and Associated Powers have the right to take may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary. The appendix to Paper (L) contains a memorandum by the legal adviser to this department, dated June 1922, giving what he believes to be the proper interpretation of these provisions, an interpretation on which the Foreign Office had since that date acted. In his opinion the presence of the word "respective" showed that action must be taken by the individual Governments, but the fact that it was to be taken by individual Governments itself curtailed the type of action which was legitimate.

17. In any case the Foreign Office have always held that in this matter the final decision respecting the interpretation of the treaty rested with the Reparation Commission, who, under paragraph 12 of Annex II, to the reparation clauses, were specially entrusted with the duty of interpreting them. In this view the Foreign Office were confirmed by the opinion given by the Solicitor-General on the 28th December, 1922 (Paper (M)). In the light, however, of the further considerations advanced since that date by the legal adviser to the British delegation to the Reparation Commission (Paper (N)), it appears desirable that this point should again be considered.

18. I am accordingly to request that you will favour the Secretary of State with your opinion on the following points:—

- (1.) Whether in view of the terms of the Reparation Commission's note of the 21st March, 1922, Germany is entitled to claim that her default in making the deliveries stipulated therein only justified the exaction of further cash payments.
- (2.) Whether Germany's default in fulfilling her reparation obligations justifies the occupation, under the treaty, of German territory, in addition to that provided for in article 428 of the Treaty of Versailles and in the Rhineland Agreement.
- (3.) Whether, assuming that the answer to (2) is in the affirmative, such further occupation must, under the treaty, be a joint Allied occupation or may be undertaken separately by one or more individual Allied Governments.
- (4.) Whether the absence of any specific protest by the German Government against the terms of article 7 of the Spa Coal Agreement and article 4 of the Allied ultimatum of May 1921 constitutes an admission by Germany that the occupation of further German territory on the part of the Allies is rendered legitimate by a new reparation default.
- (5.) Whether the German contention is well founded that any steps taken by the Allies because of Germany's reparation default must be in proportion to the extent of the default.
- (6.) Whether paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles justify action by individual Allied Governments when the Reparation Commission notify a default.
- (7.) Whether, if such action by an individual Allied Government is legitimate, the action taken must be of the type which individual Governments could take within the limits of their own sovereignty.
- (8.) Whether it is for the Reparation Commission, acting under paragraph 12 of Annex II, to interpret paragraph 18 of that annex.

19. I am to add that any other papers, materials or explanations which you may desire in order to elucidate any of the above points shall be supplied.

20. Lord Curzon would be glad to receive any general observations which you may desire to offer with your answers to the above questions.

21. I am to ask for the favour of an early reply in view of the fact that a debate on the situation in the Ruhr may be expected to take place in the House of Commons very soon after its reassembly on the 10th April.

I have, &c.
MILES W. LAMPSON.

List of Papers.

- (A.) M. Sthamer to Lord Curzon, February 23, 1923. [C 3938/313/18/1923.]
- (B.) Lord Crewe, No. 600, March 10, 1923. [C 4535/313/18/1923.]
- (C.) Confidential No. 11968.
- (D.) Lord Crewe, No. 52, January 10, 1923. [C 572/313/18/1923.]
- (E.) Confidential No. 12071.
- (F.) Confidential No. 12030.
- (G.) Confidential No. 11957.
- (H.) Confidential No. 11956.
- (J.) British Delegation, Reparation Commission, to Treasury, January 27, 1923. [C 1795/1/18/1923.]
- (K.) Memorandum on French pledge respecting separate action against Germany, January 10, 1923. [C 529/529/18/1923.]
- (L.) Memorandum on the Sanctions of March 1921, June 20, 1922. [C 10280/99/18/1922.]
- (M.) Opinion of the Solicitor-General, December 28, 1922.
- (N.) Sir J. Bradbury to Mr. Niemeyer, January 17, 1923. (Extract.)

Report.

1. Our answer to the first question is in the negative. If Germany had made the whole of the cash payments stipulated in the Reparation Commission note of the 21st March, 1922, and had tendered, in addition, cash payments equivalent to the short deliveries in kind made up to the end of September 1922, she might perhaps have claimed that the terms of the note of the 21st March, 1922, had misled her into believing that she was entitled to pay cash instead of making deliveries. But these are not the facts; Germany has already intimated her inability to make the payments in cash required by the Reparation Commission, and it seems to us impossible seriously to contend that she is entitled to make voluntary default in the deliveries in kind and then to claim that she is discharged from all responsibility if she adds to the cash liabilities, which she has already stated she cannot pay, a sum equivalent to these deliveries.

In our opinion, the default in making the deliveries stipulated in the Reparation Commission note of the 1st March, 1922, gives to the Allied and Associated Powers the right to take the measures stipulated in paragraph 18 of Annex II of Part VIII of the treaty.

2. This question raises a point of great difficulty; but we have come to the conclusion that the answer is in the negative. In our opinion the words "economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals" indicate the kind of measures that the paragraph has in view, and the general words following must be interpreted in the light of those words and must be limited to measures of the kind so indicated.

We think that this view is greatly strengthened by the provisions contained in article 430 of the treaty, since it would be idle to stipulate expressly for reoccupation of the occupied territories in event of default if the Allied and Associated Powers had unlimited right of occupation of any German territory already.

3. This question does not arise.

4. The answer to this question is in the negative. The rights of the Allied and Associated Powers depend upon the language of the treaty, and the fact that Germany, when threatened with occupation of part of her territory, did not specifically protest against the threatened action as an infraction of the treaty cannot, in our opinion, give to the Allied and Associated Powers greater rights than the treaty confers.

5. The answer to the fifth question is in the negative. By virtue of paragraph 18 of Annex II it is for the respective Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to determine what measures are necessary in the circumstances. So long as the measures are within the rights conferred by that paragraph Germany has no right to protest; her remedy is to make good her default.

6. This question is again a very difficult one, but we have come to the conclusion that the answer is in the affirmative. It seems to us that the scheme of the annex is for the Reparation Commission to give notice to the interested Powers in the event of default, and for the respective Governments of those Powers to take such measures within paragraph 18 as they may determine to be necessary. We do not think that they must all agree or act in concert. The contrary view would involve that no Government could take any measures of reprisal within the limits of its own sovereignty to redress a voluntary default by Germany unless all the other Governments concurred in its action. The answer to this question fortifies the conclusion at which we have arrived in answer to the second question, since it is difficult to imagine that each separate Government has an independent right to occupy any, or all, of the territory of Germany without regard to the wishes of the other Governments concerned.

7. Our answer to the seventh question is in the affirmative, in the sense that the measures must be limited to those areas over which the Allied Government is exercising sovereignty. We do not regard measures within the area of the German territory occupied under article 428 as outside the limits of paragraph 18.

8. In our opinion the Reparation Commission has authority to interpret paragraph 18 of Annex II by virtue of the provisions of paragraph 12 of that annex. We do not think that it can be compelled to exercise that authority, and any decision to be effective must be unanimous; but we think it is taking too narrow a view of the authority of the commission to limit its powers of interpretation to cases in which it is actually exercising powers of administration.

9. We would point out that the opinion which we have expressed seems to be inconsistent with the arguments of the present Lord Chief Justice in his speech in the House of Commons on the 17th March, 1921; and that it is difficult to reconcile it with the action threatened by Great Britain in conjunction with other Allied Powers in March and May of that year. It would seem, therefore, that an attempt to base any protest upon our view of the meaning of paragraph 18 of the annex would be open to the criticism that we were quite willing to treat the paragraph as having the wider meaning claimed for it so long as we desired ourselves to put pressure on Germany by occupation of territory, and that it is only when we object to another Allied Power taking that course that we set up this limited construction of its meaning.

It would therefore be better, so far as possible, to avoid laying stress upon the legal standpoint, although for the reasons stated we believe it to be sound.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
April 11, 1923.

[C 13098/313/18/1923]

No. 4.

[July 30, 1923.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 12, 1923.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you herewith certain papers connected with Ordinances Nos. 153 and 154 adopted by the Rhineland High Commission on the 15th March, and empowering the High Commission to seize in the occupied Rhineland territory certain material, goods and property due for delivery to the Allied Governments and to Allied nationals on reparation and restitution account and under private contracts.

2. It will be seen from the enclosed correspondence that His Majesty's Government have contested the validity, under the Rhineland Agreement, of the High Commission's action in this matter, and that the French Government, in their note of the 25th May, have claimed that, by reason of the voluntary default notified to the Allied Governments by the Reparation Commission under paragraph 17 of Annex II to the reparation clauses and in virtue of the rights thereby accruing to the Allied Governments under paragraph 18 of that annex, measures justified under paragraph 18 may, in conformity with the treaty, be taken by the High Commission, acting by a majority vote, within the territory occupied under the Rhineland Agreement.

3. With regard to this claim, the following observations appear to be relevant: Paragraph 17 of Annex II to the reparation clauses requires the Reparation Commission to give notice of default to each of the Allied Governments, and under paragraph 18 the measures against Germany are to be decided on and taken by the respective Governments. But the Rhineland Commission is, under the Rhineland Agreement, a joint Allied body representing Belgium, France and Great Britain, and it is only by reason of an Inter-Allied Agreement that it takes decisions by a majority. The logical conclusion to be drawn from the French Government's argument on this point would appear therefore to be that, notice of German default having been given to Great Britain as one of the Powers interested in reparation, France and Belgium would, in the Rhineland, be entitled to take action on behalf of Great Britain, irrespective of whether or not Great Britain concurs.

4. This conclusion seems so contrary to the language of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to the reparation clauses, as well as to that of the Rhineland Agreement, that it appears difficult, if not impossible, to accept it. As, however, it would appear to be, at least to some extent, supported by the second sentence of paragraph 7 of your opinion of the 11th April, wherein it is stated that, measures taken under paragraph 18 having to be limited to areas over which the Allied Government is exercising sovereignty, measures within the area of the German territory occupied under article 428 cannot be regarded as outside the limits of paragraph 18, I am to invite a further examination of this question and to say that the Secretary of State would be grateful for a fuller expression of your views.

5. Lord Curzon desires to add the following observations with regard to this passage in your opinion: In the first place, whilst it is clear that an act taken by the representative of an Allied Government within the Rhineland territory might be within the powers of a sovereign, it does not seem to follow that it would necessarily be within the powers conferred by the Rhineland Agreement upon the Rhineland Commission as representing the three occupying Governments—powers which are limited by article 3 of the Rhineland Agreement to "securing the maintenance, safety and requirements of the Allied and Associated forces." In the second place, the occupation contemplated by article 428 of the treaty (and by the Rhineland Agreement) was a joint occupation, and action by individual Governments in the Rhineland does Interpretation of

Treaty of Versailles:
Paragraphs 17
and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII;
and of the Rhineland Agreement.

GERMANY.

not seem to have been contemplated at all. All action was to be taken by, and in the name of, the Rhineland Commission, which was to be the supreme representative of the Allied and Associated Powers within the occupied territory.

6. I am to request that you will be good enough to favour the Secretary of State with a further expression of opinion on the point whether action not covered by the Rhineland Agreement, but taken within the territory occupied under article 428 of the treaty (and under the Rhineland Agreement), can be held to be within the limits of paragraph 18.

I have, &c.
ALEXANDER CADOGAN.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Lord Kilmarnock to Lord Curzon, No. 121, March 16, 1923 [C 5094/708/18/1923].
- (B.) Lord Kilmarnock to Lord Curzon, No. 123, March 16, 1923 [C 5095/708/18/1923].
- (C.) Lord Curzon to Mr. Phipps (Paris), telegram No. 141, March 23, 1923 [C 5498/313/18/1923].
- (D.) Mr. Phipps (Paris) to Lord Curzon, No. 790, March 28, 1923 [C 5837/313/18/1923].
- (E.) Lord Curzon to Lord Crewe (Paris), No. 1627, May 11, 1923 [C 8035/313/18/1923].
- (F.) Lord Crewe (Paris) to Lord Curzon, No. 1261, May 28, 1923 [C 9404/313/18/1923].
- (G.) Foreign Office to Law Officers, April 4, 1923 [C 4535/313/18/1923].
- (H.) Law Officers to Lord Curzon, April 11, 1923 [C 4535/313/18/1923].
- (I.) Memorandum approved by the Council of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on June 13, 1919.
- (J.) Rhineland Agreement, June 28, 1919.

Report.

1. By virtue of article 428 of the treaty the occupation of the Rhineland by Allied and Associated troops is prescribed as "a guarantee for the execution of the present treaty by Germany." By paragraph 18 of Annex II of the reparation part of the treaty the Allied and Associated Powers have the right to take such measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances, in the case of voluntary default by Germany. It seems to us an undue limitation of the language of the treaty to exclude from paragraph 18 measures taken within the territory which is occupied as guarantee for the execution of the treaty.

2. If the Allied and Associated Powers have the right to take measures in the occupied territory the question arises how such measures are to be taken. This is a question of very great difficulty, because the framers of the treaty do not seem to have contemplated, or provided for, the necessity arising, and we regret that we have not been able to arrive at a joint conclusion. By article 2 of the agreement made pursuant to article 432 of the treaty the High Commission is the supreme representative of the Allied and Associated Powers in the occupied territory.

In the view of the Attorney-General it is the High Commission which, by reason of this article, must take the necessary measures within that territory on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers. By the memorandum of the 13th June, 1919, the Allied and Associated Powers have agreed that the decisions of the High Commission shall be reached by a majority of votes. If, therefore, a majority of those voting on the High Commission carry a resolution, that resolution becomes the decision not of the members voting for it, but of the High Commission itself acting as the supreme representative of the Allied and Associated Powers.

In the view of the Solicitor-General the provisions of article 2 are only applicable when action is necessary to maintain an effective occupation; and the provisions of article 3 which gives the High Commission power to "issue ordinances so far as may be necessary for securing the maintenance, safety and requirements of the Allied and Associated forces," points to the limitation of the powers of the High Commission in these matters. It follows in his view that the decision with regard to measures to be taken under paragraph 18 of Annex II remains with the respective Powers, and therefore that each of the Powers can take such measures as are authorised by that paragraph in any part of the occupied territory.

Our joint view is that when voluntary default has been declared by the Reparation Commission the Allied and Associated Powers may take such measures as are contemplated by paragraph 18 of Annex II in the occupied territory. We differ as to whether these powers have to be exercised by a majority decision of the High

GERMANY.

Commission or by each occupying Power according to its own discretion. In view of the fact that the majority of the High Commission represents the same two Powers as desire to put in force the provisions of paragraph 18, the difference between us is probably not material in existing circumstances.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
July 30, 1923.

PALESTINE.

[E 825/825/65/1923]

No. 4^A.

[Colonial Office]

[January 3, 1923.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, October 27, 1922.

I AM directed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to refer to the Report of your predecessors in office of the 18th February, 1921,* addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (a copy of which is enclosed for convenience of reference), on the question of the possibility of extending to Palestine the privileges of Imperial preference, and to transmit to you herewith a copy of a despatch on the subject which has been received from the Officer Administering the Government of Palestine, in which he requests that this matter may be reconsidered.

2. In this connection I am to invite your attention to the letter from this Department of the 14th July (33068/1922), transmitting, for your consideration, draft instruments designed to provide for the establishment of a constitutional Government in Palestine.

3. From these documents, and also from the Mandate for Palestine as approved by the Council of the League of Nations, a copy of which accompanies this letter, there appears to the Secretary of State to be some force in the argument that, as the terms of the Mandate provide for the exercise by Great Britain of full powers of legislation and of administration in Palestine, and as the provisional recognition of that country as an independent State or foreign country is not contemplated, the status of Palestine would not seem to be that of a foreign country. In the Mandate as approved the reference which appeared in article 1 of the draft to the exercise by the mandatory of all the powers inherent in the Government of a sovereign State, save as limited by the Mandate, has been excised, but the words substituted in article 1 do not appear to the Secretary of State materially to weaken the force of this argument.

4. I am, therefore, to request you to give this question your further consideration and to be good enough to report whether you adhere to the previous opinion expressed in the report of your predecessors in office to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or whether, in view of the terms of the draft Mandate for Palestine and of the nature of the Constitution designed for that country, you consider that it would be possible for this country, and any of the dominions, colonies and protectorates that may so desire, to extend to Palestine, either in part or in whole, the preference to certain goods consigned from and grown, produced or manufactured in the British Empire, without infringing the obligations arising from the "most-favoured-nation" clause of commercial treaties.

5. I am to remind you that the question of Imperial preference in connection with the territories administered in the "B" and "C" Mandates was submitted to your predecessors in office in 1921, and copies of the letter from this Department of the 22nd August and of their report of the 21st September† are enclosed for convenience of reference.

I am, &c.
(For the Under-Secretary of State),
H. YOUNG.

* Confidential 11933, p. 35.

† Confidential 11933, p. 30.

PALESTINE.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Law Officers to Foreign Office, February 18, 1921 [Confidential 11933, p. 35].
 (B.) Officer Administering Government of Palestine to Colonial Office, June 14, 1922.
 (C.) Mandate for Palestine.
 (D.) Colonial Office to Law Officers, August 22, 1921 [Confidential 11933, p. 30].
 (E.) Law Officers to Colonial Office, September 21, 1921 [Confidential 11933, p. 30].

Report.

We adhere to the previous opinion expressed in the Report of our predecessors in office to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Palestine is clearly one of the communities referred to in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. It may be open to argument whether the Mandate, as approved by the Council of the League, and the Constitution of Palestine provided for by the Palestine Order in Council, give full effect to the status contemplated by the fourth paragraph of article 22. But we are of opinion that the position of Palestine both under the Mandate and the Order in Council is not so closely assimilated to that of a territory under British sovereignty as to enable Imperial preference to be extended to Palestine without infringing the obligations arising from the "most-favoured-nation" clause of commercial treaties.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
 T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
January 3, 1923.

RUSSIA.

[N 7790/550/38/1923]

No. 5.

[September 19, 1923]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 23, 1923.

Immunity of Soviet official agents from processes of British
 courts.

I HAVE the honour to transmit herewith, for your consideration, a copy of a memorandum (Paper A) from the Russian trade delegation, suggesting that a letter should be furnished to the official agent of the Soviet Government in this country to the effect that, in the view of His Majesty's Government, he is a person entitled to immunity from the processes of the British courts. The previous history of this question is as follows:—

2. In July 1920 Messrs. Bull and Bull addressed the Foreign Office, on the instructions of M. L. Krassin, in connection with proceedings instituted against him by Mr. Maxim Kogan. A reply was returned on the 26th July, 1920, and contains the following passage:—

"Whether M. Krassin is a public Minister of the foreign State of Russia within the meaning of the Diplomatic Privileges Act of 1703 depends on the interpretation of that statute, and is not a question upon which Lord Curzon feels able to express an opinion, but his Lordship regards M. Krassin as a foreign representative, who should, in view of the privileges which have been granted to him for the purpose of the negotiations with which he is charged, be exempt from the processes of the courts."

The proceedings did not, however, as far as is known, finally come before the courts.

3. In November 1920 Messrs. H. W. and S. Patey consulted the Foreign Office in connection with the intention of clients of theirs to subpoena M. Krassin to give evidence in impending litigation. A reply was returned on the 20th November in a sense similar to the letter addressed to Messrs. Bull and Bull.

4. On the 19th November, 1920, Messrs. Linklaters and Paines addressed the Foreign Office in connection with the impending case of Luther v. Sagor, and requested various information relative to the status of the Russian trade delegation and of M. Krassin. The Secretary of State consulted the then Attorney-General, before whom a statement of the position was laid. This statement (in which copies of the correspondence referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above will be found), with Sir Gordon Hewart's opinion,* is enclosed (Paper B), together with a copy of the reply returned to Messrs. Linklaters and Paines in accordance with the recommendations of the Attorney-General (Paper C). In consequence of the view expressed by the Attorney-General, the reply addressed to Messrs. Linklaters and Paines was couched in more guarded terms than the previous letters to Messrs. Bull and Bull and to Messrs. H. W. and S. Patey. The letter states that—

"for a certain limited purpose His Majesty's Government has regarded M. Krassin as exempt from the processes of the courts."

5. You will observe that the above incidents occurred before the signature of the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement, and that at that time M. Krassin's position depended on the conditions under which he had come to this country, as explained in the first paragraph of the statement submitted to Sir G. Hewart (Paper B).

6. When the question next came before the courts the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement (Paper F) had been signed (the 16th March, 1921), and His Majesty's Government had thereby extended de facto recognition to the Soviet Government. This case was an action brought by the Fenton Textile Association against M. Krassin and others. A conditional appearance to the writ was entered by M. Krassin on the 17th July, 1921, and he then applied to the Master in Chambers for an order setting aside service of the writ on him, on the ground that he was the authorised representative of a foreign State and was entitled as such to immunity from process of the courts. On the 28th July the master made an order that the service of the writ be set aside. The plaintiff appealed to the Judge in Chambers, and on the 2nd August Mr. Justice Branson made an order allowing the appeal and extending the notice for the conditional appearance until the hearing of the appeal. An appeal was brought against Mr. Justice Branson's decision, and Lord Justice Bankes wrote to the Foreign office on the 25th October a letter (Paper D) containing various enquiries, and a reply (Paper E) was returned to his Lordship on the 7th November. This reply which was submitted to the then Attorney-General, was based on a Cabinet decision that the reply was to set out the facts without any specific attitude being adopted with regard to the question whether or not M. Krassin was entitled to immunity from the process of the courts. In giving judgment the Court of Appeal held that the position of M. Krassin was the peculiar one of official agent as defined in the Trade Agreement, and pointed out that, while the agreement provided for immunity from arrest and search, it did not provide for immunity from civil processes. Judgment was accordingly given against M. Krassin; the case is reported in XXXVIII "Times Law Reports," at p. 259.

7. In view of the decision in the Fenton Textile Association case, since which date nothing has occurred to modify the position in this respect of the Russian trade delegation or the official agent of the Soviet Government in this country, the Secretary of State is advised that it would not be proper for the Foreign Office to furnish the Russian trade delegation with such a letter as is requested, and even if this were to be done, it seems very doubtful whether the courts would attach any weight to the letter, in the absence of any information that the circumstances had changed.

8. There is, however, one practical consideration which has to be taken into account. This arises on the last paragraph of the Russian trade delegation memorandum of the 6th July, where it is pointed out that whatever attitude is adopted by His Majesty's Government in this country, similar treatment will be accorded by the Soviet Government to the British agent in Moscow. The conditions in Russia at the present day are, of course, widely different from those which prevail in this country, and though it seems unlikely that the British agent in Moscow would ever be involved in legal proceedings in Russia, considerable inconvenience is likely to result if he is to be held liable to the process of the Russian courts, and his position in the event of his being obliged to appear before the Soviet courts might become exceedingly difficult.

9. There is also a further point as to which his Lordship would be grateful for your advice, although it does not immediately arise on the present communication from the Russian trade delegation. Under paragraph 5 of the Trade Agreement

* Confidential, 11810, p. 66.

(Paper F) the official agents appointed in accordance with that paragraph are to enjoy immunity from arrest and search. The Secretary of State has some doubts whether, in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal referred to above, it will be possible without legislation to ensure to the Russian official agents such immunity from arrest and search, at any rate in the case where the law was set in motion by a private prosecutor. On the other hand, you will observe that in his judgment Lord Justice Bankes pointed out that in the Trade Agreement immunity from arrest and search is provided for, although immunity from civil process is not, and did not suggest that there would be any difficulty as to conferring the former immunity on M. Krassin.

10. In these circumstances his Lordship would be grateful if you would take the annexed papers into your consideration and favour him with your opinion on the following questions:—

- (1.) As to the nature of the reply which should be returned to the memorandum from the Russian trade delegation of the 6th July, 1923.
- (2.) As to the position of the Russian official agents appointed under the Trade Agreement in relation to the immunity from arrest and search provided for by that document, and as to the steps, if any, which, in your opinion, could and should be taken to ensure such immunity.

11. His Lordship would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.
ESMOND OVEY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Russian Trade Delegation to Foreign Office, July 6, 1923. [N 6285/550/38/1923.]
 (B.) Confidential No. 11810. No. 9.
 (C.) Foreign Office to Messrs. Linklaters and Paines, November 27, 1920. [N 2852/2852/38/1920.]
 (D.) Lord Justice Bankes to Foreign Office, October 25, 1921. [N 12333/216/38/1921.]
 (E.) Foreign Office to Lord Justice Bankes, November 7, 1921. [N 12333/216/38/1921.]
 (F.) Trade Agreement with Russian Soviet Republic, March 16, 1921. [Cmd. 1207.]

Report.

1. In our opinion it would be improper, and, indeed, impossible, for the Foreign Office to give such a letter as the Russian trade delegation request, so long as the position of the Soviet official agent remains unchanged. It is for the Foreign Office to certify what is the character in which the agent of a foreign Government comes into this country; it is for the courts to determine what immunity the law of England confers upon a person filling that character. In the present case a certificate was given by the Foreign Office in the Fenton Textile Association litigation; and the courts have determined that a person in this country under the circumstances described in that certificate is not entitled to the immunity which the Russian trade delegation require. It is not suggested that there has been any change in the position occupied by the Soviet official agent since that decision was given; and, therefore, the Foreign Office is really being asked to certify that the court was wrong in law in the conclusion which it reached. This the Foreign Office has no power to do. It is perfectly open to the Foreign Office to negotiate a change in the position of the Soviet official agent of such a character as to constitute him the public minister of a foreign Government, or such a diplomatic representative as to be entitled to full diplomatic privileges; but we do not gather that it is desired to embark upon such a negotiation. Unless and until this is done, in our opinion the Foreign Office should reply that by English law the question of the extent of the immunity enjoyed by any person in this country is a matter within the exclusive competence of the English courts; that the Foreign Office is advised that it has no power to overrule the decision already arrived at in regard to the official agents of the Soviet Government; and that in view of that decision, such a letter as is suggested would not have any operative effect.

2. In the Fenton Textile Association case, both Bankes and Scrutton L.J.J. treated it as clear that the official agent of the Soviet Government did have the immunity which the Trade Agreement stipulates. Atkin L.J. is less definite; but he seems to suggest at the end of his judgment that the true view may be that this agent is really a representative of a foreign Government who would, in the absence of express agreement, have been entitled to complete immunity at common law, but with regard to whom the Soviet Government had by the Trade Agreement given up any claim to immunity beyond that provided by the agreement. We think that the matter is one of some obscurity and doubt; but that in all probability the courts would uphold the claim to such immunity as is conferred by the Trade Agreement, on some such ground as is suggested by Atkin L.J. If the immunity were successfully challenged, it could be established either by legislation, or by the recognition of the official agent by His Majesty's Government as the diplomatic representative of a de facto Government. We do not advise any action being taken at present.

3. We have nothing to add to the observations set out in our answer to the first question.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
September 19, 1923.

TURKEY.

[E 708/175/44/1924]

No. 5^A.

[Board of Trade.]

[December 27, 1923.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

A QUESTION has arisen upon which it is desired to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Simonds with regard to the disposal of certain German and Austrian funds sequestered in Constantinople by the authority of the Allied Governments. One of these funds consisted of the sum of 590,000 gold francs, the property of three ex-enemy banks—namely, the Deutsche Bank, the Deutsche Orient Bank and the Wiener Bankverein. This fund was sequestered during the year 1919, and, along with other sequestered funds, was transferred to France early in the present year and there deposited in the Banque de France in the joint names of the Allied Governments.

The question which has now arisen and upon which it is desired to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers is whether the particular sum referred to in this case is or is not subject to the charge created under the provisions of article 297 (e) of the Treaty of Versailles, so far as it is the property of the German banks, and article 249 (e) of the Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye, so far as it is the property of the Austrian bank. It has been suggested by the French Government that the sum should be paid to the Allied Clearing Offices in accordance with the provisions of the treaties referred to as being the property of German and/or Austrian nationals under the "control of the claimant's State" (see article 297 (e)), and as such charged with the payment of compensation under that article, leaving it to the directors of the various Allied Clearing Offices to decide upon the manner in which the amount is to be divided between the different Clearing Offices.

The view taken by the British Clearing Office was that the fund, so far as it could be shown to be the property of the two German banks, comes within the express words of article 297 (e) of the Treaty of Versailles and within article 249 (e) of the Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye so far as it could be shown to be the property of the Austrian bank—namely, "the property of German nationals" (or nationals of the former Austrian Empire) under the control of the claimant's State, and as such is charged with the payment of compensation under that article. It is true that the fund is not within the more limited description of property referred to in paragraph 4 of the Annex to Section IV of Part X of each of the treaties and is not, therefore, subject to the general charge which may be imposed under the permissive provisions of that paragraph, but that would not, in the view of the British Clearing Office, exclude the claims for compensation from the additional benefits accorded to them under the articles in question. This view was supported by an opinion of the Law Officers and the late Mr. Austen Cartmell dated the 24th December, 1920, when they were advising the

Disposal of German and Austrian funds sequestered
in Constantinople by Allied Powers.

Board of Trade as to the validity of the China Order in Council, so far as it purported to charge the property of German nationals in China. Whilst being of the opinion that the Order in Council was ultra vires so far as it purported to charge enemy property in China with the payment of debts due to British nationals, they gave it as their opinion that the Order was intra vires so far as it related to claims for compensation referred to in article 297 (e) of the treaty and so far as the property in question was under the control of Great Britain at the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

It is questionable whether the fund in this case can properly be described as having been at the date of seizure "under the control of the claimant's State." The seizure took place during the period of the armistice when Constantinople was in the joint occupation of the Allied Powers, and from that time onwards the fund has been under their joint control. The fact that it is recognised that the other Allied Powers have just as much right as Great Britain to be heard on the question of the division of the fund (if such a right exists at all) favours the contention that it was not "under the control of the claimant's State."

It is necessary to call the attention of the Law Officers to article 72 (Section III, Economic Clauses) of the Treaty of Lausanne, which is as follows:—

"In the territories which remain Turkish by virtue of the present treaty, property, rights and interests belonging to Germany, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria or to their nationals, which before the coming into force of the present treaty have been seized or occupied by the Allied Governments shall remain in the possession of these Governments until the conclusion of arrangements between them and the German, Austrian, Hungarian and Bulgarian Governments or their nationals who are concerned. If the above-mentioned property, rights and interests have been liquidated, such liquidation is confirmed.

"In the territories detached from Turkey under the present treaty, the Governments exercising authority there shall have power, within one year from the coming into force of the present treaty, to liquidate the property, rights and interests belonging to Germany, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria or to their nationals.

"The proceeds of liquidations, whether they have already been carried out or not, shall be paid to the Reparation Commission established by the Treaty of Peace concluded with the States concerned, if the property liquidated belongs to the German, Austrian, Hungarian or Bulgarian State. In the case of liquidation of private property, the proceeds of liquidation shall be paid to the owners direct.

"The provisions of this article do not apply to Ottoman limited companies.

"The Turkish Government shall be in no way responsible for the measures referred to in the present treaty."

This article would appear to raise a somewhat difficult question with regard to the money question.

If the money is to be regarded in the light of property belonging to German and Austrian nationals seized by the Allied Governments before the coming into force of the treaty, it is to remain in the possession of these Governments until the conclusion of arrangements made between them and the German and Austrian Governments or their nationals who are concerned. If, on the other hand, what has been done is to be regarded as liquidation of private property, then, according to paragraph 3 of the article, proceeds of liquidation are to be paid to the owners direct, assuming that this paragraph applies to all liquidations referred to in the article and not merely to the liquidations mentioned in the second paragraph.

The Law Officers are also referred to article 137 of the Lausanne Treaty, which is of a more general nature, but which provides that "decisions taken and orders issued between the armistice and the coming into force of the treaty by or in agreement with the authorities of the Powers who have occupied Constantinople, concerning the property, rights and interests of . . . foreigners or of Turkish nationals . . . shall be regarded as definitive, and shall give rise to no claim against these Powers or their authorities."

The Law Officers and Mr. Gavin Simonds are therefore requested to advise whether, in their opinion, the particular funds referred to in the case are subject to the respective charges made under the Treaties of Versailles and Saint-Germain, having regard to the circumstances in which they were sequestered and to the provisions of article 72 of the Treaty of Lausanne, assuming that the last-mentioned treaty will be ratified at an early date.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

In our opinion, the fund of 590,000 gold francs which belonged to three ex-enemy banks and was sequestered in Constantinople in the year 1919 was at the date of the coming into force of the Treaties of Versailles and Saint-Germain-en-Laye "property under the control of the claimant's State" within the meaning of article 297 (e) and article 249 (c) of those treaties respectively. It was, in fact, under the control of two or more of the Allied Powers, but it would, we think, be an unreasonable construction of the relevant articles to exclude German property from the operation of the charge thereby authorised because it was under the control not of one State but of several States. The Allied Powers which are interested have, we think, the right to determine how the benefit of the charge should be apportioned as between their respective nationals.

Article 72 of the Treaty of Lausanne is not easy to reconcile with article 25 (by which Turkey undertakes to recognise the full force of the treaties concluded by the Allied Powers with the Powers who fought on the side of Turkey) and with article 137, to the terms of which we are referred. For, whatever may be its true construction, it appears to have the effect, in some cases at least, of agreeing with Turkey to restore to (e.g.) German nationals property or proceeds of liquidation of property which, under the Treaty of Versailles, remained in the disposition of the Allied Powers. It is, we think, open to doubt whether article 72 has any operation in regard to enemy property removed before the coming into force of the treaty from the territories that remain Turkish; but, in any event, we think that a fund removed in specie from Constantinople cannot be regarded as "proceeds of liquidation" of enemy property rights or interests, and that, if any obligation is imposed on the Allied Powers by article 72 in respect of this fund, it is that they must remain in possession of it until the conclusion of the arrangements contemplated by the article.

Having regard to the fact that by the relevant treaties which bind Germany and Austria and their respective nationals the property of such nationals is made subject to the charge, we think that the Allied Powers are entitled to act upon the footing that, whatever arrangements may have to be made in respect of property which, remaining in Turkey, remains subject to Turkish jurisdiction, no further arrangement is necessary in regard to property which has already been removed from Turkey and is in all respects within the control of the Allied Powers, and to assume that such property remains subject to the charge.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.
GAVIN T. SIMONDS.

*Law Officers' Department,
December 27, 1923.*

1924

This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

(12786)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1924.

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked I^a, &c.

EGYPT.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	Aug. 14, 1924	Liquidation of Austrian and German property in Egypt	1
2	Lord Chancellor ..	Oct. 1,	The Sudan question and the League of Nations ..	4
3	Lord Chancellor ..	Nov. 2,	Egypt and the League of Nations	16
4	Lord Chancellor ..	Nov. 17,	Egypt and the League of Nations	17

GENERAL.

4 ^a	Law Officers and Mr. C. W. Lilley [Ministry of Labour]	Apr. 3, 1924	International Labour Conventions: interpretation of article 421 of the Treaty of Versailles, 1919 ..	19
4 ^b	Law Officers and Mr. C. W. Lilley [Ministry of Labour]	June 2,	International Labour Conventions: obligations under the Treaty of Versailles, Part XIII, Labour Clauses	22
5	Lord Chancellor ..	June 24,	Transmission of information to judges of High Court in cases affecting the rights of foreign Governments	26
5 ^a	Law Officers .. [Home Office]	July 8,	Resumption of British nationality under "British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914" ..	28
6	Lord Chancellor ..	July 21,	Compulsory acceptance of jurisdiction of Permanent Court of International Justice.	30
6 ^a	Law Officers, Mr. G. W. Ricketts and Mr. H. M. Giveen [War Office]	Nov. 21,	Official Secrets Acts, 1911 and 1920: supply of munitions to foreign Governments	45

GERMANY.

6 ^b	Law Officers and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds [Clearing Office (Enemy Debts)]	Apr. 3, 1924	Claims under article 296 of the Treaty of Versailles by German nationals against British nationals for the price of goods sold and delivered which, after the property in the goods had passed, were seized and condemned in prize	47
7	Law Officers ..	May 27,	Interpretation of Treaty of Versailles: paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII; and of the Rhineland Agreement	50

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1924.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ALI—GOV.

A.

Aliens: resumption of British nationality under "British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," 28-30.
"Argo," 47.
Arms: Official Secrets Acts, 1911 and 1920, and supply of, to foreign Governments, 45-47.
Assurantie Compagnie Excelsior v. Tom Smith, 26.
Austria: liquidation of Austrian property in Egypt, 1-4.

B.

Belgium: validity under Treaty of Versailles, 1919, of Franco-Belgian advance into Ruhr Valley, 50-54.

C.

Claims: of German nationals against British nationals for price of goods sold and delivered and subsequently seized and condemned in prize, 47-50.
Colonies: application of international labour conventions, 19-22.
Compañia Mercantil Argentina v. United States Shipping Board, 26.
Conventions. See Treaties.
Court of International Justice: compulsory acceptance of jurisdiction of, 30-44.
Courts, British: transmission of information to judges of High Court in cases affecting rights of foreign Governments, 26-28.

E.

Egypt: liquidation of Austrian and German property, 1-4.
" and the League of Nations, 16-19.

F.

France: validity under Treaty of Versailles, 1919, of Franco-Belgian advance into Ruhr Valley, 50-54.

G.

Germany: liquidation of German property in Egypt, 1-4.
" claims of nationals against British nationals for price of goods sold and delivered and subsequently seized and condemned in prize, 47-50.
" Franco-Belgian advance into Ruhr Valley; validity under Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 50-54.
Governments, foreign: transmission to judges of British High Court of information in cases affecting rights of, 26-28.

GOV—RHIL.

Governments, foreign: Official Secrets Acts, 1911 and 1920, and the supply of munitions to, 45-47.

J.

Jurisdiction: Court of International Justice; compulsory acceptance of, 30-44.
Justice, International. See Court.

L.

Labour: international conventions; interpretation of article 421 of Treaty of Versailles, 19-22.
" international conventions; British obligations under Part XIII of Treaty of Versailles, 22-25.
Lang, Jules and Son, 47.
League of Nations: and Egypt, 16-19.
" and the Sudan, 4-16.
Liquidation. See Property.

M.

Munitions: Official Secrets Acts, 1911 and 1920, and the supply of munitions to foreign Governments, 45-47.

N.

Nationality: resumption of British nationality under "British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," 28-30.

O.

Official Secrets. See Secrets.

P.

Prize Court: claims of German nationals against British nationals for price of goods sold and delivered and subsequently seized and condemned in prize, 47-50.
Property: Austrian and German in Egypt; liquidation, 1-4.
" goods sold and delivered by German nationals to British nationals and subsequently seized and condemned in prize; German claim for price, 47-50.
Protectorates: application of international labour conventions, 19-22.

R.

Reiber, Josef, 47.
Reprisals: interpretation of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 50-54.
Rhine Territories: interpretation of Rhineland Agreement, 1919, 50-54.
" " interpretation of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of Treaty of Versailles, 1919, 50-54.

1924

(iv)

RUH—TRE.

Ruhr Valley: validity of Franco-Belgian advance into, 50-54.

S.

Secrets, official: acts of 1911 and 1920; and supply of munitions to foreign Governments, 45-47.
Sudan: and the League of Nations, 4-16.

T.

"The Odessa," 50.
"The Parchim," 50.
Treaties: application of international labour conventions to colonies and protectorates, 19-22.
"International Labour Conventions; British obligations under Part XIII of Treaty of Versailles, 22-25.
Treaty of Peace (Austria): application of article 249 (h) (2) to liquidation of Austrian property in Egypt, 1-4.
"Germany): application of article 297 (h) (2) to liquidation of German property in Egypt, 1-4.

TRE.

Treaty of Peace (Germany): interpretation of article 421; international labour conventions, 19-22.
" (Germany): British obligations under Part XIII. Labour clauses, 22-25.
" (Germany): claims under article 296 of German nationals against British nationals for price of goods sold and delivered and subsequently seized and condemned in prize, 47-50.
" (Germany): effect of article 440 as regards claims of German nationals for price of goods sold and delivered to British nationals and subsequently seized and condemned in prize, 47-50.
" (Germany): interpretation of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII, 50-54.
Treaty of Saint-Germain. See Treaty of Peace (Austria).
Treaty of Versailles. See Treaty of Peace (Germany).

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN. &c.: 1924.

EGYPT.

[E 7001/66/16/1924]

No. 1.

[August 14, 1924.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 27, 1924.

I HAVE the honour by direction of Mr. Secretary Ramsay MacDonald to request that you will be so good as to favour him with an expression of your opinion on certain questions regarding the liquidation of German and Austrian property in Egypt. It was hoped that this case might have been presented to you in the form of a reply to the actual arguments advanced by the German or Austrian Governments, either in challenging the accounts of the liquidation or in some other definite manner, but it now seems probable that the questions at issue will be raised by the Austrian Government in a less definite manner, and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald therefore feels it necessary to obtain your opinion before the matter goes further.

Liquidation of Austrian and German property in
Egypt.

2.—(a.) The Public Custodian in Egypt has, since 1916, been engaged in liquidating German and Austrian property in that country, and has collected the assets from this partly in Egyptian currency and partly in French francs. His Majesty's Government justified their action in this respect in a memorandum, of which a copy is enclosed and which was handed to the German Ambassador on the 17th April, 1923 (Paper 1). Under article 147 of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany recognised Egypt as a protectorate, and under article 153 all movable and immovable property in Egypt belonging to German nationals is to be dealt with in accordance with sections III and IV of Part X (economic clauses) of the treaty. The similar articles in the Treaty of Saint-Germain are articles 102 and 108.

(b.) German and Austrian property in Egypt has accordingly been charged under article 297 (b) and paragraph 4 of the annex of the Treaty of Versailles and the corresponding provisions of the Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye with the payment firstly of the claims of Egyptian nationals and British nationals in Egypt, and secondly of the claims of other British nationals—that is to say, any surplus remaining after satisfaction of the claims in Egypt will, in effect, be brought into the United Kingdom pool.

(c.) The question hereinafter raised refers to proceeds of liquidation of Austrian as well as German property, but for the sake of brevity reference will only be made to the Treaty of Versailles, the Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye containing corresponding provisions.

(d.) It will be remembered that, under the combined effect of article 297 (h) (1) and article 296 (paragraph immediately following 4) of the Treaty of Versailles, the Allied Powers who have adopted section III of Part X of that treaty are under the necessity of crediting to Germany the proceeds of liquidated enemy property in Allied currency at the pre-war rate of exchange.

[13086]

B

(e.) In the case of Egypt, however, an intimation was given to Germany and Austria that section III was not adopted, and it is accordingly apprehended that the position may have to be governed by article 297 (h) (2), which is as follows:—

“As regards Powers not adopting section III and the annex thereto, the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers held by Germany, shall be paid immediately to the person entitled thereto or to his Government; the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets of German nationals received by an Allied or Associated Power shall be subject to disposal by such Power in accordance with its laws and regulations, and may be applied in payment of the claims and debts defined by this article or paragraph 4 of the annex hereto. Any property, rights and interests or proceeds thereof, or cash assets not used as above provided, may be retained by the said Allied or Associated Power, and if retained the cash value thereof shall be dealt with as provided in article 243.”

(f.) The question, therefore, arises whether the proceeds of liquidation fall to be dealt with under article 297 (h) (1) or article 297 (h) (2) of the Treaty of Versailles. In the event of (h) (2) being the paragraph applicable, the further questions arise: firstly, whether there is any treaty obligation to render an account to Germany for the proceeds of liquidation, and, if so, whether in such account credit must be given in pounds Egyptian or pounds sterling at the pre-war rate of exchange, or whether the proceeds need only be accounted for at the actual value at the date of their application, either for the purposes of the charge or for those of reparation?

(g.) Alternatively, on the true construction of (h) (2) need only the “cash value” of the residue (if any) of the liquidated proceeds after payment of the debts and claims defined by article 297 and the annex be accounted for, and is it only this residue that must be valorised?

In this connection reference must be made to paragraph 14 of the annex to section IV, Part X, of the treaty, which is as follows:—

“The provisions of article 297 and this annex relating to property, rights and interests in an enemy country, and the proceeds of the liquidation thereof, apply to debts, credits and accounts, section III regulating only the method of payment.

“In the settlement of matters provided for in article 297 between German and the Allied or Associated States, their colonies or protectorates, or any one of the British Dominions or India, in respect of any of which a declaration shall not have been made that they adopt section III, and between their respective nationals, the provisions of section III respecting the currency in which payment is to be made and the rate of exchange and of interest shall apply unless the Government of the Allied or Associated Power concerned shall within six months of the coming into force of the present treaty notify Germany that the said provisions are not to be applied.”

(h.) The Anglo-Bulgarian Mixed Arbitral Tribunal have already given effect to the argument of the British Government agent that, as between British nationals and Bulgarian nationals, notwithstanding that section III has not been adopted in the case of Bulgaria, settlements of pre-war debts, having regard to paragraph 14 of the above-mentioned annex, must be in sterling at the pre-war rate of exchange.

A similar decision has been given by the Anglo-Austrian Tribunal in the case of a claim by an Egyptian national against an Austrian national.

(i.) It will, therefore, doubtless be contended by Germany that for the purposes of article 297 (h) (2) it is essential that this country should render some form of account of the proceeds arising from liquidation of German property in Egypt, if only for ascertaining the ultimate balance, if any, to be dealt with as provided in article 243—i.e., for reparation purposes—and that this accounting comes within the expression “in the settlement of matters provided for in article 297 between Germany and the Allied or Associated States, their colonies or protectorates.” If this contention is correct, it may be that the British Exchequer will be faced by a serious loss by reason of the fall in exchange of the value of the francs, which constitute a considerable part of the proceeds of liquidation in Egypt.

3. It is thought that you may be assisted by a short account of what steps have been taken to put into operation this portion of the treaties with regard to Egypt.

4. The Egypt Treaty of Peace Order in Council, 1920 (Paper 2), came into force at the date of the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles, i.e., the 10th January, 1920, and upon the 9th March, 1920, Lord Allenby, by proclamation under martial law (Paper 3), gave effect to the Order in Council in Egypt. The Egypt Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order in Council, 1920 (Paper 4) came into force at the date of the ratification of the Treaty of Saint Germain, i.e., the 16th July, 1920, and upon the 24th November, 1920, Lord Allenby issued a similar proclamation (Paper 5), which had the effect of putting the Order in Council into force in Egypt. Upon the 23rd January, 1920, the German Government were informed (Paper 6) that the provisions of section III and the annex thereto, i.e., the clearing office, were adopted by His Majesty's Government and the dominions, colonies and protectorates generally, but Egypt was specifically excepted. The German Government upon the 27th January, 1920 (Paper 7), formally acknowledged this notification. A similar notification was sent to the Austrian Government on the 27th August, 1920 (Papers 8 and 9), and that Government notified in September of that year its acceptance of the exclusion of Egypt from the provisions of section III of Part X of the Treaty of Saint-Germain (Paper 10). It will thus be seen that whereas Great Britain in some respects may be held to be a Power which has adopted section III and the annex thereto, nevertheless, so far as Egypt is concerned, the provisions of that section do not apply.

5. It may be relevant to take into consideration the fact that the property in question has been liquidated by His Majesty's Government, acting under martial law, and not by the Government of Egypt; and if the expression “Powers,” contained in sub-sections (h) (1) and (2) of article 297, means the Power which actually effected the liquidation, it would then seem probable that these cases fall to be dealt with under the provisions of sub-section (h) (1). It has, however, been suggested that there is some force in the argument that the expression “Powers,” in paragraph (h) (1) and (2) means, in relation to protectorates, “protecting Powers,” and that inasmuch as Great Britain as protecting Power has not adopted the clearing office provisions for Egypt, therefore the proceeds of liquidations and sales in Egypt fall to be dealt with under paragraph (h) (2) rather than under (h) (1).

6. An expression of your opinion, therefore, is requested on the following points:—

- (1.) Should the German property vested in the custodian under the various Orders in Council and proclamations referred to above be credited or accounted for under article 297 (h) (1) or under article 297 (h) (2) of the Treaty of Versailles?
- (2.) If under article 297 (h) (2), must an account be rendered in such a form as to make it necessary to account for the liquidated proceeds in (a) Egyptian pounds or (b) pounds sterling, converting such proceeds, where originally in other currencies, into pounds Egyptian or sterling at the pre-war rate of exchange, or is it only the actual balance that must be so accounted for after paying the claims and debts defined by article 297 and paragraph 4 of the annex, and in that case, does the “cash value” mean the actual value of the balance of the proceeds as it stands at the time of its application to reparation purposes?

7. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald would further be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which may occur to you.

8. A list of the relevant documents above referred to, together with copies of the documents themselves, is annexed.

I have, &c.

D. G. OSBORNE.

List of Papers.

- (I.) Memorandum for German Ambassador, April 17, 1923 (E 3476/9/16/1923).
- (II.) Egypt (Treaty of Peace) Order in Council, 1920 (Confidential, 10472*—1263).
- (III.) Egyptian Proclamation enforcing Treaty of Peace with Germany, March 9, 1920 (E 2366/657/16/1920).
- (IV.) Egypt (Treaty of Peace, Austria) Order in Council, 1920 (Confidential, 10472*—1281).
- (V.) Egyptian Proclamation enforcing Treaty of Peace with Austria, November 24, 1920 (Svo. 9235/1920—21).
- (VI.) Lord Kilmarnock to German Minister for Foreign Affairs, January 23, 1920 (179721/F 120154/1919).
- (VII.) German Minister for Foreign Affairs to Lord Kilmarnock, January 27, 1920 (179721/F 120154/1919).
- (VIII.) Earl Curzon to Mr. R. F. O. Bridgeman, No. 555, August 20, 1920 (C 3966/211/3/1920).
- (IX.) Mr. R. F. O. Bridgeman to Earl Curzon, No. 676, September 29, 1920 (C 7842/211/3/1920).
- (X.) Mr. R. F. O. Bridgeman to Earl Curzon, No. 649, September 21, 1920 (C 7348/211/3/1920).

Report.

1. In our opinion the German property vested in the Custodian under the various Orders in Council and proclamations relating to the Germany property rights and interests in Egypt should be credited or accounted for under article 297 (h) (2) of the Treaty of Versailles.

2. In our opinion the provisions respecting currency and rates of exchange and interest referred to in paragraph 14 of the annex to section IV of Part X of the Treaty of Versailles apply only to the settlement of matters inter partes, and have no application to the administrative operations of the officers of an Allied Power in the course of liquidating enemy property under that section and annex. Thus all cash claims must be collected and all cash liabilities must be settled in the currencies and according to the rates of exchange provided for by the paragraph (those in Egypt being collected and settled in £ E. and those in Great Britain in sterling), but the necessary currencies must be provided at the discretion of the officers of the Allied Powers in the course of liquidating and administering the fund without reference to the provisions of that paragraph, and the paragraph would have no application to such an administrative operation as a sale of property for a price payable in francs followed (immediately or after an interval) by the conversion of the francs into Egyptian or English currency.

The ultimate surplus proceeds (if any) must, in our opinion, be converted into and credited or accounted for in sterling.

PATRICK HASTINGS.
HENRY H. SLESSER.

Law Officers' Department,
August 14, 1924.

[E 8839/735/16/1924]

No. 2.

[October 1, 1924.]

Foreign Office to the Lord Chancellor.

My dear Schuster,

Foreign Office, September 29, 1924.

The Sudan
question and the League of Nations.

I ENCLOSE a copy of a memorandum on the Sudan question and the League of Nations by Colonel Schuster, the Financial Secretary to the Sudan Government. It was written as a result of consultations with the department of the Foreign Office concerned and with Malkin.

The Prime Minister regards the subject as of such importance that he is anxious to obtain the Lord Chancellor's opinion.

M. SHEARMAN.

(Secret.)

Memorandum communicated by Colonel Schuster, Financial Secretary to the Sudan Government, September 23, 1924.

PART I.—PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS.

THE suggestion has been made on various occasions recently that, in the event of failure to arrive at an agreed settlement of the Sudan question with the Egyptian Government, the dispute should be referred for settlement to the League of Nations.

Those who have made this suggestion have never gone beyond the formulation of the general idea, and have not attempted any detailed statement of the exact questions which they propose should be so referred, nor any examination of the technical manner in which the reference should be made, that is to say, under which section of the covenant, &c.

Thus, Mr. Johnston, in his speech in the debate in the House of Commons on the 10th July ("Hansard," Vol. 745, No. 104, p. 2522) after proposing "that the British Government should face the facts frankly and offer the Egyptian Government a joint reference of the dispute to the League of Nations," went on to say, "I do think the British Government cannot simply ask the Egyptian Government to maintain the status quo, and we have still to face the fact that something has got to be done to disabuse the Egyptian people of their fears that their water supplies are in other hands. I trust the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs will be able, on behalf of the Government, to reassure the Egyptian people, and agree to a joint reference of the matter in dispute between this country and Egypt, in so far, at any rate, as the water supplies are concerned, to the League of Nations, and that we should abide by the decision."

It is clear that there were, in the mind of Mr. Johnston, two very different ideas. A submission to the League of Nations of the question of how Egypt's material interests are to be secured is a course which the British Government might view with sympathy, while refusing to allow its right and responsibility to provide for the good administration of the Sudanese peoples to be questioned.

The idea has also been urged by Mr. Brailsford in the "New Leader," chiefly on the ground that the issues involved are so complex, and the determination of the best course so difficult, and in fact that whatever course is chosen now is unlikely to avoid troubles in the future, that the British Government should prepare defences against criticism by leaving that determination to the League of Nations.

An argument for a reference to the League on this ground is not very convincing. The essence of the difficulty lies in the complexity of the problem, and a reference to the League is no solution. No doubt it is important that the British Government should be able to justify itself before the world, but it is still more important to find a right solution, and to steer the best course in the interests primarily of the people of the Sudan, and also of all others who are interested in this question. It is far more probable that the British Government with its intimate knowledge of the situation can arrive at a right solution, than a composite international body like the Council of the League, whose judgment would almost certainly represent a compromise of conflicting opinions. Moreover, the problem is one which the British Government is responsible for solving, and it cannot escape its responsibility by shifting the task to other shoulders and hiding behind the League of Nations. It may be argued that one of the chief difficulties in the future situation will be the hostility of Egyptians, and that they would accept with good grace and co-operate with goodwill under a decision given by the League of Nations, whereas they would offer nothing but trouble and opposition to a similar course decided upon by the British Government. The hope on which such an argument is based is illusory. The Egyptian public would construe every point to which they objected as the result of British influence with the Council of the League, and would oppose it just as strongly as though it has been decided by the British Government. But quite apart from this the argument is based on an unreal view of the situation. The Egyptian agitation about the Sudan is not based upon any genuine national feeling, except to the extent of fears about their water supply. It is agreed by all sections of British opinion that these fears must be allayed by the most positive guarantees by the British Government, and, as is pointed out below, there is no objection to accepting the supervision of the League of Nations in order to secure fair play in this matter.

There is, moreover, another party to be considered, the Sudanese themselves. From statements which have already been made there is evidence that the responsible citizens and leaders would most strongly resent the idea that the fate of their country should be decided by an alien council—like the question of the ownership of some material chattel—or a dispute between the British and Egyptian Governments, nor is there any means by which they could themselves be properly represented in the dispute. They would probably far prefer that it should be left in the hands of the British whom they know, provided that they are at the same time assured that the British accept the principle of gradually advancing them to the state of governing themselves. The net result appears to be that nothing would be Practically this is certainly so, but technically the statement is open to criticism from the Egyptian side.—H. W. M.

I sympathise, but this criticism applies to every case where a territorial dispute has been decided by arbitration, mediation, &c.—H. W. M.

gained by a reference to the League of the general political issue except the possible justification of the British position before the world at large. For this the British Government should rely rather on the righteousness of its own action.

2. There are, moreover, other serious considerations of a practical nature:—

I would emphasise that it would be contrary to the conditions attached to Egyptian independence; it is only because Egypt was declared independent by us that any question of going to the League arises, except possibly under article 11.—H.W.M.

(a.) A reference to the League of a dispute with Egypt as to the political status of the Sudan would be contrary to the declared policy of the British Government.

Mr. Lloyd George in his speech in the House of Commons on the 28th February, 1922 ("Hansard," Vol. 151, No. 16, the 28th February, 1922), in which he expounded the declaration of British policy with regard to Egypt, contained in the White Book submitted to Parliament, used the following words:—

"The final clause of the declaration defines the special relation between His Majesty's Government and Egypt. It declares that the following four points are absolutely reserved to the discretion of His Majesty's Government:—

"(a.) The security of the communications of the British Empire in Egypt.

"(b.) The defence of Egypt against all foreign aggression or interference, direct or indirect.

"(c.) The protection of foreign interests in Egypt and the protection of minorities.

"(d.) The Sudan.

"We are prepared to make agreements with the Egyptian Government upon these matters in the spirit of mutual accommodation, whenever a favourable opportunity arises for the conclusion of such agreements. But until such agreements satisfactory both to ourselves and to the Egyptian Government are concluded, the status quo will remain intact.

"I must make another point clear. We regard the special relation between ourselves and Egypt, defined in this clause, as a matter concerning only ourselves and the Government of Egypt. Foreign Powers are not concerned, and we propose to state this unmistakably when the termination of the protectorate is notified to them.

"The welfare and integrity of Egypt are necessary to the peace and safety of the British Empire, which will, therefore, always maintain as an essential British interest the special relations between itself and Egypt long recognised by other Governments. The definition of these special relations is an essential part of the declaration recognising Egypt as an independent sovereign State."

The present Prime Minister, in the debate on the Sudan question in the House of Commons on the 10th July of this year, expressed himself as follows:—

"My position is this: An agreement ought to be come to between the Governments of Egypt and Great Britain directly in contact with each other, and no attempt should be made to bring in any outside authority, the League of Nations or some other body. It is much more in the nature of a domestic problem. We have been in partnership up to now, and it is not a matter like a dispute, say, between Turkey and ourselves. If you maintain goodwill following an agreement, and if that agreement is one which is not imposed upon both of us by an outside party, but one which we take upon ourselves of our own free will, it is much better."

These statements are clear, and the conclusion is obvious that it would be exceedingly embarrassing for the British Government to depart from its position that this is a "domestic issue."

(b.) The strongest practical objection to a reference of the general political question to the League is however to be found in the local situation. In short, the local situation would not stand it.

The following passage from a memorandum recently prepared by the Foreign Office sets out the view of the Governor-General of the Sudan:—

"A reference to the League could only be construed by the public as a formal ratification, accepted by the British Government, that a state of extreme uncertainty does, in fact, exist as to the future of the Sudan. As such it would not only be extremely dangerous in itself, but would appear totally inconsistent with the declarations already made by the British Government, and published in the Sudan, to the effect that under no circumstances will His Majesty's Government retire from the status quo or hand over to others its trust for the good government of the Sudan. Quite apart from this inconsistency with previous declarations, it would be impossible to make the natives understand the motive prompting the British Government to place the final decision in the hands of others, and it could only be regarded as a sign of weakness.

"What, then, would be the situation? Consideration of the matter by the Council of the League would almost inevitably involve local investigations by commissioners appointed by the League, who would be forced to attempt to collect some evidence as to the wishes of the people. A delay of six to twelve months would be required. I need not elaborate a description of the effects of this on the minds of a primitive and excitable people. The feeling of unrest which would be created would provide the most fertile opportunities for a Mahdist movement or a religious rising.

"It must not be forgotten that while the Egyptian Government might officially agree to a reference to the League, a movement could simultaneously be carried out backed by Egyptian influence to stir up trouble in the Sudan. The reference to the League could be represented by local agitators in the Sudan as an act which would place their fate as a nation in the hands of an alien council. The possibilities of such an agitation are obvious. It is my considered opinion that in such circumstances, even if all the measures which I have recommended for clearing up the army situation are taken, it might be impossible to prevent the local situation getting out of control."

3. To sum up, the conclusion seems to be clear, that to ask the League of Nations to settle the future political status of the Sudan is a course which is open to very grave practical danger and objections. It might create such unrest as to make the future peaceful administration of the Sudan impossible, it is inconsistent with British policy as regards Egypt and with legitimate British interests, it is a shirking of British responsibility, it would be contrary to the interests and wishes of the Sudanese themselves, and it offers no reasonable hope of securing the best solution of the present problems nor of improving our relations with the Egyptians.

4. As against these objections must be set the following considerations:—

(a.) The endorsement of the League would justify British action in the eyes of other nations.

(b.) A large section of British public opinion—particularly among the supporters of the present Government—would postulate as a condition of its support for insistence by the British Government on the maintenance of British control of the administration of the Sudan, a sure guarantee that such control is to be exercised in a disinterested way for the benefit of the Sudanese themselves and without any violation of Egypt's material rights to her water supply and otherwise. Such a guarantee might be afforded by the endorsement and supervision by the League of British policy.

(c.) It is on general grounds desirable that the British Government should miss no opportunity of proving the reality of its belief in and support of the League.

These general considerations can hardly be held to counter-balance the practical objections urged above to the course of putting in the hands of the Council of the League the power to decide the future political status of the Sudan.

EGYPT.

On the other hand, they are of sufficient weight to make it necessary to consider whether there is any other method of introducing League supervision as a guarantee that the British Government will exercise its predominance in a fair and disinterested manner. Various proposals in this direction are worth examination.

(a.) For example, it has been suggested that the British Government should take the following line: That it is de facto responsible for the administration of the Sudan, and that as the official attitude of the Egyptian Government has made a partnership under the 1899 convention unworkable, the British Government must continue with sole responsibility, but that, as a guarantee of its disinterestedness in the matter, it is prepared to accept the position of a Power on whom a mandate for the Sudan has been conferred by the League of Nations.

There is, however, no provision in the Covenant of the League under which a reference of this kind could be made. The council would probably feel bound to regard the situation as being already provided for by the 1899 convention, and refuse to recognise any other status, unless that convention has been technically brought to an end by some official act on the part of the Egyptian Government. Even so, there is no provision in the covenant for granting a mandate in such a case, as it could hardly be argued that the Sudan is, in the meaning of article 22, a territory "which, as a consequence of the late war, has ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed" it.

If the Egyptian Government had formally repudiated the 1899 convention, a "dispute likely to lead to a rupture" might be said to have arisen, and in that case the British Government might submit the matter to "enquiry by the council" under article 12. But in that case the council would undoubtedly require a free hand to decide one way or the other, and would not consider an ex parte application by the British Government to have a mandate conferred upon it.

In fact, there seems no safe way of getting the matter before the League on the lines of the suggestion now under consideration. Possibly, however, it might nevertheless provide a convenient formula for defining the British position before the world.

(b.) A more practicable and acceptable method of securing the intervention of the League as a guarantee of British motives might be to limit such intervention to the protection of the material advantages which should be secured to Egypt. Thus, the League might be asked to nominate the independent chairman to a commission to control the distribution of the waters of the Nile between Egypt and the Sudan—which commission would be further composed of one representative of the Egyptian Government and one representative nominated by the British Government.

Or again, if it is impossible to settle by agreement the amounts and conditions for the debt owed by the Sudan to Egypt, the Finance Committee of the League of Nations would be a very suitable body to adjudicate on this matter.

Such limited references to the League of Nations would be in every way desirable, and ought, if properly understood, to satisfy British and foreign public opinion and counteract Egyptian apprehensions.

PART II.—LEGAL CONSIDERATIONS.

1. If the arguments and conclusions set out in Part I of this memorandum are accepted, the British Government must clearly, if possible, avoid a reference of the political issue to the League of Nations. But is it a matter in which the British Government has a free choice?

There are three questions which require examination:—

- (1.) Is the British Government bound under the covenant itself to refer the matter to the League?
- (2.) Could the Egyptian Government force a reference to the League?
- (3.) Could a third party force such a reference?

The difficulty about these proposals is that they postulate either (a) a settlement agreed with Egypt, or (b) the willingness of the League to take a hand in working a solution imposed against the will of Egypt.—H. W. M.

EGYPT.

2. As regards the first question, if—

- (a.) Egypt were a member of the League, and
- (b.) The dispute with Egypt is to be regarded as a "dispute likely to lead to a rupture," then clearly, under articles 12 and 15, the British Government would be bound to refer the matter to the council.

But Egypt is not a member of the League. Does this make any difference?

Apparently the intention of article 17 is that it should not make any difference, as it lays down that in the event of a "dispute" (presumably this must be taken to cover a "dispute likely to lead to a rupture" within the meaning of article 12, and, also, a "dispute suitable for submission to arbitration which cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy" within the meaning of article 13) between a member and a non-member, the non-member is to be invited to become a member for that particular purpose. But who is responsible for raising the question before the League so that the invitation to the non-member is issued? Is it the other party to the dispute, who is a member? This might indeed be argued—in which case it would be the duty of the British Government to give notice of the dispute to the Council of the League, at the same time asking that Egypt should be invited to become a member of the League for this purpose. But then, is it a "dispute likely to lead to a rupture"? It might perhaps be argued that the question of a rupture between Great Britain and Egypt is impossible in the sense that with British troops in occupation of Egypt there could be no question of war between the two countries. On purely technical grounds this argument would not be very convincing.

There is, moreover, the other alternative that the dispute, even if it cannot be regarded as one likely to lead to a "rupture" in the sense of a war, might be regarded as one coming under article 13; that is to say, as a dispute which is "suitable for submission to arbitration and which cannot satisfactorily be settled by diplomacy." Article 13 enumerates some of the kinds of disputes to be regarded as suitable for arbitration, and if the dispute with Egypt is to be regarded as one as to the interpretation of the 1899 convention, which has, in fact, the force of a treaty, it would certainly be one of the special cases enumerated in article 13.

It might again be argued that the issue is, as has been already declared by Mr. Lloyd George and the present Prime Minister, "a domestic one," and therefore not suitable for submission to the League. That plea might justify the British Government in refraining from taking the initiative in raising the question, although if raised by others it would not keep the matter from consideration by the council.* It is, however, to be noted that no provision is made for such a plea in the case of disputes coming under article 13 as suitable for arbitration.

On the whole it would seem very questionable if the case is argued on a literal interpretation of the clauses of the covenant as they stand, whether it could be held that it is not the duty of the British Government to refer the matter to the League.

On the other hand, the clauses of the covenant are so vague and wide, that they must be interpreted to some extent with reference to the intentions of the parties in particular cases. When the covenant was entered into by the British Government, Egypt was a British protectorate, and there can have been no idea in the minds either of the British Government or of the other signatories, that a dispute between Great Britain and Egypt could come before the League. When the protectorate was removed by the act of the British Government, it was done distinctly on the understanding that its removal was subject to the discussion of the four reserved questions as purely domestic questions between Great Britain and Egypt. This is clear from the declaration of Mr. Lloyd George quoted above.

On the whole it would appear that on broad grounds the British Government would be justified in taking the line that it had never been its

* It is expressly laid down in article 15 that it is for the council to find whether such a plea is justified, and it is only if the dispute is found by the council "to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction" of the party raising the plea that it will hold good.

intention in signing the covenant to submit to the League, a possible dispute between itself and Egypt which might arise out of the termination of the British protectorate over Egypt.

3. The second question for consideration was: "Could the Egyptian Government force a reference to the League?"

On this Mr. Malkin has written the opinion, copy of which is attached.

4. The third question is: "Could some other member of the League bring the question of the Sudan before the League for consideration?"

It seems clear that this question must be answered in the affirmative. Article 11 contains the following passage: "It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the League to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding on which international peace depends."

The wording of this clause is very wide. It is not confined merely to "disputes," whether these be disputes "likely to lead to a rupture," as under articles 12 and 15, or to disputes "suitable for submission to arbitration" under article 13, or "disputes" between members and non-members under article 17.

If the matter was brought up in a general way it would presumably be open to the British Government to argue on general grounds (and not only on the narrow technical grounds defined in article 15) that it is not a matter "threatening to disturb international peace," &c.

On the other hand, if the matter were brought in this way before the council, that body would presumably classify it as a dispute within the meaning of one or other of the articles referred to above. The subsequent procedure would then follow on the lines already indicated in the preceding paragraph.

PART III.

1. It is next necessary to consider, on the supposition that the matter is to be referred to the League, on what lines such reference could be made so as to avoid as far as possible the objections explained in Part I above, and what tactics the British Government should adopt in order to ensure developments following these lines.

It is necessary to consider this contingency for the following reasons:—

- (a.) The British Government may disagree with the arguments advanced in Part I above, and decide on general grounds that the matter should be referred to the League.
- (b.) The British Government may take the view that, as on the strength of the legal opinion expressed in Part II above, Zaghul or a third party could, in any case, force the question before the League, therefore it would be the wisest course for the British Government, making a virtue of necessity, to take the initiative itself, in offering a reference to the League. The possibility of one or other of two alternative advantages might thereby be secured. Either that Zaghul would be forced to take the onus of refusing the proposal for the League's intervention, or that the British Government would at least ensure that the reference was made in the form most suitable to its own point of view.

Before being influenced by reason (b) it appears desirable to endeavour to get Zaghul to "show his hand," which might be done in the forthcoming conversations.

2. Assuming that the British Government has some power to direct the manner in which the reference to the League is made, the following line had been suggested in the course of one of the discussions at the Foreign Office:—

"That Zaghul should be informed that His Majesty's Government is perfectly willing to submit the matter for decision by the League, but that His Majesty's Government stands by the 1899 convention; that, therefore, Zaghul must, as a preliminary to submission to the League, not only accept the 1899 convention, but also publicly disclaim his declarations in Cairo in June which had been made in such terms as to make any 'partnership' impossible."

He should at the same time be informed that pending the result of the reference to the League, His Majesty's Government would continue to regard itself as responsible for the maintenance of order in the Sudan, and would be forced to take any action necessary to preserve such order.

It is quite possible that the assumption of such an attitude on the part of His Majesty's Government would effectively deter Zaghul from any attempt to secure a reference to the League. On the other hand, if he, or a possible successor to him, were to accept the British offer, it has been argued by Mr. Malkin, in his opinion referred to above, that a reference to the League on these lines might be somewhat inconvenient to the British Government. It would probably be treated by the League as a question suitable for arbitration under article 13, as being a question on the interpretation of a treaty, and a court of arbitration seeking to give the Egyptian Government a practical share in the administration of the Sudan might make embarrassing proposals. The International Court of Justice, considering the matter from a legal point of view, would hardly appreciate the practical reasons which would make it impossible to admit Egyptians into responsible posts in the Sudan.

On the other hand, there is nothing in the actual wording of the 1899 convention to prevent all the Government posts being filled by British or other non-Egyptian officials. This is a matter left entirely to the discretion of the Governor-General. Nor is there anything to prevent the Sudan Government organising its own defence force and asking for the removal of the Egyptian army. If such a step had actually been taken, it may be asked whether the International Court of Justice or any other arbitrator could, on legal grounds, decide that it was to be reversed. It might further be argued that the appointment of Egyptian officials, or the provision of a garrison by the Egyptian army are matters which have nothing to do with a "share in the Government of the country." That would rather be secured by some power (to be exercised by the Egyptian Government jointly with the British Government) of outside control over the policy of the Sudan Government. As long as it is outside control it might be possible to find some means of giving the Egyptian Government a share, e.g., the appointment of a joint Anglo-Egyptian supervisory council or commission. (A proposal on these lines has already been made by the Sudan Government in its memorandum of the 25th May, 1924.)

On the whole, if reference to the League is to be made, there seems much to be said (in spite of the objections urged by Mr. Malkin) for the British Government taking the line of refusing to allow the 1899 convention to be called in question, and that the only question which it can admit as open to dispute is as to how that convention is, under the altered circumstances of Egyptian independence, to be applied. It must always be remembered that there are strong grounds for arguing that Egyptian independence is an occasion for diminishing and not increasing the Egyptian share in the Government.

An alternative line of argument is that if a reference is to be made to the League it would be better to take a bolder line and play for stakes of "double or quits." The British Government's line would then be, that as the dispute has arisen because Zaghul claims complete ownership of the Sudan, then a reference to the League implies that the 1899 convention has broken down and must be replaced by some other system. The question to be referred would then be whether His Majesty's Government should alone fulfil the function of trustee for the Sudanese (it might possibly be suggested that this should be done under League control) or whether Zaghul's contention should be accepted and the Sudan handed over to Egypt "to dispose of as a proprietor disposes of his property." His Majesty's Government would, in that case, make it plain that it could not accept any intermediate solution under which it would be possible for Egypt to interfere in and hinder British administration.

A reference on these lines would be much more possible for Zaghul to accept, as it would involve no retreat from the position he has already taken up. In favour of taking such a line it may be argued that the Council of the League, in view of the success of twenty-five years under British administration could hardly decide that the British should withdraw altogether.

Surely; if the argument was that the action taken was inconsistent with the convention. Of course, the court could not enforce its decision, but we should be bound to carry it out under the last paragraph of article 13.—H. W. M.

As put, this would not be a question of the interpretation of the convention, and would be more a question for the council than for the court. I am not sure whether this is intended.—H. W. M.

The tactics to be pursued by the British Government in this matter require most careful consideration and the best legal advice.

The questions to be answered are:—

- (a.) Which is the better of the two alternative lines outlined above to adopt?
- (b.) Could the British Government effectively insist on the adoption of the one or the other, and, in particular, in regard to the second alternative, could the British Government say, "we will accept no intermediate solution"?

This would largely depend on how our case was handled before the council.
—H. W. M.

This would largely depend on how our case was handled before the council.
—H. W. M.

All experience of previous references to the League have shown that it is just the "intermediate solution" which the council is most likely to give, i.e., a compromise. If that is what they do in the present case, can the British Government say "a compromise is unworkable" and refuse to carry out the council's award?

PART IV.

In conclusion, it must be emphasised that nothing which has been said in any of the preceding parts of this note in any way affect the necessity for the British Government supporting the Sudan Government in taking such action as may be necessary to maintain order in the Sudan. This action might have to include the removal at an early date of all elements of the Egyptian army from the Sudan, and the taking over by the Sudan Government, as part of its own force, of the Arab and Sudanese units of the Egyptian army now stationed in the Sudan.

It would be exceedingly dangerous for the British Government to commit itself in any way to preserve the status quo as regards the Egyptian army pending the League's award. The Egyptian Government has already upset the status quo, inter alia, by making the position of the Sirdar and other British officers with the Egyptian army impossible.

PART V.

On the whole, after considering the various pros and cons set out above, the following course is recommended: This recommendation is based on the assumption (which must now be regarded as a practical certainty) that it will be impossible to reach any agreed settlement with the Egyptian Government, and that the future course must be determined by unilateral decisions on the part of His Majesty's Government. In order to justify His Majesty's Government's position before the world, and to secure a proper understanding of His Majesty's Government's motives and policy, not only by the people of the Sudan, but also by the Egyptian public—a large section of which is, though temporarily silenced, fully alive to the realities of the situation and the value of British backing, it will be necessary that His Majesty's Government's policy should be made clear in a declaration to be made to the Egyptian Government and to be published before the world.

It is recommended that this declaration should be approximately on the following lines:—

"That conversations with Zaghlul have only served to confirm the position disclosed in his previous public utterances, and to demonstrate that for the present any partnership between His Majesty's Government and the Egyptian Government in the internal administration of the Sudan is impossible.

"That, in the meanwhile, the duty of preserving order in the Sudan rests in fact on His Majesty's Government, which must accordingly take practical steps in view of the new situation which has been created and has made the friendly partnership of the past twenty-five years impossible.

"That His Majesty's Government regards this responsibility as a trust for the natives of the Sudan, and that as a guarantee that they intend to carry it out in this spirit, they will welcome a system of control and supervision by the League of Nations as though they held a mandate under article 22 of the covenant should the League see fit to introduce such a system.

"That, at the same time, His Majesty's Government recognises that Egypt has certain material interests which must be guaranteed and safeguarded—these being chiefly as regards her share of the Nile water and the satisfaction of any financial claims which she has against the Sudan Government, that His Majesty's Government is prepared to refer both these questions to the League of Nations to decide the extent of Egypt's just claims and how they can be satisfied."

The technical difficulties dealt with in Parts II and III of the memorandum are fully recognised, particularly as regards the declaration that the British Government is willing to accept the position of a mandatory Power. Very possibly the League may find itself on technical grounds unable to consider the question and to accept the supervisory and controlling position offered to it.

On the other hand, in making such a declaration, His Majesty's Government would, by taking the initiative in bringing in the League of Nations, largely disarm criticism, even if the League could not, for technical reasons, accept the position offered. In particular, all the feelings which have prompted the suggestions made by members of the Labour party (quoted in Part I) would be satisfied. The real force of the proposal, however, is that the policy outlined is fundamentally right. It is right that the administration of the Sudan should remain in British hands, and that the position of the British Government should be that of holding a mandate, and it is right that the British Government should, as regards Egypt's material interests, place its action under the control of an independent body.

No sane critic could ask for more, and the fundamental justice of this course ought to satisfy, not only the opinion of the world, but, ultimately, of Egyptian public opinion.

No doubt there are disadvantages in the course. It will, in many ways, prove embarrassing to the British Government as compared with complete freedom of action, and it may also mean the assumption by the British Government of heavy financial obligations. But in view of the possibility that in any case the British Government may be forced before the League, it would appear better to take the initiative.

Further, whatever the financial obligations, the alternative of a complete evacuation of the Sudan is unthinkable.

Note by Mr. Malkin.

I understand that I am asked to advise as to the possibilities of Zaghlul's bringing the Sudan question before the League against our will.

If Zaghlul decided to do this, there are, Egypt not being a member of the League, two courses open to him.* He may induce some member of the League to bring the question to the attention of the assembly or the council under the second paragraph of article 11 of the covenant. It may be doubted whether any member of the League would be willing to do this, unless it thought its own interests were affected by the dispute, or unless it wanted to make trouble for us. But if this were done, the covenant does not lay down any such procedure for such cases, and I cannot forecast what action the council would be likely to take; but it may be assumed that there would, at any rate, be a discussion at Geneva in which both Egypt and ourselves would take part. If the result of such discussion were, in the opinion of the council, to show the existence of a dispute with which the council was competent to deal, the council would probably take much the same action as it would if the matter were brought before it by Egypt by the second method which is open to Zaghlul.

This method would be to take action under article 17. I am not aware of any case in which action under that article has been taken by the party to the dispute who is not a member of the League, but there seems no reason why it should not be.

* I think that the possibility of action under article 19 can be disregarded.

If Zaghlul were to call the attention of the League to the existence of a dispute between Egypt and Great Britain, and were to intimate Egypt's willingness to accept an invitation under article 17, I think there can be little doubt that the invitation would be given, and the council would then institute an enquiry under the second paragraph of the article.

If, in these circumstances, we wanted to prevent further action by the League, we should have either to show that there was no dispute in existence to which article 17 applies, or to persuade the council that the dispute arose out of a matter, which, by international law, was solely within our domestic jurisdiction (article 15, paragraph 8). In either case the argument would be much the same: it would, I suppose, be that Egypt was a British protectorate, that the protectorate was only terminated by an instrument in which we reserved the question of the Sudan to be settled between Egypt and ourselves, and that, in these circumstances, a dispute between Egypt and us about the Sudan cannot be regarded as an international question which is proper for submission to the League. Such an argument is not without weight, but I doubt whether it would prevail in the atmosphere of Geneva; and it must be remembered that it would not be a case of our refusing to allow the matter to be brought before the League on the grounds suggested, but of our persuading the council that the matter which was before it was not one with which it could properly deal. There would have to be a discussion at Geneva in any case, and in such a discussion the odds are always against the party which is challenging the jurisdiction of the League; and in such cases it is always open to the council to refer the preliminary point to the Permanent Court for an advisory opinion.

I should point out that it is not clear whether the word "dispute" in article 17 is to be read as equivalent to a "dispute likely to lead to a rupture" in article 15. But even if it is it would not be safe to assume that the dispute would not be regarded as one likely to lead to a rupture for the purposes of the articles in question. The tendency is against restricting the class of disputes to which the machinery of the covenant is to be applied.

If Zaghlul succeeds in getting the matter before the League he will be in rather a difficult position. For he must either admit that the 1899 convention is, and is to remain, the governing instrument, and that his complaint is against the way in which that instrument has been interpreted and administered, or attempt to demonstrate that the convention ought to be terminated and replaced by some other system. If he adopts the first course he will get into difficulties in Egypt, while if he adopts the second he will (assuming that we can take the line that we are quite prepared to carry on under the 1899 convention) find it difficult to persuade the League to deprive us of our rights under that convention. From this point of view, therefore, it is important to avoid any action which would enable Zaghlul to contend with some show of reason that we ourselves had in effect terminated the convention or made its future operation impossible. We want to leave Zaghlul with the onus of making a case for the termination of the present system.

If Zaghlul decides to stand on the 1899 convention, it is probable that the council would consider that there was a dispute as to the interpretation of that instrument, and would refer it to the Permanent Court. It does not seem that such a course would suit us, as the best that we could hope for would be a finding which would justify our action up to date, but would in all probability not cover any action which we may find it necessary to take in view of the changed conditions in Egypt.

If he adopts the second course, it would seem that our position would be a good deal easier. He will be in the position of trying to induce the League to terminate a system established under a treaty which is still in force, and if he seems likely to succeed we ought to be able to make it plain that as, on his own showing, the Anglo-Egyptian partnership has broken down, it is necessary to set up some new system which will work. In that case, the alternative would seem to be either that His Majesty's Government should alone fulfil the functions of trustees for the Sudanese (which we might well suggest should be done with League control), or that Zaghlul's contention should be accepted, and the Sudan handed over to Egypt "to dispose of as a proprietor disposes of his property." We ought to be able to prevent the institution of any intermediate solution under which it would be possible for Egypt to interfere in and hinder our administration.

September 17, 1924.

Opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

THE question is on what basis of right and expediency the British Government ought to deal with the Egyptian Government as regards the future control of the Sudan.

The first observation to be made is that the British Government had, before 1899, no juridical title to be in either Egypt or the Sudan. Britain was there in virtue of her army of occupation. This occupation survived to her alone after the French refusal to co-operate in intervention at Alexandria in 1882. The title of the British Government to be in Egypt is none the less a strong one, for without the presence of its agents and troops, order could not have been preserved in Egypt in the past.

This memorandum is concerned with the Sudan alone, but it is obvious that the question of the Sudan cannot be disentangled from that of Egypt, with which it is inextricably bound up. The dominant document is now the Boutros-Cromer Convention of 1899. This document expressly recognises the right accruing to the British Government by the conquest of the Sudan to share in its future government. The two flags are to be used together, and the supreme military and civil command of the Sudan is to be vested in a Governor-General to be appointed by Khedivial decree on the recommendation of the British Government. The Governor-General is to make the laws, and no Egyptian law is to apply to the Sudan without his consent, nor are consular agents to reside in the Sudan without such consent.

Egypt, by financial regulations made about the same time, was to balance the Sudan budget.

The present situation is that two battalions of Egyptian infantry and three batteries of artillery are quartered in the Sudan. In addition to this, there is other Egyptian military personnel of the Military Works Department, &c. Besides these, there are about 11,000 locally recruited Sudanese and Arab troops which form part of the Egyptian army. The commanding officers of the Sudanese and Arab units are British, but the junior officers are Egyptian, and Sudanese and Arab natives of the Sudan.

Apart from this, there are now in the Sudan two battalions of British infantry and some small detachments of other arms.

There is, of course, a large contingent of civil administrators, some of whom are British and others Egyptian—all under the Governor-General. All the senior officials are British.

Under the circumstances, the British may be said to be in occupation subject to such rights as are preserved to Egypt by the convention of 1899. It may be said that such powers of supervision over the administration of the Sudan as Egypt retained were in the past always exercised through British officials. In particular, the rights of financial control reserved to the Egyptian Government under the financial regulations have always been exercised through the British financial adviser in Cairo.

Under these circumstances, the proper inference appears to be that Britain is in occupation of the Sudan in substance, although the paper title is theoretically qualified by the convention of 1899. Any pretension on the part of Egypt to supersede this condition of things would therefore be contrary to the provisions of the convention.

If no satisfactory new arrangement can be come to by agreement, a dispute arises, which would be, I think, cognisable by the League of Nations if Egypt chooses to take it there, because, although Egypt is not a member of the League, she could probably get herself made one under article 17 of the covenant, and possibly under article 4. Articles 12 to 16 would then apply. Article 19 authorises the assembly to advise "the reconsideration by members of the League of treaties, which have become inapplicable, and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world." The words of this are wide, and I do not think that it would be safe to rely for the exclusion of their operation on article 21, which states that nothing in the covenant "shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace."

It seems, therefore, that it is necessary to watch for any indication of an intention on the part of the Egyptian Government to bring the question of the Sudan before the League.

It would, no doubt, be safer to keep the case outside the League of Nations. If we could simply adhere to the 1899 convention, it may well be that the League would not wish to entertain the case.

1924

16

EGYPT.

But unfortunately, by the claims which it has recently put forward publicly, the Egyptian Government seems to have indicated an intention to supersede the provisions made by the convention.

This attitude on the part of the Egyptian Government may force His Majesty's Government to take action going beyond the status quo. Under such circumstances it may be that the wisest course would be to assert our obligations to the people of the Sudan, to show that the discharge of these obligations would be imperilled if the Egyptian Government got its way, and to express our willingness to accept the position of an exclusive mandatory of the League on the footing of carrying out the substance of the policy defined by the convention.

HALDANE.

London, October 1, 1924.

[E 9544/9316/16/1924]

No. 3.

[November 2, 1924.]

Foreign Office to the Lord Chancellor.

My dear Schuster,

Foreign Office, October 29, 1924.

Egypt and the League
of Nations.

YOU will remember that some weeks ago we asked the Lord Chancellor to give us the benefit of his advice in the matter of the expediency of referring to the League of Nations the question of the future control of the Sudan.*

We are now confronted with a further problem arising out of our relations with Egypt. The Secretary-General of the League of Nations wrote a letter to Cadogan on the 10th October, enquiring whether the Protocol for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes should be communicated to Egypt. Copies of Sir Eric Drummond's letter, of the protocol in question and of the minutes written on the paper in this Department are enclosed herein. From these last you will see that Cadogan has telegraphed to Sir Eric Drummond requesting him to defer further action for the present.

The Prime Minister is most anxious that Lord Haldane should advise as to whether, having regard to the British declaration to Egypt of the 28th February, 1922, and of our notification to foreign Powers of the 15th March of that year (copies of both papers are annexed), His Majesty's Government can justifiably argue that Egypt, pending the settlement in the manner prescribed in the declaration of the four questions reserved to the discretion of His Majesty's Government, is not a fully independent State, notably in so far as the limitation of armaments is concerned, and that in consequence a copy of the protocol should not be sent to her.

H. W. MALKIN.

List of Papers.

- (1.) Sir E. Drummond to Mr. Cadogan, October 10, 1924. [E 9316/9316/16/1924.]
- (2.) Protocol for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes. [W 8487/134/98/1924.]
- (3.) Minutes on E 9316/9316/16/1924.

Opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

THE principles and procedure of the League of Nations appear to me to give rise to considerable difficulties for the British Empire, and these difficulties are not diminished by the form assumed by this protocol. Questions of a new order, on which existing public international law throws but little light, arise upon the terms of the protocol.

By Resolution I of the assembly it was decided that the protocol was not merely to be opened for signature by representatives of the League who were already in a position to sign it, but was to be held open for signature by all other States. This is in accordance with the initial heading of the protocol itself, which expressly includes non-members of the League.

Into the terms of the protocol it is not necessary for me to enter. The present question is not whether these may prove embarrassing for the British Empire, or whether the object of the policy of the League is not so great that such embarrassment ought to be faced. The question is simply whether we can oppose the communication, by the secretary-general, of the protocol to Egypt. Primarily this is purely a legal question of the interpretation of the documents of the League, including the whole of the protocol and the first resolution of the assembly on the 2nd October, 1924.

• No. 2.

EGYPT.

17

Is Egypt a "State" within the meaning of the words used? I think that, as matter of law, when we issued the declaration to Egypt in February 1922, we recognised her as an independent sovereign State. It is true that certain matters were "absolutely reserved to the discretion of His Majesty's Government until such time as it may be possible by free discussion and friendly accommodation on both sides to conclude agreements in regard thereto." These matters were—

1. The security of the communications of the British Empire in Egypt;
2. The defence of Egypt against all foreign aggression or interference, direct or indirect;
3. The protection of foreign interests in Egypt and the protection of minorities; and
4. The Sudan.

It was provided that, "pending the conclusion of such agreements, the status quo in all these matters shall remain intact."

But are these reservations such as to prevent Egypt being a State within the meaning of the words in question? Or are they more than declaratory of our intention to insist on agreements being come to with Egypt on the points stated, treating her as a pro tanto foreign and independent nation? That on these points she is not to have complete control of her own affairs does not seem to me to conclude the matter. None of them is logically or legally inconsistent with Egypt being in the position of a "State." The case is an unusual one, but the circumstances of the true status of Egypt being unusual does not seem to me to be sufficient in days in which international relations are assuming new and modified forms. A "State" may mean a State with full sovereignty, although restricted on special points.

I have had the advantage of discussing the question with Mr. Murray and Mr. Malkin. Sir C. Hurst I have not seen, but I have read his memorandum, and have considered its reasoning. I feel compelled to say that I am unable to come to a different conclusion from that in his memorandum. Egypt was not independent when she was in the occupation of our troops and under the Turkish Sultan. Now we have declared her to be in a new position.

The secretary-general is the official of the League itself, and he is bound to bring the protocol to the notice of the Egyptian Government if the Egyptian State comes within the language used in the protocol and the first resolution of the assembly. We could not prevent Egypt from receiving the protocol if the assembly decided that it should go to her. All we could do is to prevent her from taking action upon it by using, if necessary, force against her. She would probably complain that we were trying to deprive her of her power to co-operate in enforcing the sanctions in proper cases, by restricting, for instance, her export of cotton to an aggressor. Our position might bring us into sharp conflict with the League, as well as with Egypt.

It would be said that all we were entitled to do was, while recognising Egypt as an independent State, to insist on her coming to an agreement with us on four important points, which might be the subject of a treaty. If she refused we might have to go to war, but it would be into war with another State.

HALDANE.

November 2, 1924.

[E 9996/9316/16/1924]

No. 4.

[November 17, 1924.]

Foreign Office to the Lord Chancellor.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the Lord Chancellor, and begs to transmit the accompanying documents relating to the question of the communication by the League of Nations of the Geneva Protocol to Egypt.

2. As his Lordship will observe, Lord Haldane, in a written opinion, expressed the view that his successor should be asked at once, if there was still time, to consider the matter de jure. A copy of this opinion is included amongst the enclosures which accompany this letter.

[13086]

D

3. It is understood that Sir Eric Drummond will be obliged in a week's time to take steps for the distribution of the protocol, and in these circumstances it is hoped that the Lord Chancellor may be able to consider the question and express his opinion as to whether it is possible to maintain the thesis that the protocol should not be sent to Egypt, and, if so, on what grounds Sir E. Drummond should be urged to refrain from communicating it.

Foreign Office, November 10, 1924.

List of Papers.

- (1.) Opinion of Lord Chancellor, October 1, 1924. [E 8839/735/16/1924.]
- (2.) Sir E. Drummond to Mr. Cadogan, October 10, 1924. [E 9316/9316/16/1924.]
- (3.) Protocol for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes. [W 8487/134/98/1924.]
- (4.) Minutes on E 9316/9316/16/1924.
- (5.) Foreign Office to Lord Chancellor, October 29, 1924. [E 9316/9316/16/1924.]
- (6.) Opinion of the Lord Chancellor, November 2, 1924. [E 9544/9316/16/1924.]

Opinion by the Lord Chancellor.

I HAVE considered the subject-matter of this reference, and have had the advantage of discussing the questions raised with the Secretary of State for India and the Attorney-General, who concur in the following conclusions. We have been assisted by hearing the views of Sir Cecil Hurst and Mr. Murray.

It is impossible not to agree cordially with the opinion expressed by Lord Haldane that the difficulties created for the British Empire by the principles and procedure of the League of Nations are "not diminished" by the form assumed by the protocol of the 1st October, 1924, and this is notably true as to the relations between this country and Egypt. But, on the other hand, there are obvious difficulties in maintaining the position that Egypt cannot be invited to sign the protocol. By the declaration of 1922 the British protectorate over Egypt was terminated and Egypt was solemnly declared to be "an independent sovereign State." It is true that by the same instrument certain matters of great importance were absolutely reserved to the discretion of His Majesty's Government, and that the declaration (like all other documents) must be read as a whole; but many instances might be quoted where States which have entered into engagements seriously detracting from their independence have nevertheless been held to remain sovereign States, and it appears to me that it would be extremely difficult for this country, in face of the solemn declaration above quoted, to maintain the position that Egypt is not a State to which, under the resolution of the assembly dated the 2nd October, 1924, the protocol is open for signature.

At the same time, I do not think that His Majesty's Government should acquiesce without qualification in an invitation to Egypt to sign the protocol. If no caveat were now entered, it might hereafter be said that we had assented to the admission of Egypt as a party to the protocol without reserve and must accept the consequences. Having regard to this consideration, I think it desirable that an official communication should be made to the secretary of the League to the effect (1) that we understand that it is proposed to send a copy of the protocol to the Egyptian Government with a view to its being signed by them; (2) that, in this connection, we think it desirable to remind the Council of the League that the British protectorate over Egypt came to an end by virtue of the declaration made by His Majesty's Government on the 28th February, 1922, and that, under the terms of that instrument, certain questions were absolutely reserved to the discretion of His Majesty's Government until such time as an agreement might be come to regarding them with the Egyptian Government; (3) that it will be for the council to determine whether, in the circumstances, the Egyptian Government should be invited to sign the protocol; and (4) that, in any event, we are unable to admit that the protocol, if signed by Egypt, will enable the Egyptian Government to invoke the intervention of the League in the settlement of the matters reserved by the declaration to the discretion of His Majesty's Government.

In making the above suggestions I do not, of course, attempt to prescribe the precise form of the communication which should be made to the League, which will be determined by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but if he should wish us to consider the draft of the letter proposed to be sent we shall of course be ready to do so.

On receipt of the letter, Sir Eric Drummond will, no doubt, consider whether he should communicate the protocol to the Egyptian Government forthwith or should await the instructions of the Council of the League.

CAVE.

November 17, 1924.

GENERAL.

[W 3512/59/98/1924]

No. 4^A.

[Ministry of Labour.]

[April 3, 1924.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

THE opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel is desired on certain points which have arisen in regard to Article 421 of the Treaty of Versailles. This Article reads as follows:—

"The Members engage to apply Conventions which they have ratified in accordance with the provisions of this part of the present Treaty to their colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing—

- "1. Except where owing to the local conditions the Convention is inapplicable, or
- "2. Subject to such modifications as may be necessary to adapt the Convention to local conditions.

"And each of the Members shall notify to the International Labour Office the action taken in respect of each of its colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing."

The Law Officers and Counsel will no doubt recollect that Article 405 of the Treaty lays down the procedure by which proposals which are brought before the International Labour Conference may take the form of draft International Conventions for ratification by the Members, and Article 408 provides that each of the Members shall make an annual report to the International Labour Office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of Conventions to which it is a party.

All the draft Conventions which have been adopted by the Conference and ratified by the Members contain certain formal articles, and amongst these are the following:—

- (A.)—A provision that the Convention shall come into force at the date on which the ratifications of two Members of the International Labour Organisation have been registered by the Secretary-General; and
- (B.)—A provision that a Member which has ratified the Convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years after the date on which the Convention came into force by an act communicated to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations for registration, such denunciation not to take effect until one year after the date on which it has been registered at the Secretariat.

Considerable doubt has been felt as to the exact nature of the obligation which is imposed upon the Member by Article 421. The two particular questions which have arisen are—

1. If a member applies a duly ratified Convention to a colony, protectorate or possession which is not fully self-governing, with or without modification, will such Convention remain unalterable so far as that colony, &c., is concerned for the whole period of eleven years during which the Convention must of necessity remain in force? Or can it be argued that, even if a Member has applied a Convention to a colony, &c., with or without modification, if the local conditions so alter that the Member considers that an initial or a further modification of the Convention is necessary, such initial or further modification can be made at any time, although the time for denunciation of the Convention has not arrived?

GENERAL

2. Is any formal instrument required to be issued by the Member in testimony of the application of a Convention to a colony, &c., which is not fully self-governing, and is that instrument required to be registered with the Secretariat of the League of Nations in accordance with Article 18 of the Covenant?

The answers to these questions appear to depend on the interpretation placed upon the word "apply" in Article 421 of the Treaty:—

1. As regards the meaning of the word "apply" in Article 421 of the Treaty, two interpretations seem possible:—

(a.) It may be argued that the "application" of a Labour Convention to a colony is a formal act (corresponding to His Majesty's "accession" to a Treaty in respect of the colony) whereby His Majesty's Government undertake that the provisions of the Convention will be carried out in that colony. As the obligations of His Majesty's Government in respect of the colony would depend upon this formal act of "application," it would appear that His Majesty's Government could only be freed from their obligations by a further formal act, corresponding to the "denunciation" of a Treaty, and, as neither the Conventions themselves nor Article 421 of the Treaty of Versailles contain any provision for such separate denunciation in respect of colonies, presumably His Majesty's Government would be bound by their obligations in respect of the colony concerned for the whole period of duration of the Convention. The position would in fact be similar to that of a Treaty containing provision for separate accession of colonies, but no provision for separate termination in respect of colonies which have acceded. (Such Treaties are now exceptional.)

(b.) It may be argued that the "application" is merely the process of legislative and administrative action whereby His Majesty's Government give effect in any of the colonies to the general obligation, which they have already assumed by the act of "ratifying" the Convention, that action in accordance with its provisions will be taken in any colony where local circumstances render such action possible, and to the extent to which circumstances render action possible. On this interpretation the obligations of His Majesty's Government in respect of any colony would follow from the act of "ratification," but the extent of the process of "application" whereby effect is given to those obligations would depend entirely upon the circumstances of the colony and could be varied with any variation in those circumstances. Thus, if at the moment of ratification the circumstances of a colony were such that the provisions of the Convention could be carried out there, the necessary legislative and administrative action would be taken to carry them out, but if subsequently circumstances changed and it became impossible to carry out the provisions of the Convention in the colony, action could be suspended forthwith without any formal "denunciation" being given. Equally, if at the time of ratification the circumstances of a colony were such that the provisions of the Convention could not be carried out, no action would be taken in the colony, but, if subsequently circumstances changed and it became possible to carry out its provisions, the necessary action would forthwith be taken without any formal act in the nature of "accession" to the Convention being effected.

In support of the former interpretation, it may be possible to rely on the use of the words "to apply" (in the French, "appliquer") at the beginning of the Article. It might be inferred from the use of these words that the power to modify relates to the application, and that a modification subsequent to application would not, in fact, be the application of a modified Convention, which alone is permissible. It may also be possible that the use of the words "the action taken" (in the French, "la décision qu'il se propose de prendre") supports this interpretation, more especially the way the words are rendered in French, and that this phrase imports one single action, and does not appear to contemplate more than one action.

On the other hand, it is thought that it is dangerous to attempt to interpret the Articles of the Treaty in the light of isolated phrases which may appear in various parts of the Articles. It must of course be remembered that there was great difficulty in rendering the provisions of the Treaty both in English and in French, and that in a number of cases the real meaning of the Articles may be somewhat obscured by the actual words used. It is suggested that Article 421 was drawn in this way for the purpose of allowing a very free hand to the Members in the application of Conventions to their colonies, &c., which are not fully self-governing, and that modifications subsequent to the original decision as to application must have been contemplated, because of the difficulty of envisaging at the date of the original decision changes in the local conditions throughout the colony during the next eleven years, which might render the Convention quite inapplicable.

In this connection it is thought that the attention of the Law Officers and Counsel should be called to a declaration made by the British Delegates on the Commission on International Labour Legislation which was set up in Paris for the purpose of preparing the draft of Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles, and which was presided over by Mr. Samuel Gompers. At the 22nd meeting of the Gompers Commission the British Delegates caused a declaration to be recorded in the minutes of the Commission that "The decision taken by a State as to the measure in which it will apply a Convention to its colonies should be taken with full independence and without the control of the International Conference." This declaration has been quoted by the Ministry of Labour in official correspondence with the International Labour Office and has not been challenged. It is felt on general grounds, however, that it is better that an interpretation of any of the Articles of the Treaty should not be based upon the minutes of this Commission, or indeed upon any "travaux préparatoires."

It can no doubt be said that if the "application" is to be regarded as a single formal act any difficulty can easily be got over by inserting a modification in the application of the Convention providing that the Convention shall only remain in force as far as that particular colony is concerned for one, two or more years, and that after that period of time the application shall be reconsidered.

This of course is quite true; but this line of reasoning does not seem to be really material in considering the true implication of the provisions of the Article.

It may also be argued that it is undesirable to import into a discussion of the position in relation to Labour Conventions such conceptions as that of "accession," which apply to treaties proper, having regard to the special nature of Labour Conventions, which are negotiated by conferences composed not only of Government delegates, but also of delegates representing the employers and workers of the Member States, which do not bear the signature of the delegates who have negotiated them, and which are ratified not by a formal ratification by His Majesty, but by Orders of the Lords of the Council confirming and approving them. A specimen of such an Order is sent herewith.

2. As regards the question whether any formal instrument is required to be issued by the member in testimony of the application of the Convention to a colony, &c., which is not fully self-governing, and, further, whether that instrument is required to be registered with the Secretariat of the League under article 18 of the Covenant, the answer would seem to depend upon whether the Law Officers and Counsel advise whether the application is in the nature of an "accession" to a treaty or not. It is submitted that, if the application is not in the nature of an "accession," nothing more than a letter to the Secretary-General of the League notifying the fact of the application would be required; but if, on the other hand, the application is in the nature of an "accession," it would seem that some formal instrument is necessary. If the Law Officers and Counsel advise that a formal instrument is necessary, it is suggested that this would best take the form of a declaration signed either by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (as the Minister concerned with the Treaty relations of this country) or the Secretary of State for the Colonies (as the Minister responsible for the carrying out of the Convention in the colonies).

Article 18 of the Covenant is as follows:—

"Every Treaty or international engagement entered into thereafter by any Member of the League shall be forthwith registered with the Secretariat and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such Treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered."

The Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel are requested to advise:—

1. Whether the "application" of a draft Convention to a colony, protectorate, or possession which is not fully self-governing is in the nature of an "accession" to a Treaty, or merely of a legislative and administrative process.

2. Whether such "application" can be revoked or modified at any time during the currency of the Convention, or whether an initial modification alone is permissible.
3. Whether a formal instrument is required to be issued by the Member in testimony of the "application" of a Convention to a colony, &c., which is not fully self-governing; what form such instrument should take, and whether such instrument is required to be registered in accordance with the provisions of Article 18 of the Covenant.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

IN our opinion the formal incidents of a Treaty, such as "accession" thereto in respect of a colony are not appropriate to the Conventions now under consideration. We think that the "application" intended by Article 421 of the Treaty of Versailles involves merely an administrative or legislative process.

2. Such application can be modified or revoked if the local conditions alter within the meaning of the proviso of Article 421 at any time during the currency of the Convention.

3. We think that no formal instrument is required for the purpose of notifying to the International Labour Office the action taken. In our opinion the communication made to that Office is not required to be registered.

PATRICK HASTINGS.
HENRY H. SLESSER.
CECIL W. LILLEY.

*Law Officers Department,
April 3, 1924.*

[W 6251/59/98/1924]

No. 4ⁿ.

[Ministry of Labour.]

[June 2, 1924.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

HEREWITH—

International Labour
Conventions:
obligations
under Treaty of Versailles,
Part XIII,
Labour
Clauses.

1. Case submitted to Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel in 1921.
2. Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel 1921.*
3. Copy pamphlet entitled "Labour and the Peace Treaty."
4. Copy draft conventions and recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference at its first annual meeting.

The Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel are requested to advise as to the nature and extent of the obligations incurred by the Crown in connection with draft conventions under article 405 of Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles.

1. In 1921 the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel (being the present Lord Chief Justice of England, the present Master of the Rolls and Mr. C. W. Lilley) advised on certain matters arising out of the labour clauses (Part XIII) of the treaty. The case then put to the Law Officers and Counsel and their opinion thereon are forwarded herewith.*

2. Some time has now elapsed since that opinion was given, and its interpretation of the obligation incurred by the Crown in relation to draft conventions has in the meantime been the subject of criticism and controversy. It may, however, be remarked that the practice of the late Governments in connection with draft conventions has not in fact confined itself to the action which is alone obligatory on the Crown according to the opinion given in 1921 and outlined in paragraph 3 hereof. In fact the following course has been followed:—

The draft conventions adopted at an International Labour Conference have been laid on the tables of both Houses in the form of a White Paper. Further, after deciding whether it was desirable to ratify any or all of such draft conventions, the Government has moved the House of Commons that that House approves of its policy in relation to those draft conventions. On this motion, the Government has explained its decision to the House with regard to the draft conventions, and an opportunity has thus been given for discussion and criticism of the attitude so defined.

* Confidential 11933, p. 8.

In spite of the action indicated above, critics of the late Governments have asserted, and still assert, that the obligations of the Crown under article 405 have not and are not being fulfilled, and in consequence the present Government feel that they are called upon to give fresh consideration to the matters arising out of the labour clauses of the treaty, and accordingly the question of the nature of the obligation of the Crown in regard to draft conventions is re-submitted to the present Law Officers and Counsel.

3. The view of the Law Officers and Counsel in 1921 and the arguments (not repeated here), which may have had an influence on that view, will be found respectively in their opinion and in the case submitted to them; that opinion was to the effect that the only obligation resting on the Crown with regard to a draft convention is an obligation to consider it for the purpose of deciding whether or not the Crown will ratify it. The alternative interpretation which has been urged necessitates an obligation of a much wider nature—namely, that the Crown has undertaken to bring all draft conventions before Parliament whether it proposes to ratify them or not.

4. These interpretations are called here for convenience "the limited", and "the extended."

The limited interpretation is based, at least in part, on the broad assumption that the Treaty of Versailles could not and indeed was not intended to alter the domestic law and constitutional practice of this country or involve any infringement or limitation of the Crown's prerogative.

It is argued by those who contend for the extended interpretation that it is more consistent with the spirit of the labour clauses of the treaty and with what appears, from the marked passages on pp. 12 and 13 of the pamphlet entitled "Labour and the Peace Treaty" (forwarded herewith), to have been in the minds of those concerned with the framing of those clauses.

5. There seems little doubt that the limited interpretation is more in accord with what has hitherto been the constitutional practice, for the extended interpretation would mean that an obligation rests on the Crown to bring before the Houses of Parliament every draft convention, including even a draft convention which might have been opposed by the delegates of the British Government and which that Government might not wish to apply to this country, thus implying a restriction on the prerogative hitherto unknown to the Constitution.

6. Against these considerations, however, it has been contended that a draft convention under the treaty is a new sort of international instrument, and that it is consequently necessary to admit some modification of the existing practice since that practice was formed on the basis of an international system which possessed points of difference from that embodied in the treaty. It has been argued, therefore, that the proper attitude for the Crown to take as to its obligation with respect to a draft convention is not so much to endeavour to fit the provisions of article 405 into the existing practice, which was necessarily adapted to a different state of things, but rather to interpret them in the light of the general intentions of the framers of Part XIII of the treaty as explained by the pamphlet above referred to. It is, of course, for the consideration of the Law Officers and Counsel whether such a method of interpretation is in the circumstances admissible, and, if so, to what extent; but if it is permissible, so far as this country is concerned, to pay regard in construing the treaty to matters extraneous to the document itself, there can be little doubt that those who framed article 405 did have in mind that draft conventions should be brought before the Legislature by each Member.

As the Law Officers and Counsel are no doubt aware, the law and practice of the Constitution relating to treaties in this country differs in important particulars from such law and practice in other countries who were signatories to the Treaty of Versailles. It is possible that this difference may have been overlooked by the persons responsible for framing the words of this article and therefore it is hardly a matter of surprise that difficulties have arisen in applying the words of the article to the machinery of the Constitution in this country.

7. The terms of article 405 of the treaty expressly confer upon each Member an obligation to "bring the . . . draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action," and the crucial questions arising here appear to be—

(a.) What is meant by "the matter"? and

(b.) Who in Great Britain is "the authority within whose competence the matter lies"?

8. On the one hand it is argued in support of the limited interpretation that by the words "the matter" the article is referring to the ratification of the draft convention, and that the authority within whose competence the matter of ratification lies is in this country the Crown acting upon the advice of the Executive Government. The Crown acting upon the advice of the Executive Government is indisputably the treaty-making authority in this country, and as such it is the competent authority for the ratification of all international agreements: it would therefore follow from this view that the Crown having "brought a draft convention before itself" for consideration whether or not it should be ratified, if the Crown does not wish to ratify the draft convention, it is under no further obligation; if, however, it wishes to ratify a draft convention that can only become effective through legislation, then, presumably, the Crown would endeavour to secure the legislation from Parliament before communicating the formal ratification.

9. The alternative considerations urged in support of the extended interpretation may be summarised as follows:—

- (a.) By article 405 the Crown has undertaken to bring a draft convention before an authority or authorities with a particular purpose in view, namely, "for the enactment of legislation or other action."
- (b.) The only authority in this country which is competent to enact legislation is the King in Parliament.
- (c.) In respect therefore of any draft convention which would entail legislation, it cannot be said that the Crown has satisfied the obligation resting on it until it has brought that draft convention before both Houses of Parliament.

In support of this view it is urged that where article 405 speaks of "the authority . . . within whose competence the matter lies," it is referring by the words "the matter" not to the power of ratification, but rather to the application of the terms of the draft convention to the labour conditions of this country; and it is argued that this is borne out when the objects of the machinery set up in Part XIII of the treaty are considered. Put shortly, these objects as set out in the preamble to the labour clauses are to alter and improve the conditions of labour; and it is said therefore that since a draft convention embodies a particular proposal or proposals to this end, the obligation resting on the Crown is an obligation to refer to the body which is responsible for the conditions of labour in this country the question whether the draft convention shall or shall not be applied to those conditions. This body is the King in Parliament.

If the interpretation of the article is approached from an extrinsic point of view, these considerations are of undoubted weight, but in testing them by examination of the treaty itself it is important to bear in mind the paragraph of article 405 which (except for a short paragraph dealing only with recommendations) follows next upon the paragraph now in dispute:—

"In the case of a draft convention the Member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the Secretary-General, and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective such provisions of the convention."

It will be observed that in this paragraph the same phrase—viz., "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies"—is again employed, and it seems indisputable that, in this paragraph at any rate, the "matter" referred to is the matter of ratification, and accordingly that the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies means the authority or authorities within whose competence it is to ratify. It can hardly be suggested that Parliament is the authority within whose competence it is to ratify, for that would mean that, by the general and somewhat obscure words of article 405, the Crown had abdicated its established and hitherto incontrovertible position as the treaty-making power of this country and consented to become no more than the channel of communication between the conferences set up under Part XIII of the treaty and the two Houses of Parliament. If that intention were indeed in the minds of the persons responsible for the framing of the treaty, it could presumably only have been because their minds were addressed to countries where the constitutional position is different from that obtaining in Great Britain.

It seems therefore to be almost beyond dispute that, in this latter paragraph at any rate, the phrase "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies" means, with reference to Great Britain, not Parliament but the Crown.

In a document drafted under the conditions which prevailed at the making of the Peace Treaty, it is not impossible that words should have been used even in successive paragraphs of the same article, in different senses, but it is for consideration whether there is sufficient extraneous evidence here to rebut the presumption that the language used means the same thing in both places.

Moreover, in all other matters arising out of the Peace Treaty wherein a Member is concerned, there is no doubt that the decisive responsibility is the responsibility of the Member. As far as this country is concerned the "Member" is the Crown acting on the advice of the Executive, and as the Member, it is for the Crown (of course, on the advice of the Executive) to decide the policy of this country and the international commitments that this country is prepared to undertake. It seems difficult therefore to contend that the status of the Member can be said to have undergone a diminution by virtue of anything that is expressed or implied in article 405. It would mean that the Member, whose decision is final on every other matter arising out of the treaty, ceases to have any voice in deciding the international policy of this country in the case of a draft convention. No discretion or control is thereby left in the Member, but the decisive voice is transferred to a body that is not a Member under the Peace Treaty; and the Member can be compelled to undertake obligations in regard to a draft convention of which it disapproves.

Further, if indeed there is an obligation on the part of the Member to bring a draft convention before Parliament, it is not easy to see what is the precise extent of the obligation. To take a single instance, in the case of a draft convention requiring legislation, Parliament might approve of the general terms of the draft convention itself. If such approval constitutes "the consent of the authority" under article 405, it would seem that such approval would itself constitute ratification, or if that be constitutionally impossible, there would at least be an obligation on the Crown to ratify the draft convention. Having ratified the draft convention, a further obligation would fall on the Crown to promote legislation in accordance with the ratified convention. Apart from the fact that this would mean that the Government might thus find itself under an obligation to introduce a measure which it did not approve, the further difficulty might arise that Parliament, when confronted with the matter of a convention in the form of a detailed Bill applying to the labour conditions of this country, might refuse to pass such Bill into law. It would be almost impossible to unravel the entanglements which might arise in these circumstances.

The Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel are therefore requested to advise as follows:—

1. Whether there is an obligation on the Crown under article 405 of the Treaty of Versailles to bring all draft conventions before Parliament.
2. If "Yes," what is the procedure to be adopted, especially with regard to the position that would arise were His Majesty's Government opposed to the application of the particular draft convention in question?

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. C. W. Lilley.

In our opinion the terms of article 405 of the Treaty of Versailles do not impose an obligation to bring all draft conventions before Parliament.

In this country the Crown, acting through the executive Government, is the only authority which can ratify a draft convention, and in our view a draft convention under the terms of article 405 has to be considered by that authority, and not in the first instance by Parliament.

The Government, if it decides that the draft convention should be ratified, must then proceed to secure, in so far as it can, the enactment of whatever legislation may be necessary, or take the necessary administrative action if legislation be not necessary.

2. This question does not arise.

PATRICK HASTINGS.
HENRY N. SLESSER.
CECIL W. LILLEY.

*Law Officers' Department,
June 2, 1924.*

[T 6445/1806/377/1924]

No. 5.

[June 24, 1924.]

Foreign Office to the Lord Chancellor.

Transmission of information to judges of High Court in cases affecting rights of foreign Governments.

HIS Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the Lord Chancellor, and would be much obliged if his Lordship would be so good as to advise him in the following circumstances.

2. A question has arisen as to the appropriate method by which information should be conveyed to the judges of the High Court in cases affecting the rights of foreign Governments and their property.

3. An action was recently commenced in the High Court (King's Bench Division) by the Compañía Mercantil Argentina against the United States Shipping Board. In due course a motion to dismiss the action was made on behalf of the Shipping Board upon the ground that the Shipping Board was a branch of the United States Government and that its vessels were, therefore, not subject to the jurisdiction of the court. The solicitors for the defendants submitted in support of the motion a statement to this effect from the United States Ambassador. Mr. Justice Roche refused to receive the certificate from the solicitors, and said that he could only receive it if it was sent to him through the Foreign Office. The proceedings were accordingly adjourned for a few days in order to enable this to be done, and in due course the certificate by the Ambassador was handed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who transmitted it to the judge. The question is whether the Foreign Office constitutes the proper channel for the transmission of documents of this character.

3. In 1919 certain cases arose in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, in the course of which similar questions arose. Correspondence took place at the time between the Foreign Office and the president of that division upon the subject, and it was explained to the president that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs considered that the more appropriate procedure would be that statements of this kind should be made direct to the court by the representative of the Government concerned through the legal practitioners who were conducting the proceedings. The President of the Admiralty Division accepted this view, and in no further cases has any application been made by the judges of that division for certificates of the character in question to be sent through the Foreign Office. On the other hand, a letter which the Secretary of State has now received from Mr. Justice Roche in the case first mentioned above (Compañía Mercantil Argentina v. the United States Shipping Board) leads him to infer that the judge considers that the judicature of this country cannot properly receive communications from a Government through a diplomatic representative of a foreign Power direct, but that all communications must reach them through the medium of the Foreign Office.

4. This view appears to place the Foreign Secretary in a somewhat embarrassing position. He has no means of judging of the accuracy of the statements contained in the communication, whereas if it is he who transmits the certificate to the court, it is inevitable that the court should regard the certificate as vouched for by him. Transmission of the document in such circumstances cannot be regarded merely as a legalisation of the Ambassador's signature. The immunity of property from the jurisdiction of the courts on the ground that it is Government property is primarily a question of fact. The fact of Government ownership requires to be proved to the court, and the responsibility for establishing the facts should rest upon the representatives of the Government concerned. It is not a matter upon which the Foreign Secretary has any special knowledge, and there does not appear to be any reason why he should be brought into the question at all, even as a channel of communication.

5. On the other hand, a case occurred recently in which the High Court, without reference to the Foreign Office, acted upon evidence supplied by the defendant in a matter peculiarly within the province of the Foreign Office and upon which it is the Foreign Secretary alone who is entitled to express an opinion. In the case of Assurantie Compagnie Excelsior v. Tom Smith (reported in the "Times" of the 21st November, 1923), the defendant pleaded that he was on the staff of the United States Embassy in London, and therefore was entitled to diplomatic immunities and to the benefits of the Statute of Anne. Mr. Justice McCardie, before whom the case came, accepted the statement of the defendant on this point without any reference to the Foreign Office. The case subsequently came before the Court of Appeal and the dismissal of the suit on the ground of the diplomatic immunity was upheld. Whether or not a particular individual is borne on the diplomatic list recognised by the Foreign Office appears to be a question upon which the Foreign Office and the Foreign Office alone is entitled to speak. With some of the representatives of the minor Powers there might be great opportunity for abuse if they were allowed to claim the privileges of diplomatic immunity for any person they pleased. The Foreign Office claims and always has claimed the right to supervise the list, though in normal cases it accepts without question the statements made by the foreign Ambassador or Minister concerned. It is only because the question whether an individual is borne on the diplomatic list in London is a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the Foreign Office that if the question arises in litigation in the courts it seems desirable that application should be made to the Foreign Office on the subject.

6. Copies of the recent letter from Mr. Justice Roche and of the correspondence between the Foreign Office and the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division in 1919 are enclosed for the Lord Chancellor's information.

7. The Lord Chancellor is requested to inform the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—

- (1.) Whether he thinks that, in cases such as that covered by the correspondence of 1919 and the recent letter from Mr. Justice Roche, there is any need for statements from the foreign Ambassador or Minister concerned to be communicated to the court through the Foreign Office;
- (2.) Whether he concurs with the view of the Secretary of State that, in any case in which a question arises whether a particular person is borne on the diplomatic list in this country, the court should require the fact to be proved by reference to the Foreign Office; and
- (3.) Whether his Lordship would have any objection to communicating the views which he may be good enough to express to His Majesty's judges.

Foreign Office, March 24, 1924.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Foreign Office to Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, November 25, 1919. [152151. F 139415/1919.]
- (B.) Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division to Foreign Office, December 22, 1919. [164429. F 139415/1919.]
- (C.) United States Ambassador to Foreign Office, February 19, 1924. [T 1806/1806/377/1924.]
- (D.) Foreign Office to Mr. Justice Roche, February 20, 1924. [T 1806/1806/377/1924.]
- (E.) Mr. Justice Roche to Foreign Office, February 21, 1924. [T 1903/1806/377/1924.]
- (F.) Assurantie Compagnie Excelsior v. Tom Smith. ("Times," November 21, 1923.)

Opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

House of Lords, June 24, 1924.

THE Lord Chancellor presents his compliments to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and, in reply to Mr. Secretary Ramsay MacDonald's communication of the 24th March, directs me to enclose a copy of a letter received from the private secretary to the Lord Chief Justice and to say that the Lord Chancellor concurs in the views expressed in that letter.

Enclosure.

Private Secretary to the Lord Chief Justice to Sir Claud Schuster.

*Royal Courts of Justice, London,
June 23, 1924.*

Dear Schuster,

I AM desired by the Lord Chief Justice, with reference to your letter of the 2nd April, to say that he is of opinion—

1. That in cases such as those covered by the correspondence of 1919, and the letter from Mr. Justice Roche referred to in the communication from the Foreign Office, he agrees with the view of the Secretary of State that there is no

[13086]

E 2

- need for statements from the foreign Ambassador or Minister concerned to be communicated to the court through the Foreign Office; and
2. That he agrees with the view of the Secretary of State that in any case in which a question arises whether a particular person is borne on the diplomatic list in this country, the Foreign Office should be referred to for information on the point, but that the view of the Foreign Office as to whether a person is entitled to immunity in any particular case should not necessarily be regarded by the court as conclusive.

Yours very truly,
W. BOWSTEAD.

[T 7511/832/378/1924]

No. 54.

[Home Office.]

[July 8, 1924.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Resumption of British nationality
under
"British
Nationality and Status of Aliens
Act, 1914."

CASES have arisen from time to time in which persons who, prior to the 1st January, 1915, when "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," ceased to be in force, have lost their British nationality during their minority in consequence of the operation of section 10 (3) of that Act desire to resume that nationality by making a declaration to that effect within one year of attaining majority in accordance with the procedure provided by sub-section (2) of section 12 of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914." It has hitherto been considered that this procedure is not available for persons who lost their British nationality before the commencement of the Act of 1914 (the 1st January, 1915), and applications for the registration of declarations in such cases have accordingly been refused. The correctness of this view has been questioned, however, and the opinion of the Law Officers is desired as to whether this view is right.

2. The relevant enactments are as follows:—

Naturalisation Act, 1870.

"Section 6. Any British subject who has at any time before, or may at any time after, the passing of this Act, when in any foreign State and not under any disability, voluntarily become naturalised in such State, shall, from and after the time of his so having become naturalised in such foreign State, be deemed to have ceased to be a British subject and be regarded as an alien."

"Section 10 (3). Where the father, being a British subject, or the mother, being a British subject and a widow, becomes an alien in pursuance of this Act, every child of such father or mother who, during infancy, has become resident in the country where the father or mother is naturalised, and has, according to the laws of such country, become naturalised therein, shall be deemed to be a subject of the State of which the father or mother has become a subject, and not a British subject."

British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

"Section 12 (1). Where a person, being a British subject, ceases to be a British subject, whether by declaration of alienage or otherwise, every child of that person, being a minor, shall thereupon cease to be a British subject, unless such child, on that person ceasing to be a British subject, does not become by the law of any other country naturalised in that country."

"Provided that, where a widow who is a British subject marries an alien, any child of hers by her former husband shall not, by reason only of her marriage, cease to be a British subject, whether he is residing outside His Majesty's dominions or not."

"(2.) Any child who has so ceased to be a British subject may, within one year after attaining his majority, make a declaration that he wishes to resume British nationality, and shall thereupon again become a British subject."

("The Naturalisation Act, 1870," was repealed by the Act of 1914 as from the 1st January, 1915, when the latter Act came into operation.)

3. The short point for consideration appears to be whether section 12 of the Act of 1914, and in particular the expression "Any child who has so ceased to be a British subject" in sub-section (2), can be construed in a retrospective sense so as to include cases where the child had ceased to be a British subject before the Act of 1914 came into operation, or whether the expression means simply "any child who has lost British nationality under sub-section (1) of this section."

4. "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," is a consolidating as well as an amending enactment, and it may be argued—with special reference to the words "or otherwise" in section 12 (1)—that the language of section 12 is quite wide enough to extend to any children who have lost their British nationality in circumstances similar to those specified in sub-section (1) of section 12, viz., in the circumstances provided in section 10 (3) of the repealed Act. The provisions of section 12 of the Act of 1914 might, on that basis, be regarded as a recognition by Parliament of the desirability of putting an end to the previous disability attaching to such children of British birth. Further, the more limited interpretation of the section may be said to involve an unfair discrimination between two categories of British-born children who have lost British nationality in circumstances which are substantially similar, and it is to be observed that the class of children which might have lost British nationality under section 10 (3) of the former Act of 1870 are, where they have lost British nationality on or after the 1st January, 1915, eligible to resume British nationality under section 12 (2) of the Act of 1914.

5. On the other hand, to hold that those who have lost their British nationality under the Act of 1870, before the Act of 1914 came into force, enjoy the benefits of section 12 of the latter Act would appear to involve some strain upon the language used in section 12. Thus it would appear to be necessary to read the word "ceases" in the first line of sub-section (1) of section 12 as including "has ceased at any time before that Act came into operation," with corresponding interpretations of the other verbs in the sub-section. Further, it may be observed that section 10 (3) of the Act of 1870 is not identical either in phraseology or effect with section 12 (1) of the Act of 1914. In particular there is, in section 12 (1) of the Act of 1914, no mention of the residence of the child in the country where the father or mother is naturalised; whereas such residence is a condition necessary to the operation of section 10 (3) of the Act of 1870. Nor is there in section 10 (3) any reference such as there is in section 12 (1) to the effect upon the child of a declaration of alienage which the parent could, in certain circumstances, make under section 4 of the same Act.

6. Under the Act of 1870 the only means by which the children of British subjects who have lost their British nationality under section 10 (3) of that Act could regain their British nationality was by readmission under section 8—a process which was hardly distinguishable in practice from the grant of a certificate of naturalisation—and the facilities available to them under the latter section have been preserved and increased by sections 2 and 5 (2) of the Act of 1914. Under the latter section the Secretary of State has absolute discretion in any special case to grant a certificate of naturalisation to any minor whether or not the conditions required by the Act (e.g., as to residence) have been complied with, although in practice it has been thought desirable as a general rule to restrict the grant of such certificates to those minors who are in fact resident in the United Kingdom or some other part of His Majesty's dominions. Such children are therefore in a slightly better position than they were before the passing of the Act of 1914, irrespective of the question whether or not they are eligible to make the declaration contemplated by section 12 (2).

7. In the absence of anything in the course of this legislation which necessarily leads to the inference that the Legislature must have intended to extend the benefits of section 12 of the Act of 1914 to children who had lost their British nationality under an earlier repealed Act, the difficulties in the way of interpreting the language of section 12 in this sense appear to be great.

The Law Officers are requested to advise—

Whether a person who has lost his British nationality by the operation of section 10 (3) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870" can make a valid declaration in pursuance of section 12 (2) of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," and thereupon again become a British subject?

Home Office, June 19, 1924.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

In our opinion, a person who has lost his British nationality by the operation of section 10 (3) of the Naturalisation Act of 1870 cannot make a valid declaration in pursuance of section 12 (2) of "The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914," and cannot thereupon again become a British subject.

PATRICK HASTINGS.
HENRY H. SLESSER.

Law Officers' Department,
July 8, 1924.

[W 6062/338/98/1924]

No. 6.

[July 21, 1924.]

Memorandum respecting Compulsory Jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Compulsory acceptance of Jurisdiction of
Permanent Court of International
Justice.

THE Permanent Court of International Justice was set up in accordance with article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which reads:—

"The council shall formulate, and submit to the members of the League for adoption, plans for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice. The court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it. The court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the council or by the assembly."

Article 36 of the statute of the court reads:—

"The jurisdiction of the court comprises all cases which the parties refer to it and all matters specially provided for in treaties and conventions in force."

"The members of the League of Nations and the States mentioned in the annex to the covenant may, either when signing or ratifying the protocol to which the present statute is adjoined, or at a later moment, declare that they recognise as compulsory, ipso facto, and without special agreement, in relation to any other member or State accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the court in all or any of the classes of legal disputes concerning:—

"(a.) The interpretation of a treaty;

"(b.) Any question of international law;

"(c.) The existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;

"(d.) The nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation."

"The declaration referred to above may be made unconditionally, or on condition of reciprocity on the part of several or certain members or States, or for a certain time."

"In the event of a dispute as to whether the court has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the court."

It is urged by Mr. Lowes Dickinson that the optional declaration provided for in this article should be made by His Majesty's Government.

This declaration has so far been made by—

Austria.	Finland.	Norway.
Brazil.	Haiti.	Panamá.
Bulgaria.	Latvia.	Portugal.
China.	Liberia.	Salvador.
Costa Rica.	Lithuania.	Sweden.
Denmark.	Luxemburg.	Switzerland.
Esthonia.	Netherlands.	Uruguay.

and ratified by—

Austria.	Esthonia.	Norway.
Brazil.	Finland.	Portugal.
Bulgaria.	Haiti.	Sweden.
China.	Lithuania.	Switzerland.
Denmark.	Netherlands.	Uruguay.

Acceptance is, in some cases, for five years only, and it is generally subject to reciprocity.

The question of accepting compulsory jurisdiction of the court for this country was considered in relation to a draft statute earlier than the statute actually adopted; the earlier draft made jurisdiction compulsory without option. The decision of the Cabinet (the 18th October, 1920) was adverse, on the grounds—

1. That compulsory jurisdiction went far beyond article 14 of the covenant, which only contemplates a scheme for a court to hear disputes which the parties thereto may voluntarily submit to its jurisdiction.
2. The scheme was detrimental to us as a sea Power, since it would enable predominantly land Powers to build up a code of international law which would fetter the exercise of our sea power. Unless precautions were taken to prevent its application being made retrospective, it would even enable appeal to be made against the decision of our prize courts in the late war.
3. Even if it were generally recognised that decisions of the court in particular cases did not constitute future precedents, the fact that the court had given a decision might seriously hamper Great Britain in a future war and strengthen the position of neutral States against her.

Sir Eyre Crowe wrote of the early draft:—

"The most dangerous provision is an article under which the court will have power to decide any question of international law which any State thinks fit to bring before it."

"To judge of the merits of such a provision, the best means is to consider what might and would have happened in the time of our greatest national peril—during the late war—if this provision had been in force."

"Every single point which either our enemies or any neutral State had chosen to raise against us in regard to the blockade, or any of the special measures we took which interfered with neutral trade, would certainly have been brought before the court. The United States would undoubtedly have taken a strong and leading part in obtaining decisions adverse to our interests. It is more than doubtful whether we should have got judgments in our favour on any issue so raised. The effect of adverse decisions, coupled with the infliction of heavy penalties (which are also to be within the powers of the court), would have been to cripple us, probably beyond recovery. We should have had to choose between losing the war or defying the International Court."

"I cannot believe that any scheme is sound which created such a situation."

Sir C. Hurst wrote:—

"Under article 33 one State can, in case of a dispute, be brought against its will before the tribunal by another, and under article 34 between States which are members of the League the court shall have jurisdiction (without any special agreement) to determine any case of a legal nature concerning a question in international law. The effect of these two articles appears to be such that, if the tribunal existed during a great war in which the British Empire was taking part, any neutral nation, one of whose ships or cargoes had been seized by the British fleet and which was dissatisfied with such British belligerent action as being unjustified by international law, would be entitled, if His Majesty's Government declined to accord satisfaction, to bring the case before this new permanent court. It reproduces, in fact, in an even balder manner, all which the scheme for the creation of an international prize court would have achieved. That scheme for an international prize court, which was worked out in 1907 after the experiences of the Russo-Japanese war, was rejected by Great Britain, and most people now think wisely rejected. So far as I can see, this scheme for the Permanent Court of International Justice contains no safeguards or limitations which would exclude the court from dealing with matters as to which the national prize courts should be final."

A memorandum by the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers of the Crown contained the passage:—

"In our opinion there are good grounds for apprehending that the establishment of such a court as is suggested—at all events at the present time—would be contrary to the interests of this country. Under articles 33 and 34 a State can, in case of a dispute, be brought, against its will, before the court by another, and as between States which are members of the League the court is to have jurisdiction, without any special agreement, to determine any case of a legal nature concerning a question in international law. It may, we think, be gravely doubted whether it would be politic for Great Britain in any circumstances to bind herself to refer any disputes which might arise in the future within this very wide jurisdiction to a tribunal of whose impartiality she has no assurance. It may be asked, perhaps, whether it is reasonable to expect impartiality from any permanent international court. And there are special reasons why this country should not be a party to such an engagement now. It is well known that some neutral nations (e.g., Sweden and Holland) are dissatisfied with our proceedings during the war, and also with some of the decisions of our prize courts. If the proposed court were established it would be open to these and other States to make claims based on such proceedings, and, if they were not settled diplomatically, to carry them before the new court, with the result that we might, and probably should, have to pay very heavy compensation, and various decisions of the prize courts might, in effect, be reversed."

GENERAL.

The question of sanctions for the judgment of the court becomes of particular importance in cases where a party appears before it with reluctance. On this point Sir Eyre Crowe wrote in connection with the earlier draft:—

"There is nothing in the draft scheme, so far as I can see, to regulate the execution of any judgment given by the International Court. Such judgments are bound, in many cases, to call for action by the defeated Government which may require parliamentary sanction. What guarantee is there that such sanction will invariably be forthcoming? It may be argued that each Government pledges itself to carry the necessary legislation, and that this corresponds to what happens when a Government signs a treaty the provisions of which can only be carried out in virtue of special legislation to be passed."

"But the position is not strictly analogous. A Government when signing a treaty or even when advising the King to ratify a treaty, may consider itself to be in a position to ensure that the particular treaty is approved by Parliament. In the last resort, a treaty signed, but not ratified, can be nullified by refusing ratification. This is what happened to the Prize Court Bill after its defeat in the House of Lords."

"But a judgment rendered in the International Court is final. It cannot be repudiated. At the same time, no Government can foretell what kind of claim against it may some day form the subject of an international judgment. At the moment when the judgment is given, the Government against whom it is given may realise that in no case would the national Parliament pass the necessary legislation to give effect to it. But it will then be too late."

"This difficulty is likely to arise in an acute form in the United States. I very much doubt whether any American Government or President could give a really effective pledge that a judgment given against an American Government will be executed, especially if the consent of the Senate should be required."

"Hitherto the United States have invariably adopted the attitude of strongly advocating international courts, arbitrations, compulsory adjudications, &c., and then blandly explaining that the Constitution of America was so peculiar as to require that all the obligations specially binding upon other countries must be modified in favour of the United States."

"I think Great Britain should never agree to any international jurisdiction unless at least the United States are equally and fully bound by it. So long as the United States are not members of the League of Nations, I think His Majesty's Government should firmly resist to submit to it."

"All our best expert opinion, after all, is that we have everything that is practically required and practically valuable, in the existing Permanent Court at The Hague."

We are already under extensive obligations under article 13 of the Covenant of the League, which reads as follows:—

"The members of the League agree that, whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognise to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject-matter to arbitration."

GENERAL.

"Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration."

"For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them."

"The members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered and that they will not resort to war against a member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto."

Foreign Office, March 17, 1924.

Memorandum by Sir C. Hurst

THE question under consideration is whether His Majesty's Government would gain or lose by acceding to the optional clause in the statute creating the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague, whereby the signatories accept an obligation to submit to the court all disputes on legal matters which may arise between them. The actual text of the provision in article 36 is as follows:—

"The members of the League of Nations and the States mentioned in the annex to the covenant may, either when signing or ratifying the protocol to which the present statute is adjoined, or at a later moment, declare that they recognise as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other member or State accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the court in all or any of the classes of legal disputes concerning:—

"(a.) The interpretation of a treaty."

"(b.) Any question of international law."

"(c.) The existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation."

"(d.) The nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation."

"The declaration referred to above may be made unconditionally or on condition of reciprocity on the part of several or certain members or States, or for a certain time."

"In the event of a dispute as to whether the court has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the court."

I can only advise on the subject from the legal point of view, but the subject is, of course, one on which political considerations may well outweigh legal considerations.

So far as regards the type of dispute which arises between this Government and a foreign Government in normal times, i.e., times of peace, it is noticeable that where a suggestion for reference of the dispute to arbitration is made, it almost always emanates from the British side. It is not the foreign Power which asks His Majesty's Government to arbitrate and His Majesty's Government who hesitate; it is His Majesty's Government who seek arbitration as the mode of settling the dispute.

The reason is not far to seek. I doubt whether there has ever been a case in the last fifty years in which a British Government has deliberately acted in a manner which it knew to be contrary to the rules of international law as understood in this country. Consequently, where a dispute has arisen and has bid fair to be troublesome, resort to arbitration is welcomed as the best way out of what might develop into a tiresome situation. No Government which has had experience of the inconvenience of a diplomatic deadlock and is faced with a dispute with another Government on a matter which is legal in character and, therefore, susceptible of settlement by arbitration, and on which it believes itself to be in the right, is likely to prefer the continuance of the dispute to its solution.

It seems to follow almost logically that so long as British Governments continue to be actuated by the same motives as those which have moved preceding Governments, there is no appreciable risk in accepting an obligation to submit any dispute of this character which may arise to the jurisdiction of the Permanent Court.

Positive advantage would only accrue from the increased facility for obliging a foreign Government to submit a dispute to the jurisdiction of the International Court. It must be confessed that for some little time to come this advantage would be slight. It is with the more important Powers that disputes generally occur, and these Powers are not likely at present to enter into similar obligations. Nevertheless, if the concrete gain is likely to be small for some years, so is the risk, as British acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the court would only operate in respect of Powers which entered into similar obligations.

The net result is, to my mind, that in respect of disputes which arise in peace time His Majesty's Government would gain more than they lose by signing the optional clause, and thereby accepting the system of compulsory submission to the jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of disputes of a legal character.

It is not peace time disputes, however, which are the real problem in connection with compulsory arbitration. It is in connection with disputes which may arise out of British belligerent action in time of war.

No democracy is going to allow itself to become engaged in war if it can help it, and when it does become involved in war it is going to fight with its back to the wall. This is particularly true of Great Britain; and of Great Britain's belligerent operations, the most important will be at sea. Naval operations bring a belligerent into conflict with neutral Powers far more than military operations on land, and the problems surrounding the submission to arbitration or international judicial settlement of disputes arising out of belligerent measures are, therefore, more difficult and the risks greater for Great Britain than for other great Powers whose strength is devoted to fighting on land.

It has been the policy of this Government for more than a century to resist any attempt to define in a rigid code the limits of lawful naval action against neutral seaborne commerce assisting the enemy, except so far as the body of our own prize court decisions establish such definitions. Consequently, when war breaks out and Great Britain strives to attain the mastery of the sea, she is bound to incur the ill-will of neutral Powers. It is the moment when neutral commerce can reap large profits out of the needs of the enemy; and the greater the struggle the more pressing will be the needs of the enemy, and the larger the anticipated profits of the neutral; more determined also will be the British measures to repress that commerce, and the more certain, therefore, the friction with neutral Powers.

Is it safe in such circumstances to agree to a system under which the neutral Power would have the right in future to bring the legality of British action at sea before an international tribunal?

In actual practice what acceptance of the obligatory jurisdiction of the court at The Hague would mean in this connection would be that a neutral who failed to get satisfaction in the prize court would, after exhausting his right of appeal to the Privy Council, be entitled to question the legality of the British action in the court at The Hague and demand compensation. The International Court would then decide whether or not British action was in accordance with international law. If it decided that it was so, the action would be upheld; if it decided that it was not, His Majesty's Government would have to give compensation. The question, therefore, would narrow itself down to the issue whether or not the British belligerent action was a violation of international law.

The risk involved in submission to international judicial decision is undoubtedly great, but it is very easy to exaggerate it. Naval struggles come at rare intervals, and the precedents of one war are no safe guide as to what is legitimate in the next. The prize court decisions as to what is legitimate belligerent action given in one war always show a great advance on those given in a preceding war, because novel applications must be made of the basic principles. The British belligerent measures at sea during the recent war seemed to constitute very startling developments, but I doubt whether any of them were inconsistent with the old principles; and if they were not, there is no reason to assume that an international court would have condemned them. That, however, must necessarily be a matter of speculation.

In the past the potent check on belligerent excesses has been found in the fear that the neutral Power will join the enemy. It is better to submit to some inconvenient arbitrations than to be faced with a new enemy.

A good example of the working of this principle may be seen in our relations with the United States of America at the end of the 18th and the beginning of the 19th century.

The parent of all forms of international review of belligerent prize court decisions was the commission under article 7 of Jay's Treaty of 1794. The Caribbean captures, under the Orders in Council of June and November 1793, had produced such exasperation in the United States that, when Jay was sent over by Washington in the hope of effecting a settlement, the situation from the British point of view was precarious. Firstly, Great Britain was faced with a possible renewal with American co-operation of the Armed Neutrality of 1780. Secondly, there was appreciable risk of an American declaration of war, which would have diverted British energies from the French war and would have weakened the British financial position. Thirdly, the embargo already imposed by the United States had complicated the food position in the West Indies.

None of these were risks which Great Britain could face, and at an early stage Grenville decided that the advice of the British Minister in the United States must be acted on, and that satisfaction must be given in respect of the Order in Council of November 1793. The commission under article 7 of the treaty was the result, and in the end 478 awards were given in favour of American claimants and compensation was paid to the extent of over 2½ millions.

Fifteen years later Great Britain was at the height of the struggle against the continental system of Napoleon, and was issuing and enforcing the retaliatory Orders in Council, against the Berlin and Milan decrees. American commerce was neutral and was feeling the effect of the Orders in Council. The United States took measures in reply, and ultimately, driven to desperation, in part by the impressment of American seamen, in part by the seizures under the Orders in Council, embarked on the war of 1812.

Clearly the course pursued in 1794 was the wiser. It is better to risk some adverse arbitration awards than to face another war.

If I read the signs of the times aright, however, there is a new factor, which will vitally affect this problem in the future. The League of Nations is not likely to eliminate war from the world, but it is practically certain that any belligerent, forced, as Great Britain will be forced, to take measures, and, perhaps, novel measures, at sea, will endeavour to secure the concurrence of the League in those measures. If that concurrence is secured, neutral protests (if there are any neutrals) are only likely as to questions of fact involved in the prize court decisions which are the subject of protest. If the neutral protests are directed against the principles adopted, i.e., against the terms of the Orders in Council directing what ships or cargo are liable to capture, it is improbable that the court at The Hague would uphold the protests, or would condemn as inconsistent with international law measures which were taken with the concurrence of the League.

The reason which makes me assert with some confidence that the belligerent, particularly if it is Great Britain, will endeavour to secure the concurrence of the League in measures which involve any departure from the admitted rules of international law, is the fact that the neutral who protests is bound to come to the League before he takes any forcible measures in support of his protest. He is prevented by the terms of the covenant from going to war without complying with the elaborate machinery set out in the covenant. Up till now the neutral's power of decision as to whether he would declare war in defence of his rights has been unfettered. Now he must go to the council and comply with the formalities of article 15. Consequently, the reasonableness and the legality of the belligerent's measure are, in case of acute conflict, bound sooner or later to come before the League. The belligerent, therefore, if he is well advised, will see the advantage of getting the League's approval of the particular measures he contemplates at the moment when he can urge the necessity for them, and before a neutral who desires to oppose them can bring forward a piteous tale of woe of the intolerable injury which the measures are doing. It is true the League may refuse to sanction the measures which the belligerent desires to take, but if the war has been sanctioned by the League it is not likely that the League will take the responsibility of refusing to sanction belligerent measures for which a good case can be made out.

I admit that this is an unforeseen result of the working of the covenant; but, nevertheless, I think that it is what will happen.

If it is sound, it is manifest that it reduces substantially the risk involved in accepting, so far as belligerent measures are concerned, the obligatory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court.

The result seems to be that from the legal point of view no serious risk would be entailed so far as concerns (a) peace time disputes, and (b) disputes arising out of future belligerent measures, by British acceptance of the obligatory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court.

This is not so, however, with regard to disputes arising out of past belligerent measures, i.e., out of British naval measures in the late war. With regard to these there might be serious risk. At any rate, the Admiralty would probably be alarmed at the proposal and would oppose it.

If the idea of accepting the compulsory jurisdiction at all is adopted, it would be well to limit the acceptance to disputes arising out of events subsequent in date to that of the signature. This would exclude disputes arising out of belligerent seizures during the late war. It would be a reasonable condition for a new Government to attach, and would be defensible on the ground that its members cannot be expected to undertake any such responsibility in respect of the acts of their predecessors.

Another prudent limitation to attach would be to fix a time limit and accept the obligation only for five years. It will then be possible to see whether other powerful States seem disposed to follow Great Britain's lead. Article 36 provides specifically for acceptance for a specified time only, and Denmark has signed for five years.

The general conclusion at which I arrive is that as regards peace time disputes Great Britain would gain a little by accepting the obligatory jurisdiction, and that as regards disputes arising out of future wars there is no serious risk in accepting it.

CECIL J. B. HURST.

June 18, 1924.

Memorandum by Mr. Malkin.

THIS note is only an attempt to indicate the consequences, from the legal point of view, of an acceptance by His Majesty's Government of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice in the cases provided for by article 36 of the protocol establishing the court. No attempt is made to deal with the political side of the question.

The first point to note is that the sphere in which any acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the court would operate is somewhat limited. It would not provide an additional means of settling serious international disputes by measures other than war; for we are already bound, under article 15 of the covenant, to submit any dispute likely to lead to a rupture either to arbitration or to the Council of the League, and therefore, if the compulsory jurisdiction is accepted, the only result as regards disputes of this nature will be that a certain number of cases, which would otherwise have gone to the council, will go to the Permanent Court. Further, we have already a considerable number of arbitration treaties with foreign Powers which provide for the submission to arbitration of differences of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of treaties, provided that they do not affect the vital interests, independence or honour of the contracting States. Thus, the only disputes for which the acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the court would provide a remedy which does not exist at present are those which (a) are not of such a nature as to be likely to lead to a rupture, and (b) either arise with a State with which we have not an arbitration treaty, or affect the vital interests, independence, or honour of the States concerned.

These cases may be divided into two classes:—

1. The minor differences which arise in the everyday intercourse of States, and
2. Those arising in time of war.

As regards the first class, I do not think that, from the legal point of view, either the advantages or disadvantages of accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the court are very great. It would enable us to get a certain number of cases submitted to the court where at present we are not in a position to insist on arbitration, but I doubt whether the number of such cases is very large. In cases of the sort with which article 36 of the protocol deals, we can generally obtain arbitration if we really want to,* and the recent dispute with France over the Tunis nationality decree shows that the existence of the League of Nations may sometimes enable us to obtain arbitration in a dispute which the other party is not legally bound to settle in that way. On the other hand, we should, no doubt, be forced to arbitrate a certain number of cases where at present we should be in a position to refuse arbitration, and as it may fairly be said that in such matters honesty is the policy of the British Government, such cases would probably be ones where we really had a strong case, and ought to be fairly certain of winning, if the court could be depended upon; though at the same time it is unfair and, in cases where colonial Governments are concerned, sometimes very inconvenient, that we should be put to the trouble and expense of an arbitration where the other side have really no case. This is, however, not a very important consideration.

The second class of cases, however, is of vital importance. I do not propose to say anything about matters arising in the course of land warfare; there are always a certain number of these (cases of requisitioning, damage done by troops, &c.), but the rules applicable to them are reasonably well settled, and there is not usually much difficulty in disposing of such cases, especially as it is a common practice for belligerents to set up commissions to deal with claims of this nature after the war. From our point of view the question can really be considered exclusively in relation to naval warfare.

In cases where this country is a neutral, the acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the court would enable us, as against a belligerent who had also accepted it, to obtain the submission to the court of claims by British subjects arising out of that belligerent's action at sea—a result which in the past we have almost invariably been unable to obtain. From the point of view of the claimant (who in most cases is an underwriter) this would, no doubt, be an advantage, and it would no doubt be convenient for His Majesty's Government to be able to dispose in this way of an extremely troublesome class of cases. But there is another side to the question. If we have a legal right to bring the action of a belligerent before the court, we shall find it very difficult to avoid doing so in any case where the British claimant can make anything of a case against the action of the belligerent, and we shall be responsible for the arguments by which the case would be supported before the court. Now it must always be remembered that, especially in these matters, international law is not a fixed code, so that it is impossible at any given moment to know definitely what rules are to be applied in considering the legitimacy of belligerent action; and, especially towards the end of a period in which no great naval war has taken place, it may be found that many of the rules which have been admitted in the past are obsolete. If, therefore, we have to take up and argue any apparently well-founded complaints against belligerent action, we may find ourselves committed to rules which are no longer applicable, and which might be extremely injurious, or even fatal, to ourselves if we found ourselves subsequently at war. I can well conceive, for instance, that if during the Russo-Japanese and Italo-Turkish wars we had been in a position to insist on a reference to the court of the claims by British subjects arising out of belligerent action, we should have committed ourselves to principles which might have had serious consequences to us in the recent war.

In cases where we are belligerent, I can see nothing but disadvantage from accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the court, and the only question would appear to be how serious those disadvantages are. This question is to a large extent not a legal one. It is, however, material to observe that the idea that there is an established rule of international law that a neutral may require the decisions of a belligerent prize court to be submitted to arbitration (or, which is much the same thing, that claims based on such decisions may be so submitted) is not really supported by history. So far as I am aware there is only one case in which we have submitted the decisions of our prize court to international arbitration, and only one case in which we have obtained such submission of cases dealt with by a belligerent when we were neutral. The first case is, of course, the Jay Treaty of 1795. The reasons which led the British Government of that day to agree to arbitration in 1795 are somewhat obscure, but the impression left on my mind is that, owing to the absence of notice of the coming into force of certain Orders in Council affecting trade with the French West Indian Islands, and irregularities committed by the British prize courts in the West Indies, it was generally admitted here that some form of restitution or compensation must be accorded to American claimants, and that the only question was whether they should be left to their remedy before the Privy Council or if a special Anglo-American tribunal should be set up at once to deal with these cases. The latter course was adopted—probably for reasons of policy—and so far as I can make out, what the tribunal did, in at any rate the great majority of these cases, was not to discuss whether the Prize Court decision was right, but to assume that in the special circumstances the claimant was entitled to something, and that the only question was how much.* The only case in which we obtained arbitration in British claims arising out of the decisions of a belligerent prize court was the Anglo-American Commission of 1871; this was agreed to as a sort of counterpoise to the "Alabama" arbitration, in order to deal with British claims arising out of the war, and out of the 478 British claims presented to the commission, less than a dozen arose out of the decision of an American prize court.

* A certain proportion of cases of this nature are not sufficiently important to be submitted to arbitration in any case.

It is, of course, in connection with the possibility of arbitrating claims arising out of our belligerent action at sea that the point referred to above, as to the absence at any given moment of any definite rules of international law, becomes so important. It is very difficult for a court composed of international lawyers, when dealing with cases of this nature, to realise that what they have got to do is not to apply the rules which they will find in the text books, based as they are entirely on the experience of the past, but to endeavour to discover what should be regarded as the applicable rules of international law in the circumstances of the present. If, for instance, a really serious attempt had been made to test before an arbitral tribunal the validity of the decisions of the American prize courts in the civil war in relation to contraband and blockade, I think there can be little doubt that these decisions would at that time have been condemned; but even before the last war there was almost general agreement that the development of the old rules embodied in those decisions was sound.

The real question which has to be decided is how far the certainty (for this is what it would really amount to) of having to submit our action to the decision of an international court would hamper a British Government in taking measures which they may consider legitimate in the circumstances of the time. It is not merely the possible financial consequences which would have to be considered, important though these might be; for it cannot safely be assumed that the neutral Powers concerned would be content to allow our measures to continue until the end of the war, subject to demands for pecuniary damages afterwards; they might well claim, if political conditions permitted such action, that the question of the legitimacy of the British measures should be submitted to arbitration at once, in order that our right to continue to carry them into effect might be decided. And a point which requires to be taken into consideration—although it is very difficult at present to form an opinion upon it—is the extent to which, at the time when the case actually arose, confidence could be felt in the ability of the Permanent Court to deal with cases of this nature.

Another point which has an important bearing on the question, but which it is difficult to deal with at present, is the extent to which the situation may be affected by the existence of the League of Nations. If we could be certain that in any future war in which we may be engaged we should have the League behind us, and if we could be certain that at that time no important States would not be members of the League, the situation would obviously be different and the above considerations might lose much of their force. But any consideration of this point must at present partake to a considerable extent of the nature of conjecture.

I assume that if it were decided to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the court, it would be possible to do so in such a manner as to confine it to cases arising in the future, so as to exclude the possibility of any cases arising out of our action in the late war being brought before the court. This seems to be essential in any case; it looks as if the neutrals, including the United States, realise that it is not practical politics to expect us now to submit the legitimacy of our action at sea to arbitration, but there is a certain amount of correspondence still passing with Holland, and it would be almost impossible for a country which was in the position to bring us before the court to resist the pressure which would be put upon it to do so.

The whole question must, of course, be considered in consultation with the

* It is material to note that cases arising under the Orders in Council of 1805 were never submitted to arbitration.

fighting departments, and any other departments concerned, and also with the dominions, since it does not seem practically possible for us to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the court unless all the dominions are prepared to do so too.

H. W. MALKIN.

Foreign Office, May 21, 1924.

Memorandum respecting Compulsory Arbitration.

THE question at issue is ably argued in the two opinions submitted by Sir C. Hurst and Mr. Malkin, and dated respectively the 18th June and the 21st May last. I may at once state that my own view harmonises with the opinion of Mr. Malkin and dissents from that of Sir C. Hurst. As the point is of supreme practical importance I submit in explanation of the view I favour the following observations:—

2. The objections to entering into a solemn engagement to submit to arbitration any disputes arising under the four heads set out in article 36 of the Statute creating the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague are twofold. One is concerned with the degree of confidence which can be placed in the impartiality and competence of the tribunal. The other arises from the doubt whether it is right to accept the risk of an adverse award, possibly in cases where the carrying out of such award would present insurmountable obstacles, so that the undertaking to be bound by the award, whatever it be, could not in fact be honoured.

3. The first objection is not seriously discussed by either Sir C. Hurst or Mr. Malkin. This is the more remarkable in that it has largely influenced the situation in which the question as now raised presents itself. When the constitution of the International Court was considered in 1920, the draft scheme then prepared contained articles (Nos. 33 and 34) providing for compulsory arbitration in the very cases now under discussion. Attention was then called to the danger involved in the acceptance of those provisions, and in due course the question was referred to the highest legal authorities in this country. A considered and unanimous opinion was pronounced on the 14th October, 1920, and signed by the then Lord Chancellor, Attorney-General and Solicitor-General (Lord Birkenhead, Sir Gordon, now Lord Hewart, and Sir Ernest Pollock).^{*} It declared decidedly against the acceptance of the two articles in the draft scheme on several grounds, one of which was the grave doubt "whether it would be politic for Great Britain to bind herself in any circumstances to refer any disputes which might arise in the future within the very wide jurisdiction to a tribunal of whose impartiality it has no assurance."

4. This doubt has always been felt. It does not necessarily throw discredit on the personal honour of the fifteen individual judges forming the Court, although the circumstances in which its present members were selected by the League of Nations certainly justify some scepticism as to the standing and competence of some of them. The apprehension which may legitimately be entertained is that, as happened in important cases of arbitration in the past, political considerations of expediency and hesitation to wound the so-called susceptibilities of particular Powers, will always influence the votes of some if not most of the judges, so that a really impartial judgment given strictly on the merits of the case cannot be counted upon with any degree of certainty. It is clear that failing such confidence, statesmen having the honour and vital interests of their country at heart, must hesitate to subscribe blindly and in advance to an undertaking to submit to such a Court any and every dispute over a question of international law in which the country may become involved.[†]

5. In any case the opinion of our high legal authorities prevailed. It was as a result of our opposition that the provisions of articles 33 and 34 of the draft Statute were ultimately so modified by the League as to assume the form in which they now stand as article 36 of the Statute. That is to say, it is now optional for a State to undertake the obligation of compulsory arbitration under the four heads. It is therefore well to realise that the present proposal that His Majesty's Government should, by exercising this option, agree to compulsory arbitration on the four points

^{*} See Annex 1.

[†] This view was expounded in a speech delivered by Lord Balfour as First British Delegate at the 1st Assembly of the League of Nations on December 13, 1920. See Annex 2.

is nothing less than a demand for a deliberate reversal of the decision taken by the Cabinet in 1920 on the advice of the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers.

6. I pass to the second objection, which arises in connection with the carrying out of adverse awards. The difficulties which here present themselves may be general or specific. As Mr. Malkin points out, the essence of the new obligation which it is now sought to impose upon us is that we should waive the reservation as to the vital interests, independence or honour of the State in generally agreeing to arbitration in regard to all questions otherwise suitable. No doubt the object in advising withdrawal of this reservation is to prevent other countries, acting in bad faith, from putting forward such a plea merely as a dishonest subterfuge in order to avoid arbitration. But it would be wrong to go on the assumption that there may not be cases where the reservation can and will be pleaded in perfect good faith and quite legitimately. Sir C. Hurst in his opinion rather implies than states that, so far as the British Government is concerned, it would, except as regards cases arising out of acts of war, never wish to refuse arbitration.

7. I would recall a very important case, not so long ago as to have lost its force as a notable precedent, in which His Majesty's Government had to contemplate the possibility of refusing to submit to arbitration a dispute over a grave political issue with France. It arose out of the Newfoundland fisheries settlement which formed part of the Agreements constituting the Entente of 1904. It was in 1908 when France insistently demanded what was practically a reopening of the principal point supposed to have been settled in 1904. She revived her claim for the exemption of French fishermen from the colonial jurisdiction in Newfoundland waters, basing herself on an alleged possible interpretation of the clauses of the agreement. Now, the Government of Newfoundland had made it an absolute condition of any agreement negotiated with France that the colony would recover complete and unrestricted sovereign rights within her waters, and His Majesty's Government had given a solemn and written pledge to the colony that this point was definitely conceded by France under the terms which had been finally negotiated. The French argued that the wording did not amount to this, and failing our accepting their thesis, demanded arbitration.

8. The view taken here was that, in the circumstances, the Government of Newfoundland might find it impossible to agree to arbitration, and that His Majesty's Government would accordingly have to base a rejection of the demand for arbitration on the ground that a vital interest of the Empire was involved. Fortunately, France did not pursue the controversy, and the matter dropped.

9. It would be rash to assume that similar cases will never arise again, and it is highly significant that the United States Government have always attached the highest importance to maintaining the exemption from arbitration of any cases touching the vital interests, independence or honour of the State.

10. There is a more specific reason which militates against an unconditional acceptance of any possible arbitral award, and that is the impossibility of any constitutional government in modern times guaranteeing that the national parliament will agree to pass the legislation required to give effect to an arbitral award where the vital interests, independence, or honour of the country are adversely affected. For no Government could foresee what kind of claim against it might some day form the subject of a judgment by the International Court. At the moment when judgment is pronounced, the Government against which it is given may realise that in no case would the national parliament pass the necessary legislation to give effect to it. But it would then be too late. This difficulty might well arise in Great Britain as well as in other countries. In the United States it may be counted upon to arise almost with certainty. So much is this understood at Washington, that the State Department notoriously puts every obstacle in the way of arbitrations for the very reason that the United States could not be considered bound except with the express consent of the Senate, which that body would never give in hypothetical cases in advance.

11. Sir C. Hurst and Mr. Malkin deal at length with the question how this country would be affected by compulsory arbitration when cases arising out of rights of belligerents and of neutrals are at issue. Mr. Malkin is clearly alarmed by the danger to which this country would be exposed when belligerent. Sir C. Hurst now tries to minimise this danger, though his view was very different in 1920, when the question was referred by the Cabinet to the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers, as will be seen by reference to his minute written at that time, which is quoted in the Foreign Office memorandum of the 17th March, 1924. Sir C. Hurst's former objections cannot have altogether lost force even in his own estimation, since he continues, agreeing in this with Mr. Malkin, that we must in any case make sure that compulsory arbitration, however freely applied in future wars, must not be allowed to extend to anything that happened during the late war. If we cannot afford running the risk of our belligerent action in the late war becoming the subject of arbitration, how can it be seriously maintained that such risk would be negligible as regards all future wars?

12. I must own to not being much impressed by Sir C. Hurst's contention that since we have the League of Nations (which, it may be said in passing, did already exist in 1920) all fear of our belligerent rights being whittled away or paralysed by the International Court may be put aside. He admits that his argumentation on this point is in some measure necessarily speculative. I cannot but feel that the risks are too grave to be neglected on such merely speculative grounds, as to which, to say the least, profound differences of opinion are permissible.

13. Nor is it easy to agree with Sir C. Hurst's reading of history when he discusses the war between Great Britain and the United States in 1812. He suggests that, in order to induce the latter not to declare war, we should have consulted our best interests by agreeing to have our differences as to the legality of our famous Orders in Council submitted to arbitration. I might invoke, as against this opinion, the authority of the great American writer Admiral Mahan, who has recorded his considered opinion that the British policy and the refusal to compromise with the United States on it were both right in themselves and necessary in order to win in the life-and-death struggle with Napoleon. But it must be doubted whether any non-British arbitrator at the time would have taken that view. In all probability an arbitral award would have pronounced against the legitimacy of the Orders in Council, and this would have rendered a continuance of the policy which played a decisive part in breaking the power of Napoleon, if not absolutely impossible, at least exceedingly difficult and costly.

14. It remains to consider what advantages we or anyone else would reap from our now reversing our policy on the subject of compulsory arbitration. Those who advocate it do so largely, if not exclusively, on purely theoretical and abstract sentimental grounds. In their eyes arbitration all round and in all circumstances is a panacea for all ills. The claim is surely exaggerated. It might, perhaps, be urged that the various parties who in all countries have written the battle-cry of compulsory arbitration in international affairs on their banners, offer as a rule determined resistance to compulsory arbitration in their own home affairs, such for instance as trade union disputes, which may be taken to imply an acknowledgment that there are certain classes of difficulties in regard to which arbitration may not necessarily be the proper remedy. However this may be, no evidence has so far been adduced by anybody that the introduction of unrestricted compulsory arbitration in international disputes would meet any really felt need. We have all the existing advantages and facilities of the League of Nations to deal with grave international conflicts. Of course it yet remains to see the League machinery tested in a real and important crisis. But if that machinery should prove inadequate to meet such a crisis, the introduction of fresh guarantees for settling by arbitration deep-seated conflicts that might otherwise lead to war, will hardly advance matters, but may rather increase the feeling of scepticism with which all such paper guarantees are still regarded in many quarters. There is a strong conviction, widely held, that there is nothing to gain from unnecessarily hurrying the pace of further development, and that pacifist energies would be better spent on fostering and spreading what in modern jargon is called the will to peace, rather than on concentrating on the erection of more machinery for dealing with hypothetical problems.

15. I have ventured in the above to express my own opinions. It would not be right to omit calling attention to the strong popular feeling aroused in our country when the attempt was made after The Hague Conference of 1907 to carry a measure of compulsory arbitration in the shape of an International Prize Court. Sir C. Hurst himself as late as 1920 declared that the country rightly and decisively rejected it. It is likely to do so again if the same scheme is once more brought forward and this time on a much more extended scale.

E. A. C.

Foreign Office, July 13, 1924.

ANNEX 1.

Memorandum by the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers of the Crown.

In our opinion there are good grounds for apprehending that the establishment of such a Court as is suggested—at all events at the present time—would be contrary to the interests of this country. Under articles 33 and 34 a State can, in case of a dispute, be brought against its will before the Court by another, and as between States which are members of the League the Court is to have jurisdiction, without any special agreement, to determine any case of a legal nature concerning a question in international law. It may, we think, be gravely doubted whether it would be politic for Great Britain in any circumstances to bind herself to refer any disputes which might arise in the future within this very wide jurisdiction to a tribunal of whose impartiality she has no assurance. It may be asked, perhaps, whether it is reasonable to expect impartiality from any permanent international Court. And there are special reasons why this country should not be a party to such an engagement now. It is well known that some neutral nations (e.g., Sweden and Holland) are dissatisfied with our proceedings during the war, and also with some of the decisions of our Prize Courts. If the proposed Court were established it would be open to these and other States to make claims based on such proceedings, and, if they were not settled diplomatically, to carry them before the new Court, with the result that we might, and probably should, have to pay very heavy compensation, and various decisions of the Prize Courts might, in effect, be reversed.

Another serious objection to the setting up of the Court at the present time is that America is not yet a member of the League of Nations, and would therefore have no influence on the election of the judges. Nor would America or other States outside the League be bound in any way by the rulings of the Court, so that there would be a set of rules of international law growing up which would be binding on some of the Great Powers as well as the smaller States members of the League, but not on the Great Powers and the States outside the League.

Law Officers' Department,
October 14, 1920.

B.
G. H.
E. M. P.

ANNEX 2.

Speech by Lord Balfour at the 1st Assembly of the League of Nations on December 13, 1920.

Mr. President, I should not have intervened, even for the very few moments during which I propose to detain you, had it not been that by implication, and sometimes I think by more than implication, it has been suggested that some of the Great Powers—France, I think, has been mentioned and Great Britain has been mentioned—have proved themselves an obstruction in the full development of the court of justice which we all desire to see established. I have no right to speak, and I do not propose to speak in defence of France. M. Bourgeois has himself to-day admirably spoken in defence of the project now before you; but on behalf of my own country I desire to say that those who will look back on the history of the last generation or two generations in an impartial spirit will, I think, admit that no country has done more to promote the whole principle of arbitration and legal or quasi-legal decisions upon matters of international differences than have the various members of the British Empire.

That being so, I do not think any defence is required for the attitude which we have taken up in this matter. It is quite true that we are ardent supporters of the idea of an International Court of Justice. It is quite true that we desire to see the applications to that Court made voluntarily and not compulsorily. That is not because we desire to discourage the movement in which we have taken part, not because we desire to check its extension to the furthest practicable fields, but because we are convinced, as the eloquent speaker who has just preceded me and others have pointed out, that if these things are to be successful they must be allowed to grow. If they are to achieve all that their framers desire for them, they must be allowed to pursue that natural development which is the secret of all permanent success in human affairs, and not least in that part of human affairs which deals with politics.

Remember that this Court is set up to administer a system of international law. International law itself is a changing and a growing subject. There is no provision—fortunately, perhaps—within the limits of the covenant for changing and reforming international law, and this Court is brought into existence not to change it or to reform it but simply to administer it. Therefore you may find yourselves, or some nation in the course of time may find itself, in the position that a rigid interpretation of what may be an antiquated system of international law, which would never be accepted or embodied in any authoritative code or authoritative work if all the circumstances were understood, nevertheless has to be administered by a Court which, in administering it with strict regard to the laws with which it has to deal, but without any power of achieving that larger vision which is sometimes given to statesmen and politicians, may affect interests so profoundly concerning the very existence of that State that your whole machine would be destroyed before that State would submit itself voluntarily to legal destruction.

I do not think such cases are likely, but who among you will venture to say that they are impossible? Who among you will venture to say that if this system be made compulsory such a case as I have indicated might not occur?

The very thought that it might occur will throw discredit on your system unless you allow some possible safety valve. Proceed, therefore, in this case as in all other cases, with care and with caution. Look back upon the past, and take encouragement from the past for the future. What does the past show you? More and more new classes of cases are being brought within the jurisdiction of such a Court as that which you wish to establish. Why not leave that natural wholesome process to develop itself? More and more you will find that as this Court gains the public confidence, the confidence of nations in all parts of the earth, more and more classes of cases will be brought within its jurisdiction: more and more readily will the various countries of the world be glad to put their disputes before it, whereas if in a spirit too hasty and too impetuous you try and force into this mould, as yet imperfectly framed, the whole fabric of what you conceive to be a completed and perfect system, the result will be that the mould itself will break under the stress of new circumstances and changing conditions. So far from having served the interests of international justice, you will have inflicted what may prove to be a fatal blow upon the greatest instrument which the world has ever yet been able to contrive for seeing that international justice is carried out.

These observations of mine, I am sure, will not be misunderstood. They are uttered by the representative of a country which, I boldly say, has been in the very forefront of this movement. They are uttered, not with the desire of checking the growth of this great movement in favour of international justice, but because I conscientiously believe, and I speak for a country which conscientiously believes, that the true path of progress is the path of gradual, steady, wise and wholesome development, and I trust the Assembly of the League of Nations will never allow itself, in a moment of impatience, to depart from the only true path of safety and success.

Opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

THE question is whether His Majesty's Government should recognise as compulsory, ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other member or State accepting the same obligation (article 36), the jurisdiction of this Court. The subjects which would be submitted to the jurisdiction are—

- (a.) The interpretation of a treaty.
- (b.) Any question of international law.
- (c.) The existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation.
- (d.) The nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation.

The article further provides that the declaration may be made either unconditionally or on condition of reciprocity on the part of other members or States, or for a certain time, and that, in the event of a dispute as to jurisdiction, the matter is to be settled by the decision of the Court.

At first sight it appears natural to give the Court compulsory authority in as many cases as possible, for it looks as though it were by doing so that disputes which might lead to war will be most effectually avoided. In the instances of small States with unitary Constitutions this seems true, for the jurisdiction could strengthen their position against more powerful nations.

But in the instance of the British Empire it is not so clear that this is true. In substance the Constitution of our Empire is not unitary, and it is perilous for the Imperial Government to proceed as if it were. We have to secure the assent of the Dominions and of India at every step. An analogous difficulty has confronted the United States. The Executive does not dare to give undertakings unless the President is sure—which he rarely is—that the Legislature will adopt his action. That is the real reason why the President, however disposed to an arbitrary treaty, will rarely join in one.

In the cases of Great Britain and the United States alike it is thus, for reasons which although not the same are analogous, undesirable to give unqualified undertakings which it afterwards may prove unpracticable to fulfil. The condition of things in the event of failure is apt to show itself more provocative of unsolvable dispute than if no unqualified undertaking had been given.

There is therefore more to be considered in connection with the present proposal than its prima facie desirability on grounds only of international policy or public morality. Even on these grounds it may be perilous to give an undertaking which, under a Constitution which is in substance non-unitary, we cannot be sure of being able to fulfil. At a later stage in the evolution of the unwritten Constitution of the Empire it may be easier to get over this difficulty. Lord Balfour seems to have hinted so much in the speech he made to the Assembly of the League in December 1920.

But there are also other reasons for hesitation which require consideration. The words of article 36 are wide enough to extend to disputes arising out of past events in the course of the late war. Now the nation rejected the Declaration of London, although approved by their Government, and consequently it is not clear that the principles applied by an international court would harmonise with all of those actually adopted during our actual conduct of that war. In addition there may well be other points on which the decisions of our prize courts might be set aside. I think that we should thus be compelled to exclude a number of questions to which the article as it stands may well extend.

Sir C. Hurst, whose opinions on a matter of this kind always carry much weight, is inclined to think that, so far as legal points are concerned, the risk of accepting compulsion would not be great. It may be that this is true. But it is not possible to predict it with certainty, and I am myself inclined to believe that if we acceded to the other view we should be free from the real danger of raising a question of principle within the Empire which we should not be able to control. Speaking for myself, I think it safer in the present state of the Constitution of our Empire to avoid trying to go further than article 13 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. This article binds us to refer to arbitration any matter which is suitable and which diplomacy cannot satisfactorily settle, including the interpretation of treaties, questions of international law, the existence of facts constituting a breach of international obligations and the extent of the reparation to be made. The language used in this article is less stringent than that in article 36 of the protocol of 1920, and gives rise to less embarrassment. I agree with Lord Balfour, in his suggestion of 1920, that resort to the Permanent Court is likely by degrees to become more and more general. In the end I think it will probably become compulsory. But this requires time to enable a firm conception to mature fully and to become familiar to our own people. For the present I am adverse to the explicit acceptance of a principle which will probably give rise, if so accepted, to keen controversy.

H. OF C.

July 21, 1924.

[E 151/5/44/1925]

No. 64.

[War Office.]

[November 21, 1924.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. G. W. Ricketts and Mr. H. M. Givern.

THE Law Officers and Counsel are requested to advise the Admiralty, Army Council and Air Council—

I.—Whether or not paragraph 1A, introduced into section 2, sub-section (1), of "The Official Secrets Act, 1911," by section 9 of "The Official Secrets Act, 1920," constitutes the communication of any sketch, plan, model, article, note, document or information which relates to munitions of war to a foreign Power a misdemeanour, notwithstanding that it cannot be shown to be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State.

II.—Whether or not the expression "sketch, plan, model, note, document or information which relates to munitions of war" contained in paragraph 1A includes and covers an actual munition of war as well as a sketch, plan, model, article, note, document or information relating thereto so as to make it a misdemeanour to supply such a munition of war "to any foreign Power or in any other manner prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State."

III.—Whether or not the expression "munitions of war" as defined in section 12 of "The Official Secrets Act, 1911," as amended by section 9 of "The Official Secrets Act, 1920," includes and covers articles or things, such as aeroplane engines, which could equally be used for a peaceful and non-military purpose or for a military purpose. Whether or not, if the answer to this question depends in any case upon the particular facts of the case, any general test can be applied to determine the question in each case. If so, what that test should be, and, generally, whether the Law Officers and Counsel agree with the tests suggested by the Air Ministry and the views expressed in the third paragraph of the letter from the Air Ministry to the War Department of the 7th May, 1923.

IV.—Whether or not the provisions of paragraph 1A of section 2, sub-section (1), of "The Official Secrets Act, 1911," as amended by section 9 of "The Official Secrets Act, 1920," render it a misdemeanour under the Acts (a) to supply, communicate or disclose to any corporation, firm or individual in this country (i) any munition of war (as defined by the Official Secrets Acts), or (ii) any sketch, plan, model, article, note, document or information which relates to a munition of war (as defined by the Official Secrets Acts) which it can be shown it is prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State should be supplied, communicated or disclosed; or (b) in connection with any application for a patent or otherwise to file or lodge with the Patent Office any specification or other document which ascribes, depicts or gives particulars of (i) any munition of war (as defined by the Official Secrets Acts), or (ii) any sketch, plan, model, article, note, document or information which relates to a munition of war (as defined by the Official Secrets Acts) which it can be shown it is prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State should be made public.

V.—(i.) Whether or not the provisions of "The Official Secrets Act, 1911," as amended by "The Official Secrets Act, 1920," by reason of their nature or effect involve or require the assumption of control by the appropriate Government Department of the export trade with foreign countries in arms and munitions of war by the granting of licences to export or otherwise, and, if so, to what extent.

(ii.) Whether or not it is within the power of the appropriate Government Department, by reason of the provisions of "The Official Secrets Act, 1911," as amended by "The Official Secrets Act, 1920," or otherwise, to exercise such control of the export trade with foreign countries as is above referred to.

(iii.) Whether or not it is within the power of the appropriate Government Department, by reason of the provisions of "The Official Secrets Act, 1911," as amended by "The Official Secrets Act, 1920," or otherwise, to license or grant permission for the supply or communication of any munition of war (as defined by the Official Secrets Acts) or of any sketch, plan, model, article, note or information relating to munitions of war to (a) any foreign Power, or (b) any corporation, firm or individual, in any particular case.

VI.—If the answers to question V (i), (ii) or (iii), or any of them, are in the affirmative, whether or not the exercise by the appropriate Government Department of the measure of control indicated as respects (a) the export trade with foreign

Official
Secrets
Acts, 1911
and 1920;
supply of Munitions to Foreign Governments.

countries generally, or (b) the licensing or granting permission for particular transactions, could in the event of war be made a ground of complaint that a breach of neutrality had been committed by the Government of this country.

VII.—If the answer to question I is in the affirmative and the answers to question V (ii) or (iii), or either of them, are in the negative, whether the matter can be satisfactorily dealt with by relying on the consideration that the Attorney-General would not prosecute if a Service Department had consented to the supply of the munition of war or the giving of the information.

VIII.—Whether, having regard to the difficulties and requirements of the Service Departments as indicated in the memorandum prepared by the Service Departments, and in the case, it would be practicable and, if practicable, desirable to formulate a statement as to the effect of the Official Secrets Acts and the requirements of the Departments thereunder which could be promulgated to manufacturers of munitions in this country as an authoritative statement for their guidance, and generally what is the best course to take under the existing legislation.

IX.—Whether the Law Officers and Counsel recommend any, and, if any, what, amending legislation as being necessary or desirable to give effect to the requirements and present intentions of the Service Departments and the Government; and X.—Generally upon the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. G. W. Ricketts and Mr. H. M. Giveen.

Our answers to the questions put to us are:—

I.—Yes. We do not think that any different answer would give due effect to the word "other" in the context in which it appears in sub-section (1A) introduced by section 9 of "The Official Secrets Act, 1920," into section 2 of the Act of 1911.

II.—Yes.

III.—In order to come within the definition, it is not enough, in our opinion, that the thing in question should be capable of use in war. The observations of Atkin J. in Shaw v. Lincoln Waggon Company (I, "Munitions Appeals," at p. 23): "I think the word denotes fitness, in some high degree to be determined on the facts in each particular case," indicate the proper considerations. If the thing is more suitable for use in war than in peace, it would clearly come within the definition. If it is equally suitable for peace or for war, it may be tested by asking whether it has qualities or characteristics or accessories which would not be required in an article intended solely for use in peace. Many cases are certain to occur which are very near the line. We do not exclude the consideration of circumstances showing that, though not specially or more suitable for use in war, the article in question is in truth required for such use, but we think such considerations are much less likely to arise under the Official Secrets Acts than under the several enactments forbidding or regulating the exportation of arms and military and naval stores. The above observations show that, in our opinion, the view expressed in the Air Ministry's letter of the 7th May, 1923, requires modification.

IV.—Our answer to both parts, (a) and (b), of this question is in the affirmative, but we think that in time of peace it would be difficult to induce a jury to find that an offence had been committed by filing an application for a patent without very strong evidence that the applicant was consciously prejudicing the national safety.

V.—(i.) No. The Official Secrets Acts do not provide for the grant of a licence by a Government Department to any person to do that which under the Acts is a breach of the law. If no breach is committed no licence is required.

(ii.) No. In our opinion the appropriate Government Department can only, so far as the Official Secrets Acts are concerned, control the export trade in munitions of war by enforcing the criminal law.

(iii.) No. See our answer to the first part of this question.

VI.—In consequence of the answers we have given to the three parts of question V above, there is no necessity for us to give an answer to this question.

VII.—We see no objection to an expression of opinion by a Service Department as to whether the use or communication of any particular information is prejudicial to the interests or safety of the State, and it is hardly conceivable that the Attorney-General would overlook such an opinion if any question of prosecution arose. But we do not think it would be at all satisfactory to make use of the Attorney-General's discretion by deliberately making it part of a system for licensing the communication of information or the supply of munitions.

VIII.—This is not so much a question of law as of policy and administration, upon which we are reluctant to express an opinion. If it is thought desirable in the interests of trade or otherwise to formulate such a statement, care must be taken to make it clear that the statement is not intended to relieve manufacturers or traders from the duty of strictly observing the provisions of the Acts.

IX.—To carry out principle (a) in the Services memorandum would involve an amendment of the Patents Act, which would not be easy to carry in Parliament; it should not be undertaken unless the Services have found in practice that the existing law contained in the Patents Act is insufficient to give them the priority which they naturally desire. In order to carry out the working principles (b) and (c) in the memorandum, there should be an amending Act giving power to a Government Department to issue licences for export of arms or munitions of war and providing that the export of articles under such a licence shall not constitute a breach of the Official Secrets Acts. It will be necessary to define the phrase "Government Department" if these words be used, and it will be very advisable that there should be a standing Committee of the Departments concerned, whose duty it will be to deal with or advise as to the issue of licences. The new Act might clear up the present ambiguities of sub-section 1A of section 2 added to the Act of 1911 by the Act of 1920.

X.—We have nothing to add.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.
G. W. RICKETTS.
H. M. GIVEEN.

Law Officers' Department.
November 21, 1924.

[T 3745/3745/370/1924]

No. 6^B.

[April 3, 1924.]

[Clearing Office
(Enemy Debts).]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

THE Law Officers and Mr. Gavin Simonds are requested to advise the Controller of the Clearing Office on a question which has arisen in regard to claims made by German nationals against British nationals under the provisions of article 296 of the Treaty of Versailles for the price of goods consigned by German nationals to British nationals prior to the outbreak of war, which were seized in transit and condemned in prize after the declaration of war.

Article 440 of the treaty provides as follows:—

"Germany accepts and recognises as valid and binding all decrees and orders concerning German ships and goods and all orders relating to the payment of costs made by any Prize Court of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, and undertakes not to put forward any claim arising out of such decrees or orders on behalf of any German national."

Several claims by German nationals against British nationals have been received by the Controller of the Clearing Office in respect of goods sold and delivered to British nationals, the property in which goods according to the terms of the contract between the parties passed to the purchaser prior to the goods being seized by the British authorities and condemned in prize. A typical case is that of a claim by the German national, Josef Reiber, against the British partnership firm of Jules Lang and Son. The circumstances of that case are that the contract provided for the goods being consigned "free at works." The goods in question left the works of the German vendor and were shipped from Germany on the British steamship "Argo" prior to the date of the declaration of war. The steamship "Argo" reached Swansea, where the goods were seized by the British authorities and subsequently condemned in prize on the 2nd June, 1915. No claim for release was made and no documents were submitted either to the Procurator-General or the Prize Court, and the goods were condemned in the absence of any claim.

Claims under article 296 of the Treaty of Versailles by German nationals against British nationals for the price of goods sold and delivered which, after the property in the goods had passed, were seized and condemned in prize.

The above-mentioned claim for the price of goods, which after the conclusion of the war was put forward by the German sellers, was contested by the British Clearing Office with the German Clearing Office on the ground that the goods in question were seized and condemned in prize, but the German Clearing Office has declined to accept the contest and contends that as the goods were consigned at the risk of the consignees the fact of their seizure cannot affect the vendor's right to claim for the price of the goods under article 296 of the treaty. The German Clearing Office also contend that ownership in the goods passed to the consignee, so that the authorities seized not German but English goods. The British Clearing Office is inclined to agree with the contention of the German Clearing Office, and takes the view that, having regard to the terms of the contract for the purchase of the goods, the goods were British and not German at the date of the seizure, and, therefore, that the provisions of article 440 of the treaty do not apply and that the German vendor is entitled to claim for the price of the goods under the provisions of article 296. The British debtors admit that the goods were sold "free at works," and it would therefore appear to be clear that the property in the goods passed to the debtors prior to the goods being shipped. Had the debtors been aware that these goods were amongst those seized they state that they would have claimed the goods and had them released, as they did in the case of other goods so seized. In that case there could, it is submitted, be no doubt that the present claim would have been a perfectly good one. The debtors have paid the amount of the claim to the Clearing Office with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on the principal sum from the 5th August, 1914, but the Procurator-General does not agree that the claim is one which should be dealt with under article 296 and admitted to the German Clearing Office in accordance with the provisions of that article, and he holds the view, in which it may be stated that the Foreign Office concur, that the contest of the claim should be maintained on the ground that the claim is barred by the terms of article 440 of the treaty, which, in his view, effectively prevents any claim being put forward by any German national for goods seized in prize, even although the property in the goods had in fact passed to a British national previous to the seizure. It has been pointed out to the Procurator-General that the decrees and orders which are by the terms of article 440 recognised by Germany as valid and binding concern only German ships and German goods, but he considers that as the British Prize Court has held that the goods in question were the property of an enemy and condemned them as such, the German vendors could only assert that the property in the goods was British by going behind the order of the Prize Court, which they are precluded from doing by the terms of the said article 440. The Procurator-General submits that article 440 would be deprived of all virtue if German owners were to be entitled to say that the article does not apply in cases in which goods have been condemned as prize, because upon some view of the facts or the law different from that upon which the Prize Court proceeded they arrive at a conclusion that the finding of the British Prize Court was erroneous, and it is suggested that if the German contention is conceded it would be open to enemy nationals to challenge the decision of the Prize Court in practically every case in which ships or goods have been condemned as enemy property. The Procurator-General's view, therefore, appears to involve the contention that where there has been a sale of goods by a German to a British national, and the property in the goods has passed to the British national, who thereupon has become liable to pay the price to the German, the fact that an order of the Prize Court has been made without knowledge of the true position, deprives the German owner of the right which previously existed to claim the price of the goods and releases the British purchaser from his liability to pay. It is contended by the Procurator-General that this is the true effect of article 440 so long as the decree of condemnation of the Prize Court stands, but it does not of course follow that the German or British claimant cannot apply to the Prize Court to reopen the decree or avail himself of any right he may have of appealing against it, and if such an application or appeal were successful the decree would be set aside, and if the property were found to have passed to the British firm, the German sellers would then be entitled to proceed to recover the price of the goods through the medium of the Clearing Office.

The view of the British Clearing Office is that this contention involves a construction of article 440 which is somewhat strained and one which it is unlikely the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal would adopt. It would appear that the only way in which the British argument could be put forward would be that the order of the Prize Court condemning the goods involved the finding that the goods were German goods for all purposes at the time of their capture and that accordingly so long as the decree of the condemnation of the Prize Court stands, no claim based upon any other state of facts, however conclusively proved, can lie on the part of a German subject. The Controller of the British Clearing Office does not think that the Tribunal would be likely to accept this argument, and he considers that in the event of a claim being referred to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal a decision in favour of the German Clearing Office would appear to be almost inevitable as the debtors themselves are in agreement with the view held by the German Clearing Office, and the British Clearing Office has no facts upon which to base a defence. As to the suggested right of appeal from the decision of the Prize Court, the view of the British Clearing Office is that the German seller's rights could hardly be made to depend on the willingness of the British buyer to appeal from that decision, even if such right of appeal was still available, and if the property in the goods had passed prior to the war it is not easy to see what interest the German seller himself would have entitling him to appeal.

The amount in the particular case above referred to is small, but there are several other similar cases, and the question involves a principle which is of much importance, particularly in relation to very valuable cargoes pledged to British financial houses as security for advances which were seized and condemned as enemy property during the war.

Accordingly, before any further answer is given to the German Clearing Office it is desired to have the opinion of the Law Officers on the matter, and unless they are prepared to maintain the contest of the claim when it comes before the Tribunal the Treasury will have to be informed of the position and their instructions obtained.

It should be mentioned that in some cases British purchasers to whom the property in goods had passed prior to the date of seizure have paid to the proper officer of the Crown the value of the goods seized, and there are other cases in which the British purchaser has never received the goods at all, they having been purchased from the Crown by some other person. If therefore the British purchaser has in these cases to pay to the Clearing Office the price of the goods under the provisions of article 296 of the treaty the result will be that he has either paid twice over for the goods or that he has to pay for goods which he has never received. Further, there is the additional liability for the payment of the interest imposed by the provisions of the treaty. The question, therefore, arises as to how such purchasers are to be reimbursed the amount paid by them for the goods to the officers of the Crown or how they are to be compensated for the loss of the goods where they have never obtained them at all, and it should be borne in mind that the amounts realised for goods condemned in prize have long ago in certain cases been adjudged to the Fleet.

The Law Officers and Mr. Gavin Simonds are requested to advise—

1. Whether, having regard to the provisions of article 440 of the Treaty of Versailles, a German national can, so long as a decree of condemnation of a Prize Court stands, properly claim against a British national under article 296 of the treaty for the price of goods seized and condemned by that Court, the property in which goods had passed to the British national prior to the war and prior to the date of seizure?
2. If in the opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Gavin Simonds British nationals are, in the circumstances set out in question 1, liable to pay under article 296 of the treaty, would the proper procedure be for them to apply to the Prize Claims Committee for a grant in cases where they have already paid the officer of the Crown for the goods and in cases where they have never received the goods at all, or, if not, what is considered would be the rights of such persons and the appropriate procedure to establish such rights?

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Gavin T. Simonds.

1. In our opinion article 440 of the treaty does not preclude a German national from claiming under article 296 against a British national for the price of goods condemned by a British Prize Court, if the property in those goods had passed to the British national. We think that the words "German ships and goods" in article 440 can refer only to ships and goods which were in fact the property of German nationals at the date of seizure and do not cover ships and goods which, since the property in them had passed, did not belong to German nationals and would not have been condemned if the whole of the facts had been known to the Prize Court (see case of The Odessa 1916, I, A.C., 145, and of The Parchim 1918, A.C., 157).

2. We do not think that it is for us to advise what course should be taken by British nationals who may be called on to pay for goods that they have never received or (in certain cases) to pay twice over for their goods. But we may say that any case in which the British national can establish that it was through no default on his part that the Prize Court was allowed to condemn his goods in ignorance of the material facts appears to be worthy of the consideration of the Prize Claims Committee, if that body is still in existence.

PATRICK HASTINGS.
HENRY R. SLESSER.
GAVIN T. SIMONDS.

Law Officers' Department,
April 3, 1924.

[C 8695/2339/18/1924]

No. 7.

[May 27, 1924.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen.

Foreign Office, May 12, 1924.

Interpretation of
Treaty of Versailles:
paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII;
and of the Rhineland
Agreement.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to transmit to you herewith a memorandum prepared in this Department, with the collaboration of the legal adviser to the British delegate on the Reparation Commission, on certain legal questions arising out of the independent coercive action against Germany undertaken by the French and Belgian Governments in the Rhineland and the Ruhr as a consequence of defaults declared by the Reparation Commission in the execution of Germany's reparation obligations under the Treaty of Versailles.

2. I am to recall in this connection the opinions given at Lord Curzon's request by your predecessors on the 11th April* and 30th July† last year, copies of which are enclosed for convenience of reference.

3. The present memorandum is confined to those legal questions arising out of the Franco-Belgian action which directly concern the Reparation Commission. For instance, the question whether the Rhineland Commission has acted in accordance with the Rhineland Agreement in putting into execution the pledges policy of the French and Belgian Governments is not included, as it is irrelevant to the main reparation issue.

4. The memorandum has been drawn up in view of the possibility that the Reparation Commission might be called upon to adjudicate concerning the allocation of the proceeds of the pledges policy, but there is now some ground for hope that the question of the allocation of the proceeds of the pledges policy may be settled as part of a general reparation settlement resulting from the recent report submitted to the Reparation Commission by the committee of experts, presided over by General Dawes, and that the raising of the issue in an acute form may thus be avoided. It is only in the eventuality that the matter may not be settled in this way that the present memorandum will be utilised. In such an eventuality it is intended to serve as an expression of the British point of view, which the British delegate on the Reparation Commission might transmit to the commission on behalf of His Majesty's Government.

5. In the event, however, of the question coming before the Reparation Commission, Mr. Secretary Ramsay MacDonald thinks it very important that your advice should have been obtained with regard to the memorandum, and I am therefore to enquire whether you concur in its terms or consider any amendments necessary, and to invite any general observations on the subject which you may desire to offer.

I have, &c.

MILES W. LAMPSON.

* Confidential 12470, p. 10.

† Confidential 12470, p. 15.

Memorandum.

I.—Treaty Provisions.

Paragraph 17 of Annex II to Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles reads as follows:—

"In case of default by Germany in the performance of any obligation under this part of the present treaty, the commission will forthwith give notice of such default to each of the interested Powers, and may make such recommendations as to the action to be taken in consequence of such default as it may think necessary."

2. According to paragraph 18 of the same annex—

"The measures which the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to take, in case of voluntary default by Germany, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances."

II.—French and Belgian Action.

3. On the 26th December, 1922, the 9th January, 1923, the 16th January, 1923, and the 26th January, 1923, the Reparation Commission declared Germany in default in regard to reparation deliveries and payments. The French Government, availing themselves of the rights which they believed these declarations of the Reparation Commission to give them, under paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the treaty, proceeded to the military occupation of the Ruhr and to the seizure of certain property and revenues in the Ruhr and in the Rhineland. Among the property and revenues seized were coal, coke, coal bye-products, dyes and other material, goods and property; the funds received from the levy of coal tax, customs duties and fees for the issue of export and import licences; the produce arising out of the management of state and communal forests; and the proceeds of fines, seizures of funds and property confiscated for non-payment of any of the above requisitions and levies. The French and Belgian control was subsequently extended to the railways and various industrial undertakings.

4. The action of the French and Belgian Governments was formally based on an interpretation of paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the treaty with which His Majesty's Government do not agree, and, in consequence, His Majesty's Government contest the right of those Governments to take the measures specified above.

5. A right to interpret those paragraphs is given to the Reparation Commission under paragraph 12 of Annex II to Part VIII of the treaty, which reads as follows:—

"The commission shall in general have wide latitude as to its control and handling of the whole reparation problem as dealt with in this part of the present treaty and shall have authority to interpret its provisions."

6. According to paragraph 13 (f) of Annex II, the interpretation of Part VIII of the treaty by the commission requires unanimous decision. If the required unanimity cannot be reached, His Majesty's Government have, for their part, already indicated their willingness to refer the matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague.

III.—Views of His Majesty's Government on the Legality of the Occupation of the Ruhr by France and Belgium.

7. In the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the intention of paragraphs 17 and 18 was that, in the event of a declaration by the Reparation Commission to each of the interested Powers of a voluntary German default, and in the absence of any common agreement by the Allied Powers as to the action to be taken within the limits of their own authority—an agreement which would be the usual course under the treaty—each separate Power concerned would, within the proper sphere of its own authority, have discretion as to the action it would take. The phrase "economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals" indicates the type of action which was contemplated under the treaty, and such prohibitions and reprisals constitute measures which would naturally be taken within the territory of the individual Allied States concerned. The phrase "such other measures" clearly implies other measures of the same type. If the phrase had meant that the respective Governments had the right to take any measures whatsoever regardless of their scope or nature, the words "economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals," would become a meaningless redundancy. The proper deduction to be drawn from the presence of the word "respective," and the mention of "economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals" is that the "other measures" referred to are measures of the nature of prohibitions and reprisals which individual Governments can properly take within the limits of their own authority. The type of action which each Government concerned could take individually and separately is illustrated by the declaration made by His Majesty's Government on the 15th October, 1920, to the German Government: that they "do not intend to exercise their rights under paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles, to seize the property of German nationals in this country in the case of voluntary report by Germany. This applies to German property in the United Kingdom or under United Kingdom control, whether in the form of bank balances or in that of goods in British bottoms or of goods sent here for sale."

8. This contention does not depend solely upon the well-recognised rule that where, as in the case of the relevant passages of the Treaty of Versailles, general words follow an enumeration of specific objects all belonging to a single class, the general words must be interpreted as indicating objects of the same nature as those specifically indicated, but also upon the wider principle that the whole of the language of a document must be given an interpretation consistent with the scope and purpose of the instrument. An interpretation of the language of paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles which would allow any one or more Powers acting independently outside the scope of their own jurisdiction to take in any part of German territory whatever measures they severally pleased against the joint debtor and against the assets which are the security for the common debt, would admit of consequences so unreasonable as to render it impossible to suppose that such a construction can represent the intentions of the high contracting parties.

9. In the opinion of His Majesty's Government, article 428, which provides for a joint Allied occupation of a specified area of German territory as a guarantee for the execution of the treaty by Germany, excludes any right on the part of an Allied Power to proceed to a further occupation of German territory under paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII. This view is confirmed by article 430, which provides for the reoccupation of any evacuated part of the territory covered by article 428 on a finding by the Reparation Commission that Germany refuses to observe the whole, or part, of her reparation obligations under the Treaty of Versailles. It would be superfluous to stipulate expressly, as does article 430, for reoccupation of the occupied territories in the event of default if, under an earlier part of the treaty, each Allied Power already had a right to proceed to the occupation of German territory.

10. This interpretation is in no way incompatible with the action taken by the Allies in 1921, when, with the full concurrence of His Majesty's Government, further German territory was occupied by the Allied Powers in March of that year. The Allies acted on that occasion, not under any specific faculty reserved by the terms of the treaty itself, but under the general liberty which one party to a treaty possesses to take such action as may be necessary, in the last resort, to compel observance of the treaty by the other party. Where a treaty has been concluded by several States acting together as one party, this right can only be exercised by all these States acting jointly, a principle which was frankly recognised in the pledge given by M. Millerand, then President of the French Council, on the 11th April, 1920, to His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris, in the following terms:—

"As regards the future, the Government of the Republic repeat that, in all inter-Allied questions raised by the execution of the treaty, they have no intention of acting save in accordance with their Allies."

11. Reparation is a matter of common interest to the Powers, and the action of a single Power may well impair the reparation interests of the other Powers concerned. This view was accepted by the French Government in 1919. For the French Government participated in a note from the Supreme Council to the Roumanian Government on the 23rd August, 1919, of which the relevant passages are given in Annex (A)* to the present memorandum.

12. If, as His Majesty's Government hold, the occupation of the Ruhr cannot be justified under any provision of the Treaty of Versailles, it follows that the seizures effected and the sanctions imposed in that territory are also devoid of treaty justification.

* Not printed.

IV.—Legality of the Action in the Rhineland.

13. Further, if it be admitted that the phrase "such other measures," referred to in paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII, denotes only measures which it is proper for Governments to take within the sphere of their own authority, no action can properly be taken within the occupied area of the Rhineland which is subject to joint Allied occupation, unless all the Allied Powers participating in the occupation are parties to it.

V.—Position of the Reparation Commission.

14. Whether or not the Rhineland Commission was acting in conformity with the Rhineland Agreement in taking the measures in question is not a matter which the Reparation Commission is called upon to discuss, but the interest of the Reparation Commission in the action of the High Commission arises from the wording of paragraph 12 of Annex II to Part VIII, which reads as follows:—

"Subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the commission is constituted by the several Allied and Associated Governments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above as the exclusive agency of the said Governments respectively for receiving, selling, holding and distributing the reparation payments to be made by 'Germany' under this part of the present treaty."

15. All the ordinances therefore promulgated by the Rhineland High Commission and any other action taken by them or under their instructions for the appropriation or control of assets or property in the Rhineland with the view of applying them for purposes of reparation or restitution, infringe the rights of the Reparation Commission.

16. After the cessation of passive resistance the Franco-Belgian Mission of Control of Factories and Mines (known as the M.I.C.U.M.) signed a number of agreements for reparation deliveries with German industrial combinations in the Ruhr. As a type of these agreements, the agreement with the so-called Commission of Six, signed at Düsseldorf on the 23rd November, 1923, may be taken. (See Annex (B)* to the present memorandum.) The Inter-Allied Rhineland High Commission has also concluded agreements for reparation deliveries with industrial combinations in the Rhineland. Of these agreements the one signed on the 10th November, 1923, with the Rhineland dye-stuffs industries may be taken as a type. (See Annex (C)* to the present memorandum.) The effect of these agreements is to determine the amounts of reparation deliveries and coal tax which the interested firms shall pay to the Franco-Belgian authorities. In certain agreements subsequently concluded, a new element has been introduced, whereby contracting firms undertake to contribute a cash payment to a special common fund destined for the reimbursement of deliveries ordered "for the purpose of reparation or restitution in kind," either from the contracting firms themselves or from other industrial groups which have subscribed to similar arrangements. The form of this contribution varies. In some cases it is fixed at a lump sum; in others it is a fixed percentage of the gross receipts of the contracting firms; and yet in others a percentage of the value of goods exported abroad or sent to non-occupied Germany. An example of this system is provided by article 2 of the agreement signed at Coblenz on the 30th January, 1924, between the High Commission and the representatives of the refractory products industry in the occupied territory. (Annex (D)* to the present memorandum.)

17. The obligation to make reparation deliveries rests, under Part VIII of the treaty, upon the German Government, while the Reparation Commission is the exclusive agent of the Allied Powers for receiving, selling, holding and distributing them. Any intervention by German industrial firms or by bodies such as the Franco-Belgian Mission of Control in the Ruhr or the Rhineland High Commission, purporting to hold a special commission from individual Allied Governments, or groups of Allied Governments, is prima facie irregular. Such intervention cannot be accepted unless the interveners are recognised either by the German Government or by the Reparation Commission as their accredited agents.

18. Whatever may be the relations between the German Government and the industrial undertakings concerned, there can be no foundation for a claim that the Rhineland High Commission or the Franco-Belgian Mission of Control have received from the Reparation Commission any mandate or authority of any kind whatever. When the Reparation Commission found Germany in default, it confined its action to notifying that default to the Allied Governments. It did not recommend any course of action, and it has never been called upon to approve the action that was taken.

* Not printed.

GERMANY.

Further, it abrogated none of its functions, and it has never recognised either the Franco-Belgian Mission of Control or the Rhineland High Commission (a body constituted for limited purposes not connected with reparations) as its agents for the purpose of paragraph 12 of Annex II to Part VIII of the treaty.

VI.—Cost of the Operations in the Ruhr and Rhineland.

19. Although the occupation of the Ruhr commenced on the 11th January, 1923, no accounts of the results of the operations of the French and Belgian Governments have so far been presented to the Reparation Commission. It would, therefore, be premature for His Majesty's Government to seek to discuss the questions which may in the future arise upon an examination of any such accounts. His Majesty's Government will confine themselves to indicating that, in their view, a claim by the French and Belgian Governments to a credit in the accounts of the Reparation Commission for costs or losses incurred in operations which are not sanctioned by the treaty would not be admissible. When these transactions are brought into the accounts of the commission, the German Government will necessarily be credited, and the French and Belgian Governments debited, with the gross value of all assets, moneys and property received, seized or occupied, whether in the Rhineland or the Ruhr.

VII.—Summary.

20. To sum up, the view of His Majesty's Government is that the measures taken independently by France and Belgium against Germany derive no legal authority from any clause of the Treaty of Versailles. In executing these measures, the French and Belgian Governments and their agents have assumed functions which they had no right to assume, and which properly belong to the Reparation Commission alone. His Majesty's Government therefore, contend that the Reparation Commission cannot in any circumstances permit the French and Belgian Governments to be credited in the accounts of the commission with the expenses of action for which the treaty gives no warrant.

Foreign Office, April 10, 1924.

Report.

We agree with the terms of the memorandum, and do not consider any amendment thereto necessary.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 27, 1924.*

PATRICK HASTINGS.
HENRY H. SLESSER.

1925

This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(13004)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1925.

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked S^a, &c.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	Apr. 27, 1925	Expropriation of Baron de Forest's estates in Czechoslovakia	1

EGYPT.

2	Law Officers ..	Jan. 5, 1925	Arrest by British military authorities in Egypt for political crimes	4
3	Law Officers ..	Jan. 20,	Egyptian tribute loans: liability of Egypt to pay interest	7
4	Law Officers ..	Apr. 7,	Arrests by British military authorities in Egypt	12
5	Lord Chancellor	July 22,	Egypt and the League of Nations	13

GENERAL.

6	Law Officers ..	Mar. 13, 1925	Law Officers' opinions down to 1878: question of allowing public to have access	16
7	Law Officers ..	May 23,	Communication of Law Officers' opinions to other Government Departments and to His Majesty's representatives abroad	16
8 ^a	Law Officers (Colonial Office)	Apr. 8,	Prerogative of the Crown as regards cessions of territory. 16A.

GERMANY.

8	Law Officers ..	Jan. 16, 1925	Investigation of Germany's military situation by Council of League of Nations	17
---	-----------------	---------------	---	----

ITALY.

8 ^a	Law Officers ..	July 10, 1925	Italian restrictions on carriage of emigrants by British vessels; position as regards Anglo-Italian Commercial Treaty of 1883	20
----------------	-----------------	---------------	---	----

MEXICO.

9	Law Officers ..	Aug. 4, 1925	Validity of certain Mexican bond issues of 1913 and 1914	21
---	-----------------	--------------	--	----

MOROCCO.

10	Law Officers ..	Mar. 16, 1925	Export from Great Britain of aeroplane for use of Riff tribes in revolt against Spanish Government	27
----	-----------------	---------------	--	----

(iii)

PALESTINE.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
10 ^a	Law Officers ..	Apr. 7, 1925	Constitutional position of Palestine Government	28
	[Colonial Office]
10 ^b	Law Officers ..	June 19,	Preferential treatment in United Kingdom of goods imported from Palestine	30
	[Colonial Office]

PERSIA.

11	Law Officers ..	June 30, 1925	Expansion of note circulation of Imperial Bank of Persia	32
----	-----------------	---------------	--	----

ROUMANIA.

12	Law Officers ..	Nov. 4, 1925	Standard Oil Company's claim against His Majesty's Government in respect of the destruction of Roumanian oil wells in 1916	33
----	-----------------	--------------	--	----

7A Law Officers Dec. 17, 1925.
[Air Ministry]Power of the Crown to restrict or prohibit by Order under Air Navigation Act 1920 photography from foreign aircraft over Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

TURKEY

12^A Law Officers and
Mr. J. H. Stamp
(Clearing Office) | July 13, 1925 | Claims of British Nationals against Turkish Govt. | 38

(iv)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1925.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

Aircraft: photography from and carriage of photographic apparatus in, 16C - 16H.

AER—EGY.

EMI—LOA.

A.
Aeroplane: export of, from Great Britain to Riff tribes in Morocco, 27, 28.
Allenby, Field-Marshal Viscount, 4-6, 14.
Arbitration: right of United States to claim, in connection with Standard Oil Company's claim against Great Britain, 33-37.
Arms: aeroplane sent from Great Britain to Riff tribes in Morocco, 27, 28.
Army: British in Egypt; arrests for political crimes, 4-6, 12, 13.
" British in Egypt; anomalous position, 6, 13.
" German; investigation of position by Council of League of Nations, 17-19.
Arrests: by British military authorities in Egypt for political crimes, 4-6, 12, 13.
Australia: discrimination against Italian vessels in carriage of passengers from Italy, 20, 21.

B.
Bank of Montreal, 25.
Bank of Persia: expansion of note circulation, 32, 33.
Banque de Paris et des Pays-Bas, 23.
Bennett, Captain J. G., 25.
Bonds. See Loans.
Bryan, Mr. W. J., 22.

C.
Carranza, General, 22.
Claim of Standard Oil Company of New Jersey for destruction of Roumanian oil wells, 33-37.
Claims: of foreign companies; right of a State to support, against a third State, 35-37.
Commerce: meaning of, 21.
Companies: foreign; right of a State to support claims of, against a third State, 35-37.
Crimes: political; arrests by British military authorities in Egypt for, 4-6, 12, 13.
Customs: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from Palestine, 30-32.
" Palestine unable to give preferential treatment to Great Britain, 32.
Czechoslovakia: expropriation of Baron de Forest's estates, 1-4.
Claims: British against Turkey; rights under Peace Treaties, 38-40
Declaration of Martial Law: meaning of expression, 6.
Deligou Bay Railway Arbitration, 36.
Diplomatic Intervention: not allowed until legal remedies are exhausted, 37.
Drapella, Franz, 2.

E.
Egypt: arrests by British military authorities, 4-6, 12, 13.
" anomalous position of British army in, 6, 13.
" and the League of Nations, 13-15.
" liability to pay interest on tribute loans, 7-12.

Emigration: Italian restrictions on carriage of emigrants by British vessels, 20, 21.
Estates: Baron de Forest's, in Czechoslovakia; expropriation, 1-4.
Expropriation: Baron de Forest's estates in Czechoslovakia, 1-4.

F.
Foreign Enlistment Act: application in case of export of aeroplane for use of Riff tribes in Morocco, 27, 28.
Forest, Baron de, 1-4.
Freshfields, Messrs., 9.

G.
Germany: investigation of military situation by Council of League of Nations, 17-19.
Government: right of lawful Government to refuse to recognise acts of a usurper, 27.
Guarantee Trust Company of New York, 23.

H.
Haking, General, 4.
Huerta, President, 21-27.

I.
Imperial Bank of Persia: expansion of note circulation, 32, 33.
Italy: restrictions on carriage of emigrants by British vessels, 20, 21.
" Australian discrimination against Italian vessels in carriage of passengers from, 20, 21.

K.
Kay, John de, 23-27.

L.
Lascourain, Señor, 22.
Law Officers' Opinions: public access to those down to 1878, 16.
" " communication to other Government Departments and to His Majesty's representatives abroad, 16, 17.
League of Nations: position of Egypt, 13-15.
" investigation of Germany's military situation by Council of, 17-19.

Loans: Egyptian tribute; liability of Egypt to pay interest, 7-12.
" validity of certain Mexican ("Huerta") bond issues of 1913 and 1914, 21-27.
" refusal of Constitutional Government to recognise bonds issued by a usurper, 27.

*Air Navigation Act 1920: powers of the Crown, to prohibit or restrict by Order under, photography from foreign aircraft over Great Britain and Northern Ireland, 16C - 16H

(v)

MAD—SUA.

TAF—ZAG.

M.

Madero, General, 21, 22.
Mandates: preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from territories placed under, 30-32.
Marek, Jeronym, 2.
Marital Law: declaration of; meaning of expression, 6.
Mexican National Packing Company, 23-26.
Mexico: validity of certain ("Huerta") bond issues of 1913 and 1914, 21-27.
Military. See Army.
Morgan, Grenfell and Co. (Limited), 23-25.
Morocco: export of aeroplane from Great Britain to Riff tribes in, 27, 28.

N.

National Bank of Mexico, 22.
Navigation: meaning of, 21.
Norton-Griffiths, Sir John, 33.

O.

Oil wells: destruction of. See Roumania.

P.

Palestine: constitutional position of Government, 28-32.
" preferential treatment in United Kingdom of imports from, 30-32.
" unable to give preferential treatment to Great Britain, 32.

Paso, Señor del, 23, 25, 27.

Peat, Messrs. W. B. and Co., 23.

Preferential treatment. See Customs.

Prerogative, Royal. See Royal Prerogative. R

Reuter's Bank (Limited), 23-26.
Romana Americana: right of United States to support claim of, against Great Britain, 33-37.

Rothschild, Messrs., 9, 11.
Roumania: destruction of oil wells in 1916; Standard Oil Company's claim against Great Britain, 33-37.

Royal Prerogative: as regards cessions of territory, 16A, 16B.

Stack, Major-General Sir L., 4. S
Standard Oil Company of New Jersey: claim against Great Britain for destruction of Roumanian oil wells in 1916, 33-37.
Suarez, Vice-President Pino, 22.

Photography: from foreign Aircraft. See Aircraft.

Prohibited Areas: photography of from foreign aircraft, powers of the Crown to prohibit 16D.

[14641]

T.

Taft, President, 22.
Treaty: Anglo-Italian Commercial, 1883; and Italian restrictions on carriage of emigrants by British vessels, 20, 21.
" Anglo-Italian Commercial, 1883; and discrimination by Australia against Italian vessels in carriage of passengers from Italy to Australia, 20, 21.
" Anglo-United States Arbitration, 1908; right of United States to claim arbitration in regard to Standard Oil Company's claim against Great Britain, 33-37.

Treaty of Peace (Austria): question of breach of article 249 in relation to Baron de Forest's estates in Czechoslovakia, 1-4.
" (Germany): right of investigation into Germany's military situation conferred by article 213, 17-19.

Treaty of Saint-Germain. See Treaty of Peace (Austria).

Treaty of Versailles. See Treaty of Peace (Germany).
Treaty of Peace (Germany): provisions of as regards claims against Turkey & British nationality (Turkey).

United States: right of, to support claim of Roumanian company against Great Britain, 33-37.

V.

Vessels: British; Italian restrictions on carriage of emigrants by, 20, 21.
" Italian; Australian discrimination against, in carriage of passengers from Italy to Australia, 20, 21.

W.

Wilson, President W., 22, 24.
Witham, Roskell, Munster and Weld, Messrs., 1.

Z.

Zaghlul, Saad Pasha, 8, 12.

Territory: Royal Prerogative as regards cessions of, 16A, 16B.

38-40

b

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1925.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

[C 5654/707/12/1925]

No. 1.

[April 27, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 16, 1925.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request the favour of your opinion on the following matter:—

2. The question is, whether Czechoslovakia has, in the circumstances herein-after mentioned, committed a breach of article 249 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain with relation to an estate which is the property of Baron de Forest, a British subject. The solicitors of Baron de Forest, Messrs. Witham, Roskell, Munster and Weld, are of the opinion that a breach has been committed and urge that compensation should be demanded by His Majesty's Government on his behalf from the Czechoslovak Government, and that, in the event of that Government being unwilling to accede to this demand, the matter should be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague. The Secretary of State, on the other hand, is advised that there has been no breach of article 249, and that there is no case for submission to the court.

Expropriation of Baron de Forest's estates in Czechoslovakia.

3. Article 249 reads as follows:—

"The question of private property, rights and interests in an enemy country shall be settled according to the principles laid down in this section and to the provisions of the annex hereto.

"(a.) The exceptional war measures and measures of transfer (defined in paragraph 3 of the annex hereto) taken in the territory of the former Austrian Empire with respect to the property, rights and interests of nationals of Allied or Associated Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, when liquidation has not been completed, shall be immediately discontinued or stayed and the property, rights and interests concerned restored to their owners."

Paragraph 8 of the annex to Section IV of Part X reads as follows:—

"The restitution provided in article 249 will be carried out by order of the Austrian Government or of the authorities which have been substituted for it. Detailed accounts of the action of administrators shall be furnished to the interested persons by the Austrian authorities upon request, which may be made at any time after the coming into force of the present treaty."

The Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye was signed on the 10th September, 1919, and came into force on the 16th July, 1920. It was signed and ratified by Czechoslovakia.

4. Baron de Forest was before the war the owner of large estates situated at Rossitz-Eichhorn, near Brünn, in Moravia, in territory formerly part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and now within the Czechoslovak Republic. Baron de Forest contends that the Czechoslovak Government, being the authority substituted for the Austrian Government, as provided in paragraph 8 of the annex, has failed to fulfil an obligation imposed on it by article 249 to restore to him as owner this property and his rights and interests therein.

5. The estates consist of 5,025 acres of arable land and 25,250 acres of forest land, and in addition thereto a castle and some factories. Baron de Forest states that the value of the estate was in 1914 about £1 million.

During the war the estate was sequestered and administered as enemy property by the late Austro-Hungarian Government. In January 1919 Baron de Forest heard that the sequestration of his property had been raised, and requested the Czechoslovak Government temporarily to take over the administration of this estate for the reason that he was unable at the time to make arrangements for its management. On the 18th March, 1919, the Czechoslovak Government, in deference to this request, appointed one Jeronym Marek compulsory administrator of the estate. In March 1920 Baron de Forest intimated to the Czechoslovak Government that he wished to take over the administration himself, and on the 1st April the compulsory administration was cancelled by that Government, and on the 31st May, 1920, one Franz Drapella, acting for Baron de Forest, took over the administration of the estate.

6. The Czechoslovak Government have adopted an agrarian policy under which large estates are to be split up and the land held in small holdings. In pursuance of this policy, a decree, No. 32, was enacted on the 9th November, 1918, and came into force on the 18th November, 1918 (Paper (A)), by virtue of which a "distrain" was placed on large estates, which deprived their owners of the power of alienation or of charging such estates, except by the consent of the Government. Subject to this restriction the owners were left in possession to administer and enjoy the profits of their estates.

This policy was continued by Law No. 215, passed on the 16th April, 1919, and coming into force on the 24th April, 1919 (Paper (B)). By this law large estates were defined as all estates belonging to one person in area over 150 hectares of agricultural, or 250 hectares of forest or other kinds of land, and all large estates were placed under "distrain." The State, acting through a Land Office, created by this decree, was given power to take over and dispossess the owners of "all property under distrain," subject to the right of the dispossessed owners to be assigned at their choice a portion of such property not exceeding the amounts above stated. All sales, leases, or mortgages of distrained property were prohibited and all agreements for sale, lease or mortgage effected after the 28th October, 1918, rendered void. Subject to this restriction and an obligation enforceable by law to administer in an efficient way, the owners of distrained property were left in the administration and enjoyment of their estates unless and until they were taken over by the Land Office.

It was further provided that all estates which came under distrain under this law should be entered in the land register, and that notice should be given to the persons managing such estates of the intention of the Land Office to take them over, and that such compensation should be paid for the property taken over as should be laid down by a later legislation. Law No. 329 of the 8th April, 1920, as modified by Law No. 220 of 13th July, 1922, Decree No. 53 of the 21st January, 1921, and Decree No. 221 of the 7th August, 1922, lay down the principles on which such compensation shall be assessed. The essential clauses of the above laws and decrees are attached (Paper (C)).

7. The estate of Baron de Forest was entered in the land registry and came under distrain under Decree No. 32 and Law No. 215 before the signature of the Treaty of Saint-Germain, and in the case of the decree before the sequestration placed on it by Austro-Hungarian legislation had been raised. Baron de Forest has, therefore, never obtained the free power of disposition over his estate since the war. Subject to the restrictions on alienation above mentioned, Baron de Forest, however, remained in control of the whole of his estate, with the exception of certain small portions which he has been obliged to dispose of; and, so far as is known, received the profits thereof. The Land Office has now notified a further transfer amounting to 60 per cent. of the arable land, or 9 per cent. of the whole estate.

8. It is contended by the solicitors for Baron de Forest that, by reason of the operation of the Decree No. 32 and Law No. 215, the estate has never been restored to him as is required by article 249 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain. Their arguments are set out in Parts III and IV of a memorandum, dated the 12th January, 1922, and submitted by Baron de Forest (Paper (D)).

9. The Secretary of State has been advised: (1) that the obligation on Czechoslovakia created by article 249 (a) and paragraph 8 of the annex is confined to the revocation of transfers of property (now within her territory) carried out by the late Austro-Hungarian Government after the commencement of the war with respect to the property of the nationals of States at war with Austria-Hungary and in pursuance of its war-time legislation or policy respecting enemy property; (2) that the property of Baron de Forest was never subjected to any "measure of transfer" by the Austro-Hungarian Government, and that, therefore, no obligation on Czechoslovakia has ever come in being by reason of this article with reference to this property; (3) that the legislation of Czechoslovakia, and the Decrees No. 32 and No. 215 in particular, are not within the purview of article 249 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain.

10. In explanation of the advice mentioned in the preceding paragraph, heading (1), the Secretary of State desires to draw your attention to the following considerations:—

- (a.) The only obligation created against Czechoslovakia is derived from paragraph 8 of the annex.
- (b.) This obligation is confined to ordering "the restitution" of property.
- (c.) Reference to paragraphs (a) and (f) of article 249 shows that by "restitution" in paragraph 8 of the annex is meant "the reversion in the original owner of the legal right of ownership in property of which he was divested by a 'measure of transfer.'"
- (d.) It is provided by article 249 (a) that "exceptional war measures" are to be discontinued or "stayed," and by article 249 (e) that Austria shall pay compensation for damage suffered by Allied nationals by reason of the application of "exceptional war measures" to them. In no part of the treaty is any obligation placed on Czechoslovakia with regard to property subjected to exceptional war measures only.
- (e.) Paragraph 3 (second sub-paragraph) of the annex defines the expression "measures of transfer" as used in article 249 (a) as "measures which have affected or will affect the ownership of enemy property by transferring it in whole or in part to a person other than the enemy owner."

Article 249 (e) provides for compensation to be paid by Austria for damages inflicted upon property subjected to "measures of transfer."

11. And with regard to heading (2) of paragraph 9 to the following considerations:—

- (1.) The sequestration to which the estate of Baron de Forest was subjected during the war did not involve a transfer of ownership. It was not therefore a "measure of transfer."
It was on the other hand an "exceptional war measure" as defined in paragraph 3 of the annex. It was discontinued in January 1919. Baron de Forest has claimed against Austria compensation for the damage inflicted on his estates by the sequestration.
- (2.) Baron de Forest was, at the time when the Treaty of Saint-Germain was signed and at the time when it came into force, possessed of the legal ownership of all his estates.

12. And lastly, with regard to heading (3) of paragraph 9 hereof to the following consideration:—

The Decrees No. 32 and No. 215 of the Czechoslovak Republic are not "measures of transfer" or "exceptional war measures" within the meaning of article 249 (a) as defined by paragraph 3 of the annex, since they are not directed against "enemy property," but are the decrees of a Government never at war with Great Britain, applied equally against owners of property of whatever nationality.

Article 249 (e), which provides that Austria shall pay compensation for damage inflicted by such measures, shows that the expressions are limited to measures of the late Austro-Hungarian Government.

EGYPT.

13. I am to request that you will be so good as to take the question into your consideration and to favour the Secretary of State with your opinion whether a claim arising out of article 249 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain could be presented on behalf of Baron de Forest against Czechoslovakia before the Permanent Court of International Justice with any reasonable chance of success.

I have, &c.

MILES W. LAMPSON.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Translation of Decree No. 32 of the Czechoslovak Republic, dated November 9, 1918.
[C 4999/707/12/1925.]
(B.) Translation of Law No. 215 of the Czechoslovak Republic, dated April 16, 1919.
[C 4999/707/12/1925.]
(C.) Translations of Law No. 329, dated April 8, 1920, as modified by Law No. 220 of July 13, 1922; Decree No. 53 of January 21, 1921, and Decree No. 221 of August 7, 1922.
[C 4999/707/12/1925.]
(D.) Parts III and IV of Memorandum presented by Baron de Forest, dated January 12, 1922.
[C 4999/707/12/1925.]

Report.

WE answer this question in the negative. In our opinion it is not possible to hold that the measures of which Baron de Forest complains are exceptional war measures, or measures affecting the ownership of enemy property; and it is only these with which article 249 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain is concerned.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
April 27, 1925.*

EGYPT.

No. 2.

[J 48/32/16/1925]

[January 5, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 24, 1924.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Chamberlain, to request the favour of your advice on the following point:—

2. Shortly after the murder of Sir Lee Stack, Lord Allenby received information (Paper (A)) that three Egyptian Deputies had taken an oath to continue the murder of Englishmen. He was instructed (Paper (B)) that, if he was satisfied that there was reasonable ground for the report, he should inform the Egyptian Prime Minister and call upon him to confine the men to a place where they could do no harm. If the Prime Minister declined to act, Lord Allenby was authorised to cause them to be arrested and confined in a fortress or elsewhere under British guard. The Prime Minister, however, was particularly anxious (Paper (C)) that the arrest should be made by the British authorities, on the ground that the Egyptian Government could not make such an arrest without declaring Egyptian martial law. Lord Allenby accordingly instructed General Haking to arrest the men and confine them in the citadel, and this was done.

3. Subsequently, the Director-General of the European Department and the Commandant of the Cairo Police represented to Lord Allenby (Paper (D)) that the arrest and temporary detention of some forty persons was urgently essential if the murder of Sir Lee Stack was to be elucidated and the considerable probability of more murders being committed diminished. Lord Allenby reported that, in the event of the Egyptian Prime Minister's declining to instruct the authorities to arrest the persons concerned, he proposed to have them arrested by the British military

Arrests by British
military authorities in Egypt for political crimes.

EGYPT.

5

authorities. Lord Allenby stated that he was advised that there were precedents for arrest by the army of occupation in the time of Lord Cromer, and that the existence or non-existence of martial law was legally irrelevant.

4. The Attorney-General, however, who was consulted at this point, was of opinion (Papers (E) and (F)) that the British army of occupation had no right to proceed to the proposed arrests. The proper procedure would be, if the military authorities wished to proceed in virtue of their powers of an army of occupation, to take over the civil administration of the territory to such an extent as to proceed to the arrest of individuals, and to issue some indication of their intention so to take over the administration and of the limits within which it would be taken over. This would be tantamount to a declaration of martial law. If the arrest were made as proposed, it would amount to such a supersession of the civil authorities by the military as to be itself an act of martial law, and it might be very difficult to terminate such supersession of the civil authorities when this particular incident had been completed. Lord Allenby was informed accordingly (Paper (G)), and instructed that no effort should be spared to overcome the reluctance of the Egyptian Prime Minister to declare Egyptian martial law.

5. On learning of the arrest of the three Deputies, however, the Egyptian Prime Minister at once realised that, from the point of view of Egyptian public opinion, he had made a political mistake in leaving the initiative to the British military authorities. He accordingly expressed his willingness to take over the prisoners and deal with them according to Egyptian criminal procedure (Paper (H)), and the three men were therefore handed over to the Egyptian authorities. The Egyptian Government similarly agreed (Paper (I)) to arrest the forty persons referred to in paragraph 3.

6. Lord Allenby subsequently reported (Paper (J)) that the possibility of a further political murder remained not improbable, and it was necessary to take thought for the position. He particularly wished not to declare British martial law, and was unwilling to empower the military authorities to make arrests and searches, though this was less objectionable than introducing the whole apparatus of martial law, and might be necessary. He considered that the best course would be to induce the Egyptian Government to declare a state of siege. He further reported that one fairly sure preventive measure would be the arrest of about 300 known individuals; the arrest of about 100 of these would be a less sure preventive, but still of considerable value.

7. On the 9th December, Lord Allenby reported (Paper (K)) that the evidence against the persons under arrest was slow in accumulating, and the time might shortly come when the Egyptian Government would not feel able to renew the period of detention under the law of criminal procedure. Lord Allenby considered that it would be intolerable that the three Deputies, who were originally arrested by the British authorities, should regain their freedom in the near future. He therefore proposed, in the first instance, to do his utmost to induce the Egyptian Government to find justification for keeping these persons under arrest in the ordinary way; if this failed, to press them strongly to declare a state of siege, and in the last resort to order the arrest of the persons concerned by the British military authorities.

8. Lord Allenby was informed, in reply (Paper (L)), that the Secretary of State was advised that the arrest and detention of the persons in question by the British military authorities was, in fact, martial law, and could be justified and maintained only by proclamation of martial law. In the event of Lord Allenby's legal adviser taking a different view, his reasons were to be telegraphed fully. These views have now been received, and will be found in Paper (M), and the present position as regards the detention of the individuals concerned is described in Paper (N).

9. A memorandum giving such information as exists in this Department on the subject of political arrests by the British military authorities in Egypt before the war is enclosed (Paper (O)), and it will be seen that it hardly bears out Lord Allenby's statement as to precedents contained in Paper (D).

10. In these circumstances, I am to request that you will take the enclosed papers into consideration and favour Mr. Chamberlain with your opinion as to whether, in the event of the British military authorities in Egypt effecting the arrest of persons suspected of being likely to encourage or perpetrate political crimes, their action would amount to a declaration of martial law, or whether, as contended by Lord Allenby's legal adviser, such action can be regarded as within the normal powers of self-protection which are of necessity inherent in the Commander-in-chief of an army of occupation. Mr. Chamberlain would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

EGYPT.

11. It may be necessary to send instructions to Lord Allenby on the subject at any moment, and Mr. Chamberlain would therefore be grateful if he could be favoured with your opinion at a very early date.

I have, &c.
D. G. OSBORNE.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 396, November 24, 1924. [E 10195/368/16/1924.]
 (B.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 390, November 24, 1924. [E 19185/368/16/1924.]
 (C.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 433, November 26, 1924. [E 10417/368/16/1924.]
 (D.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 434, November 26, 1924. [E 10418/368/16/1924.]
 (E.) Note by Sir C. Hurst, November 27, 1924. [E 10521/368/16/1924.]
 (F.) Minute by Sir C. Hurst, November 28, 1924. [E 10522/368/16/1924.]
 (G.) To Lord Allenby, telegram No. 252, November 27, 1924. [E 10418/368/16/1924.]
 (H.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 446, November 27, 1924. [E 10486/368/16/1924.]
 (I.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 447, November 27, 1924. [E 10478/368/16/1924.]
 (J.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 518, December 9, 1924. [E 11099/368/16/1924.]
 (K.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 519, December 9, 1924. [E 11100/368/16/1924.]
 (L.) To Lord Allenby, telegram No. 298, December 15, 1924. [E 11100/368/16/1924.]
 (M.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 556, December 20, 1924. [E 11484/368/16/1924.]
 (N.) Lord Allenby's telegram No. 538, December 14, 1924. [E 11268/368/16/1924.]
 (O.) Library memorandum, December 23, 1924. [10004.]

Report.

1. Before answering the question submitted to us, we think it convenient to consider what is meant by the expression "a declaration of martial law." Strictly speaking, there is no such thing as martial law known to the law of England; what is popularly so termed is really the defiance and disregard by the Executive of legal rights and obligations. It follows that "a declaration of martial law" is merely an intimation to the public that the Executive intends to disregard the law and to ignore legal rights. It follows also that the Executive can decide to what extent it intends to defy the law, or, in other words, how far "martial law" is to extend. In some foreign countries a legal right is given by the Constitution to the Executive to suspend the ordinary law by declaring a state of siege, and we gather that Egypt is one of these countries. But the declaration of a state of siege is the act of the Egyptian Executive, conferring on that Executive certain powers. The difficulty of the present situation lies in the anomalous position of the British army of occupation in Egypt. The army owes allegiance only to the British Sovereign, and is the instrument of the British Government; but, since Egypt is a friendly nation and is an independent sovereign State, the army must be treated as being in Egypt with the consent of that State, and the law governing the relations of the army or its members in Egypt to the Egyptian population must be the Egyptian law. We assume that there is no provision in the Egyptian law giving to the British army any right to arrest or imprison Egyptians, and the Khedivial Decree of 1895 and the despatch of the 22nd February, 1895, both seem to us to recognise that the legal position is as we have stated it.

2. In our opinion, it follows from the considerations set out above that the arrest by the British military authorities of persons suspected of being likely to encourage or perpetrate political crimes is an illegal action, or, in other words, is a declaration of martial law. If it were intended to exercise such a power, it might be well to make a public declaration to this effect, defining and limiting the extent to which the military authorities intended to go in disregarding the ordinary law. This would no doubt prevent the Egyptian public or foreign nations from supposing that we intended to resume the administration of the country or to re-establish the régime existing before March 1922. At the same time, it must be remembered that it is not always easy to limit or prevent the extension of "martial law" when it has once been established. For instance, if an arrested person were to appeal to an Egyptian court and that court were to accept jurisdiction, we might be compelled very largely to extend our arbitrary rule. These, however, are matters for political rather than for legal decision.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP

*Law Officers' Department,
January 5, 1925.*

[J 203/52/16/1925]

No. 3.

[January 20, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 9, 1925.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Chamberlain, to submit to you the papers listed below relating to the question whether Egypt is liable to pay the interest on what are known as the tribute loans. The whole of the sums required for the service of two of these loans (those of 1891 and 1894) and a part of the sum required for the interest on the third loan (that of 1855) have hitherto always been paid by Egypt, but in the summer of this year a note (Paper (I)) was received from the Egyptian Minister in London to the effect that payments due on the 12th July would be effected, but that after that date the service of the tribute loans would be suspended and the sums required for the service of the loans would be paid into the National Bank of Egypt until a decision on the question at issue had been arrived at. 2. Detailed information with regard to the tribute loans will be found in the two Treasury papers prepared in 1916—"The Egyptian Tribute Loans" and "The Turkish Guaranteed Loan, 1855" (Paper (A)). The position may be shortly stated as follows:—

The tribute loans were loans contracted by the Ottoman Government, and for the security of the bondholders the Ottoman Government made assignments of the Egyptian tribute to the extent required for the service of the loans now represented by the loans of 1891 and 1894 and to the extent of a contribution of £72,000 per annum towards the service of the loan of 1855.

The tribute loans now consist of three loans:—

- The 4 per cent. Guaranteed Loan of 1855, raised by the Turkish Government at the time of the Crimean War, and guaranteed as regards interest but not as regards sinking fund by the British and French Governments (see 18 & 19 Vict., cap. 99). The interest on this loan is payable on the 1st August and 1st February in each year. The sinking fund of 1 per cent. has been in default since 1875. The interest (now £153,752 per annum) has been met as to £72,000 from the tribute and as to £81,752 from the "Cyprus tribute" owing to circumstances explained in Paper (A). There is of course no question of default on the interest, as it is guaranteed by the British and French Governments. The interest due on the 1st August was (except for a small amount) covered by payments made before the 15th July. If Egypt does not pay the interest due on the 1st February, it will have to be found by His Majesty's Government and by the French Government.
- The $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. loan of 1894, representing the original loans of 1854 and 1871. The annuity for interest and sinking fund (49 per cent. per annum) on this loan is due on the 15th April and the 15th October in each year and default occurred on the 15th October last.
- The 4 per cent. loan of 1891, representing the original loan of 1877. The annuity for interest and sinking fund (42 per cent. per annum) on this loan is due on the 10th April and the 10th October in each year, and default occurred on the 10th October last.

3. Egypt was originally a province of the Ottoman Empire and paid tribute to the Sultan as such. As the autonomy of Egypt gradually became more pronounced the position of the tribute was regularised, and in 1841 the amount was fixed at the equivalent of £363,635 annually. In 1866 the Khedive Ismail obtained certain further privileges from the Porte, and the tribute was raised to the equivalent of £681,820 per annum (altered to £681,872 in 1875). At this figure it remained until 1914, when the connection between Egypt and Turkey was severed, and Egypt was declared to be a British protectorate. The text of the announcement then made by His Majesty's Government will be found at p. 3 of Paper (A). The protectorate continued until 1922, when His Majesty's Government issued a declaration (Paper (B)) to the effect that Egypt was recognised to be a sovereign independent State, but that certain questions were reserved to the absolute discretion of His Majesty's Government. Fuller information with regard to the Egyptian tribute up to 1916 will be found on

EGYPT.

8

pp. 2 and 3 of Paper (A). I am also to draw your attention to a memorandum by the legal adviser to the Foreign Office, dated the 7th November, 1922 (Paper (E)), on the question whether the Egyptian tribute must necessarily be regarded as having ceased to be payable in 1914.

4. The tribute payable by Egypt to the Ottoman Empire was charged by the Porte with the payment of sums for the service of certain loans.

5. In 1855 there was a free balance of £72,000 per annum out of the tribute. This sum was applied to the service of the guaranteed loan of 1855, but no formal decree or instrument was issued by the Khedive pledging himself to the payment of this sum to the bondholders. References are, however, made in certain loan contracts between the Porte and financial houses responsible for the issue of new Turkish loans to the arrangements in force as to the payment by Egypt of the £72,000 towards the service of the 1855 loan (see, for instance, paragraph 4 of the loan contract of 1877, pp. 12 and 13 of Paper (A)). Of these loan contracts Egypt had official notice, and she acted in accordance with their contents.

6. In 1894 the Khedive of Egypt issued a decree reciting the contract of the 4th-16th May, 1894, for the conversion of the Ottoman loans of 1854 and 1871, and pledging the Egyptian Government to pay annually until 1955 a stipulated sum for the service of the new loan. For the service of the 1854 loan the sum of £210,000 out of the Egyptian tribute had been pledged by the Porte. For the service of the 1871 loan the sum of £399,000 out of the Egyptian tribute had been pledged by the Porte (see p. 5 of Paper (A)). It will be noticed that the title of this decree is "Décret affectant au Service de l'Emprunt ottoman . . . une Somme . . . prélevée sur le Tribut d'Égypte," and this stipulation is repeated in the body of the decree: "Cette somme sera prélevée sur le tribut d'Égypte que nous et nos successeurs devons et devrons au Gouvernement impérial ottoman" (see pp. 28 and 29 of Paper (A)).

7. In 1891 an analogous decree had been issued by the Khedive relating to the loan of 1891 (see p. 35 of Paper (A)).

8. The service of the loans of 1855, 1894 and 1891 required the whole of the Egyptian tribute.

9. Despite the termination in 1914 of the political connection between Turkey and Egypt, the Egyptian Government continued to make periodical payments to London of the sums required for the service of the tribute loans; nor was any change made after the declaration issued by His Majesty's Government in February 1922 as to the independence of Egypt. It should be explained, however, that, for some little time after the declaration of 1922, Governments were in office in Egypt which were largely dependent on the support of the Residency. Furthermore, a British Financial Adviser remained in the service of the Egyptian Government and enjoyed a position of considerable influence. These two circumstances were sufficient to ensure that the payment of the sums required for the service of the tribute loans was made by the Egyptian Government. While the Zaghlul Cabinet were in office neither of these circumstances existed. The Government did not depend on the support of the Residency, and the position of the Financial Adviser had changed, though in the document issued by Lord Allenby to the British advisers in Egypt with the tacit concurrence of the Egyptian Government at the time of the declaration as to Egypt's independence (see Paper (D)) the functions of the Financial Adviser as regards external loans are preserved.

10. It should be remembered that the members of the party to which Saad Pasha Zaghlul and his Cabinet belonged all maintain that Egypt has acquired complete political independence, and that her independence does not date from and is not conditioned by the British declaration of 1922 (Paper (B)).

11. In the notification made to foreign Powers at the time of the British declaration as to the independence of Egypt (Paper (C)) His Majesty's Government said that they could not allow the special relations as defined in the declaration to be questioned or discussed by any other Power, and there are, therefore, manifest objections to any steps being taken in connection with the tribute loans which would entail consideration by an outside authority of the basis and the measure of the independence now enjoyed by Egypt.

12. In the Treaty of Sévres—the treaty of peace with Turkey which was signed on the 10th August, 1920, but was never ratified—article 112 provided as follows:—

"Turkey renounces all claim to the tribute formerly paid by Egypt.

"Great Britain undertakes to relieve Turkey of all liability in respect of the Turkish loans secured on the Egyptian tribute.

EGYPT.

9

"These loans are:—

"The guaranteed loan of 1855;

"The loan of 1894, representing the converted loans of 1854 and 1871;

"The loan of 1891, representing the converted loan of 1877.

"The sums which the Khedives of Egypt have from time to time undertaken to pay over to the houses by which these loans were issued will be applied as heretofore to the interest and the sinking funds of the loans of 1894 and 1891 until the final extinction of those loans. The Government of Egypt will also continue to apply the sum hitherto paid towards the interest on the guaranteed loan of 1855.

"Upon the extinction of these loans of 1894, 1891 and 1855, all liability on the part of the Egyptian Government arising out of the tribute formerly paid by Egypt to Turkey will cease."

In the Treaty of Peace with Turkey signed at Lausanne on the 24th July, 1923, and in force since the 6th August, 1924, article 18 provided as follows:—

"Turkey is released from all undertakings and obligations in regard to the Ottoman loans guaranteed on the Egyptian tribute—that is to say, the loans of 1855, 1891 and 1894. The annual payments made by Egypt for the service of these loans now forming part of the service of the Egyptian Public Debt, Egypt is freed from all other obligations relating to the Ottoman Public Debt."

At the time of the conclusion of the Treaty of Sévres the British protectorate over Egypt was still in force, and His Majesty's Government were therefore in a position to bind Egypt. At the time of the Conference of Lausanne the British protectorate over Egypt had terminated, and it had been intended that Egypt should become a party to the treaty, but the arrangements for this purpose broke down, and Egypt is not a party to it.

13. The question of the liability of Egypt to continue the service of the tribute loans has been constantly under consideration. Lord Edward Cecil, Financial Adviser in Egypt, raised the question in 1916 (see Paper (A 1)). It has also been considered from time to time by the Departments of His Majesty's Government in London. When it became necessary to complete the peace treaty with Turkey without the participation of Egypt it was hoped that it would be possible to regularise the situation of the tribute loans by negotiation with Egypt (see Treasury letter of the 13th May, 1923—Mr. Waley to Mr. Murray—Paper (H)). On the other hand, Sir M. Amos, the Judicial Adviser in the service of the Egyptian Government who acts as legal adviser to the Residency in Cairo, has consistently advised that Egypt is bound to continue the service of the tribute loans. I am to draw your attention to Lord Allenby's despatch of the 13th July, 1924 (Paper (J)), a letter from the Treasury of the 12th September, 1924 (Paper (K)), a despatch from Mr. Clark Kerr of the 8th September, 1924 (Paper (M)), Lord Allenby's despatch of the 15th November, 1924 (Paper (N)), and Lord Allenby's despatch of the 29th November, 1924 (Paper (O)). These papers contain memoranda by Sir M. Amos. They also contain memoranda by Mr. Hornsby, the Governor of the National Bank of Egypt. The latter are interesting as showing the way in which the question strikes a well-informed man of business who looks at the matter apart from legal subtleties.

14. At the time when the Egyptian Government served notice of their intention to discontinue after the 12th July the service of the loans (Paper (I)), an intimation was made of their willingness to submit the question of their liability to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague.

15. One of the objections to agreeing to this course has been that the question is within the jurisdiction of the Mixed Tribunals in Egypt and that the bondholders are, if they so wish, in a position to initiate litigation against the Egyptian Government so soon as a default has occurred in the payment of the interest due. The Foreign Office has been in constant correspondence with Messrs. Freshfields, who act on behalf of the Bank of England, and with Messrs. Rothschild, who now represent the issuing houses of the loans of 1891 and 1894, as to the initiation of proceedings in the Mixed Tribunals. The letter from Messrs. Freshfields of the 17th September, 1924 (Paper (L)), contains an elaborate legal opinion by a Mr. Alexander, who is a lawyer carrying on business in Egypt, p. 26 of which deals with the jurisdiction of the Mixed Courts in this matter. The bondholders are, however, reluctant to initiate proceedings for the recovery of the interest due. They are disposed to consider that it is a case in which His Majesty's Government ought to secure for them the resumption of the service of the loans by Egypt. I am also to draw your attention to a minute by the legal adviser to this Department of the 9th December, 1924 (Paper (P)), in which he draws attention to the risks involved in any proceedings before the Permanent Court of International Justice or before the Mixed Tribunals in Egypt, because such proceedings would almost certainly entail some consideration of the basis of Egypt's present measure of independence. It should be borne in mind that, as the loan of 1855 is guaranteed by the British and French Governments, the bondholders feel no concern in any default by the Egyptian Government in regard to the interest upon that loan. It is only with regard to the default on the loans of 1891 and 1894 that they are interested.

16. The Secretary of State is impressed with the view that some measures are incumbent upon him to endeavour to secure the resumption of the service of the loans by the Egyptian Government, because assurances were on one occasion given to the bondholders that measures would be taken to protect their interests (see Paper (Q)). As it is possible that such resumption cannot be obtained by means other than British insistence on the payment, he is desirous of receiving your advice as to the strength of the case for the bondholders, and I am, therefore, to ask that you will be so good as to favour him with your opinion—

- (1.) Whether Egypt remained liable to pay tribute to the Porte after the abrogation of the Turkish suzerainty in 1914.
- (2.) Whether Egypt is, in all the circumstances, under obligation to continue the payments heretofore made for service of the tribute loans, and, if so, upon what grounds.
- (3.) Whether the case in favour of Egypt's liability is sufficiently strong to justify the question being made the subject of proceedings in the Mixed Tribunals.
- (4.) If not, whether it is a case which might be referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for their consideration and advice in pursuance of section 4 of "The Judicial Committee Act, 1833."

17. Mr. Chamberlain would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

18. I am to add that, should you desire any further papers or information, Mr. Chamberlain has directed the officials of this Department to hold themselves at your disposal.

I have, &c.

JOHN MURRAY.

List of Papers.

- (A.)—Treasury Paper, October 12, 1916, "The Egyptian Tribute Loans." [Confidential 10859* (2).]
- (A 1.)—Lord E. Cecil to the Foreign Office, February 21, 1916. [35465/1916.]
- (B.)—British declaration as to the independence of Egypt, p. 29 of "Egypt No. 1 (1922)." [Cd. 1592.] [Parliamentary 5113.]
- (C.)—British notification to foreign Powers as to status of Egypt, March 1922, "Egypt No. 2 (1922)." [Cd. 1617.] [Parliamentary 5118.]
- (D.)—"Notice to Advisers," March 4, 1922 (see No. 114 in printed volume "Further Correspondence respecting Egypt and the Soudan, Part LXXXIX)." [E 2766/1/16/1922.]
- (E.)—Foreign Office minute, memorandum of the legal adviser, November 7, 1922. [E 12331/10102/44/1922.]
- (F.)—Extract from the Treaty of Sévres, articles 101–112 (Egypt). [Treaty 1589.]
- (G.)—Extract from the Treaty of Lausanne, articles 16–19 (Egypt). [Treaty 1681.]
- (H.)—Treasury letter. Mr. Waley to Mr. Murray, May 13, 1923. [E 5013/957/16/1923.]
- (I.)—Note verbale from the Egyptian Legation, July 22, 1924. [E 6345/1573/16/1924.]
- (J.)—Lord Allenby's despatch No. 457, July 13, 1924. [E 6248/1573/1924.]
- (K.)—Treasury letter to Foreign Office, September 12, 1924. [E 7853/1573/16/1924.]
- (L.)—Sir W. H. Leese, of Messrs. Freshfields, to Foreign Office, September 17, 1924. [E 8042/1573/16/1924.]
- (M.)—Mr. Clark Kerr's despatch No. 568, September 8, 1924. [E 8127/1573/16/1924.]
- (N.)—Lord Allenby's despatch No. 675, November 15, 1924. [E 10234/1573/16/1924.]
- (O.)—Lord Allenby's despatch No. 693, November 29, 1924. [E 10984/1573/16/1924.]
- (P.)—Memorandum by the legal adviser to the Foreign Office, December 9, 1924. [E 11098/1573/16/1924.]
- (Q.)—Mr. H. Bailey to the Foreign Office, March 17, 1922, and Foreign Office to Mr. Bailey, March 22, 1922. [E 2998/2998/16/1922.]

Report.

The questions involved in this report raise matters of considerable difficulty, and we are not surprised to find divergent views, such as those expressed by Lord Edward Cecil and Mr. Hornsby on the one hand, and Sir Maurice Amos on the other. The difficulty arises largely from the fact that international law in the sphere of contract is built up by the application to the relations between States of the provisions of municipal law governing the relations between individuals in analogous circumstances; and that there is no precise analogy in municipal law to the obligation created by the imposition of a tribute by a suzerain upon a vassal State.

The argument in favour of the continued liability of Egypt is based upon two alternative contentions: first of all it is said that the tribute was a debt owing from Egypt to Turkey, and that the raising of the loans of 1855, 1891 and 1894 upon the security of this tribute amounted to an assignment of this debt to the bondholders; that Egypt had notice of this assignment, and therefore that a liability from Egypt to the bondholders was thereby created which could not be determined by any transactions between Egypt and Turkey. Alternatively it is said that in the case of the loans of 1891 and 1894 there was an express promise by Egypt to Messrs. Rothschild and Sons as agents for the bondholders, which amounted to an undertaking to pay the stipulated interest and sinking fund during the currency of these respective loans.

We have come to the conclusion that the first contention is unsound, but that the second is sound. In our opinion it is fallacious to regard the obligation of Egypt to pay tribute to Turkey as analogous to a debt. The obligation is in our opinion one arbitrarily imposed by Turkey upon Egypt as an incident of its position as a vassal State: when once that position was ended, then the incidents attaching thereto clearly came to an end. No doubt Egypt had notice that Turkey had charged the tribute in favour of the bondholders, but in our opinion that imposed no obligation upon Egypt to go on paying the tribute to the bondholders when her liability to pay the amount to Turkey had ceased. On the other hand, we have come to the conclusion that the language used in the Khedivial decrees of the 20th March, 1891, and the 30th May, 1894, amounts to an unconditional promise by the Egyptian sovereign to pay the named sums for the named period to Messrs. Rothschild or to the Bank of England on their account. We do not think that the fact that the tribute is named as the source from which the money is to be derived entitles the Egyptian Government, by putting an end to its liability for tribute, to extinguish its expressed obligation to pay to the bondholders the sums which they have undertaken to discharge.

The result is that our answer to the first question submitted to us is in the negative, and that our answer to the second question is in the affirmative so far as the loans for 1891 and 1894 are concerned, and in the negative so far as the loan for 1855.

The third and fourth questions submitted to us seem to turn upon questions of political expediency rather than of law, and we express our opinion with hesitation. But since they have been submitted, and since you have been good enough to invite us to make any further observations which occur to us, we would say that we agree with Sir Cecil Hurst in regarding the suggestion of doing nothing as impossible, since it would be tantamount to an acceptance of the repudiation of Egypt of her liability. Furthermore, we should strongly deprecate a reference to the International Court at The Hague. Such a reference to such a body would give Egypt the very opportunity which the extremist section of her people desires of raising before the court the whole question of her status.

There remain the proposals as to the Mixed Tribunals and as to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. We should not advise this country to be a party to any submission to the Mixed Tribunals so as to be bound by their decision; but it seems to us that it is open to any bondholder to institute proceedings before these tribunals against the Egyptian Government; and if the matter is to be judicially considered, probably this is the best way of raising it. If our opinion as expressed in the preceding paragraphs is correct, the decision should be in favour of the bondholder and it would bind the Egyptian Government. We do not think the case is suitable for submission to the Judicial Committee. No doubt it is open to His Majesty to refer any question to that body for their opinion; but the opinion so given is consultative only, although this country would, in effect, be bound by any decision so given. On the other hand, the decision would not bind either the bondholders or the Egyptian Government. The result would be that, if the decision were in favour of the continued liability of Egypt, Egypt would still be able to say that the decision was erroneous and that her case had never been presented to the Judicial Committee, before whom she is under no obligation to appear; whereas, if the decision were against the liability of Egypt, it would be impossible for this country further to press the claims of the bondholders. Proceedings in the Mixed Courts should preferably be instituted by some bondholder not a British national, so as to avoid any complication created by the release of Turkey by Great Britain contained in the Treaty of Lausanne.

EGYPT.

We should have thought that the preferable course would be to have this question decided by diplomatic agreement on broad grounds, rather than by judicial decision on the exact language of the bonds. If a judicial decision is obtained it will, if our opinion is correct, result in the liability for the 1855 loan being left with the British and French Governments; and, as between these two Governments, the French may not improbably say that, by the Treaty of Lausanne, Great Britain has undertaken the obligation, and is therefore now the principal debtor, and, further, that it is owing to the action of Great Britain that Egypt is relieved of the liability, and that it is not fair that France should be asked to pay for this mistake.

On the other hand, if the matter is dealt with diplomatically, it is obviously reasonable that Egypt should bear a part of the Public Debt of the former Turkish Empire, and the proportion she will assume, if she accepts liability for the three loans, is less than would probably be allotted to her on an equitable basis of partition; the loans have, in fact, long been treated as almost forming part of the Egyptian Public Debt; Egypt has, until last year, always recognised her responsibility for them, and it cannot be right that, as between Great Britain and Egypt, Great Britain should be saddled with the liability for paying any or all of these loans, or that, as between Egypt and the bondholders, Egypt should be released from liability to honour her bond by the fact of her having become independent.

We would venture to suggest, therefore, that it would be eminently desirable to spare no effort to arrange the matter amicably with Egypt on this basis, rather than have recourse to any judicial tribunal, but that, if judicial proceedings are forced upon us, the best form that they could take would be an action by the bondholders under the 1891 or 1894 loan brought before the Mixed Tribunals against Egypt, in which the British Government would not in any way play a part.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
January 20, 1925.

[J 1046/32/16/1925]

No. 4.

[April 7, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 27, 1925.

Arrests by British military authorities
in Egypt.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Chamberlain, to refer to the opinion you were good enough to forward him on the 5th January last* in reply to certain questions which had been submitted to you in a letter from this Department, dated the 24th December last, regarding arrests made by the British military authorities in Egypt.

2. In this particular case, having regard to the importance of the issues involved, Mr. Chamberlain thought it right to communicate your opinion very confidentially to His Majesty's High Commissioner for Egypt for his information and guidance.

3. A despatch has now been received from Lord Allenby, forwarding a memorandum by Sir Maurice Amos, who acts as Legal Adviser to his Lordship, making certain observations on the points dealt with in your opinion.

4. In view of the special circumstances of the case and of the extreme importance which this question is again likely to assume should Zaghlul Pasha be returned to power at the forthcoming elections in Egypt, Mr. Chamberlain ventures to send you a copy of this despatch, and to enquire whether you wish to make any observations on the contents of the memorandum enclosed therein.

* No. 2.

EGYPT.

I have, &c.

MERVYN HERBERT.

Paper.

Lord Allenby's despatch No. 87, February 6, 1925. [J 478/32/16/1925.]

Report.

We have read and considered the observations of Sir Maurice Amos in his minute of the 26th January, 1925, on which we are asked for our comments.

Sir Maurice Amos approaches the question by postulating that martial law as employed by the commander of a British force outside His Majesty's dominions is a well recognised situation by the law of nations, and consists in the claim and exercise by the commander of a civilised army, of a necessary though limited sovereignty; but that sovereignty extends at least to such limits as may be reasonably necessary to protect the army; and that, therefore, the question to be investigated is whether the British Government have waived their prima facie rights to exercise over Egyptians such jurisdiction as may be necessary for the protection of the army.

There is no doubt that where an army is in occupation of invaded territory it possesses the right claimed for it by Sir Maurice Amos; and if the British army could be regarded as filling that rôle in Egypt we should not dispute his conclusion.

In our view it is neither possible nor politic to base the position of the British army in Egypt on these grounds. We claim to be in friendly relations with Egypt; and we have recognised her independence and sovereignty, subject to four specified qualifications.

In our view the army of occupation in Egypt must be regarded as being placed there for the protection of our interests in the Suez Canal with the assent of Egypt as the sovereign power in that country. Such assent necessarily implies that the Commander of the army of occupation shall have full jurisdiction over the army itself; but in our opinion it cannot legitimately be extended to a grant of jurisdiction over Egyptians in their own country when they are accused of offences against a British officer or soldier.

As pointed out in our previous opinion, circumstances may arise which render it necessary to assume such jurisdiction; but the assumption is a violation of Egypt's sovereign rights over her own people, and it can only be regarded, and justified, as an act of martial law.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
April 7, 1925.

[J 2121/1849/16/1925]

No. 5.

[July 22, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Lord Chancellor.

Foreign Office, July 11, 1925.

My dear Lord Chancellor,

YOU will have seen from Henderson's telegram No. 241 of the 1st July, of which I enclose a copy for convenience of reference, that the Egyptian Government have raised the question of applying for membership to the League of Nations. I have had the accompanying memorandum prepared with a view to summarising the history of this question in the past. I find that in this Office we are considered to be committed to support or at least not to oppose this application by the opinion which you gave on the 17th November last,* in regard to the communication to Egypt of the Geneva Protocol and by Curzon's despatch No. 1283 of the 19th October,

* Confidential 12786, p. 17.

Egypt and the League of Nations.

1925

14

EGYPT.

1922, to Lord Allenby. But is this so? I do not so read your opinion and I am alarmed at the possible consequences of the attitude adopted by Curzon.

If Egypt is admitted to membership of the League (as distinguished from adherence to particular conventions or treaties) can we in law, and, still more urgently, can we in practice maintain our reservations and the rights they were intended to protect? If dispute arises about any of them, shall we not inevitably be dragged before the League and will it not in practice be the League and not we who decide whether we may or shall remain in Egypt, protect the canal, &c.

These are grave questions indeed. Please give me your help.

Your sincerely,

AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN.

Memorandum concerning the Eligibility of Egypt for Membership of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 11 of the so-called Milner memorandum (p. 26 of the Report of the Special Mission to Egypt) read as follows:

"After the coming into force of the treaty (the proposed Anglo-Egyptian Agreement) referred to in article 3, Great Britain will communicate its terms to foreign Powers and will support an application by Egypt for admission as a member of the League of Nations."

2. After the breakdown of the official negotiations which followed with the Egyptian Government under Adly Pasha in the summer and autumn of 1921, Lord Allenby, under instructions from His Majesty's Government, on the 4th December addressed to the then Sultan of Egypt a letter in which the following passage occurred:—

"Their hope (His Majesty's Government's) was that Egypt, with a reconstituted Ministry for Foreign Affairs would at once have despatched her own representatives to foreign courts; and they (His Majesty's Government) would readily have supported an application on her part for admission to the League of Nations."

3. Owing to the impossibility of securing the collaboration of any Egyptian Ministry after the resignation of Adly Pasha, His Majesty's Government decided to withdraw the Protectorate and by unilateral action to make the concessions which they had been prepared to offer in return for the conclusion of an Anglo-Egyptian Treaty. This decision was embodied in the Declaration to Egypt of the 28th February, 1922.

4. On the 29th September, 1922, Lord Allenby reported that there had been some discussion in Egyptian political circles as to the propriety of Egypt applying for admittance to the League of Nations, and enquired what attitude His Majesty's Government would be likely to adopt in that eventuality. In his reply on the 19th November, 1922, Lord Curzon, after discussing the various considerations involved, expressed the view that "on the whole His Majesty's Government should support an Egyptian application for admittance to the League."

5. On the 17th November last the Lord Chancellor observed, in the course of a written opinion on the question of the accession of Egypt to the Geneva Protocol, that "many instances might be quoted where States, which have entered into engagements, seriously detracting from their independence, have, nevertheless, been held to remain sovereign States, and it appears to me that it would be extremely difficult for this country, in face of the solemn declaration (of the 28th February, 1922) . . . to maintain the position that Egypt is not a State to which, under the resolution of the Assembly dated the 2nd October, 1924, the protocol is open for signature." It is not clear whether this opinion should be construed as implying that Egypt is entitled to join the League of Nations and that His Majesty's Government should not oppose her admission, but should content themselves with ensuring that the limitations on Egyptian independence, imposed by the Declaration of the 28th February, 1922, to which the attention of the League of Nations has already been drawn by the Foreign Office letter of the 19th November, 1924, are recognised and respected by the League. In this connection the view expressed by the Legal Department of the Egyptian Ministry of Foreign Affairs is of interest. This view is embodied in a memorandum which came into the possession of the Residency and of which a copy was annexed to Mr. Henderson's despatch No. 336 of the 9th May, 1925.

EGYPT.

15

Foreign Office, July 13, 1925.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Mr. Henderson's telegram No. 241, July 1, 1925. [J 1849/1849/16/1925.]
- (B.) Report of the Special Mission to Egypt—Egypt No. 1 (1921). [Parliamentary 5052.]
- (C.) Lord Allenby's letter to the Sultan of Egypt, December 4, 1921. [E 12919/260/16/1921.]
- (D.) Lord Allenby's despatch No. 780, September 29, 1922. [E 10805/1/16/1922.]
- (E.) Foreign Office despatch to Lord Allenby, No. 1283, October 19, 1922. [E 10805/1/16/1922.]
- (F.) Correspondence respecting Affairs in Egypt—Egypt No. 1 (1922). [Parliamentary 5113.]
- (G.) Lord Chancellor's Opinion, November 17, 1924. [Confidential 12786, p. 17.]
- (H.) Foreign Office to Secretary-General of League of Nations, November 19, 1924. [E 9996/9316/16/1924.]
- (I.) Lord Allenby's despatch No. 336, May 9, 1925. [J 1401/29/16/1925.]

Opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

My dear Foreign Secretary,

House of Lords, S.W., July 22, 1925.

With reference to your letter of the 11th instant on the subject of the admission of Egypt to the League of Nations, I enclose a note of my opinion, and hope that it may be of service to you.

I retain your memorandum on the subject, but return the other papers which you sent me.

Yours sincerely,

CAVE.

Note.

It does not appear to me that there is anything in the Declaration of February 1922 which binds Great Britain to support or not to oppose an application by Egypt to be admitted to membership of the League of Nations. The recognition of Egypt as an "independent sovereign State," to which I referred in my opinion on the Geneva Protocol, would no doubt make it difficult for us to contend that Egypt is not a "fully self-governing State" within the meaning of article 1 of the Covenant of the League, and so entitled to apply for admission to membership. But a State applying for membership does not obtain admission as a matter of right. Admission cannot be granted unless agreed to by two-thirds of the Assembly; and any member of the League is entitled to oppose admission on any grounds, including grounds of policy and expediency.

In the present instance, reasons against the admission of Egypt are not wanting. The Declaration of February 1922 reserves to us a special voice in the preservation of our communications through Egyptian territory, the defence of Egypt against foreign aggression or interference, the protection of foreign interests in Egypt and the relation of Egypt to the Sudan; and there would be considerable difficulty in reconciling the relation so created between Egypt and this country with the position which Egypt would occupy as a member of the League. It may perhaps be suggested that these reservations constitute "obligations incompatible with the terms of the Covenant" within the meaning of article 20 of the Covenant and of condition (F) referred to in the memorandum of the Legal Department of the Egyptian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, enclosed in Mr. Henderson's despatch of the 9th May, 1925; and however that may be, the existence of the reservations side by side with articles 10, 12 and 13 of the Covenant would be likely to give rise to many difficulties.

I am assuming that we are not bound by Lord Curzon's despatch of the 19th October, 1922, to support the admission of Egypt to the League. It may be that the purport of that despatch was not communicated to the Egyptian Government; but in any case it appears from Mr. Henderson's telegram of the 1st July, 1925, that he has advised the present Egyptian Government in the opposite sense.

July 22, 1925.

C.

1925

16

GENERAL.

[L 1229/152/402/1925]

No. 6.

[March 13, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 10, 1924.

Law
Officers' opinions down to 1878;
question of allowing public to have access.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Chamberlain, to inform you that on the 1st January, 1925, he will throw open to students at the Public Record Office the volumes of Foreign Office correspondence down to the end of the year 1878: they have hitherto been open only to the end of the year 1860.

2. On the occasion of the last extension of period, it was decided to remove from the volumes so made accessible to the public all the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown, together with the submissions on which those opinions were based. On consideration, Mr. Chamberlain is inclined to reverse this policy, and to replace in the Public Record Office the opinions down to the end of the year 1860 which were then removed, and to refrain from extracting the opinions from the volumes which will now become accessible, so that they will be available to the public in the same measure as the rest of the Foreign Office records in which they are contained.

3. I have the honour to enquire whether you concur in the procedure suggested now and for the future, and are willing that the opinions of your predecessors should thus be open to public inspection with the rest of the records to which they belong.

I have, &c.

S. GASELEE.

Report.

The Law Officers are of opinion that, if records are to be thrown open to public inspection, it is probably desirable that such records should be as complete as possible, and they, therefore, concur in the suggestion that their opinions should be included in the documents disclosed.

JAS. ABBS, Chief Clerk.

*Law Officers' Department,
March 13, 1925.*

[L 2514/52/405/1925]

No. 7.

[May 23, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 19, 1925.

Communication of Law Officers' opinions to other Government
Departments and to His Majesty's representatives abroad.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Chamberlain, to request your decision on a further point (see your chief clerk's letter of the 13th March*) respecting the communication of the opinions given by you, at his request, to others than himself.

2. It has hitherto been the general practice of this Department to regard the text of your opinions as strictly confidential, and not to be communicated either to other Departments of His Majesty's Government or to His Majesty's diplomatic representatives abroad. If at any time it has been necessary to convey an opinion to any person or body of either of these classes, they have only been informed of its substance, and it has never been quoted to them verbatim.

3. Mr. Chamberlain does not, on consideration, feel that this practice has been well founded: if due precautions are taken to ensure that your opinions are treated as confidential documents, there is less chance of misrepresentation if their ipsissima

* No. 6.

GENERAL.

16A

[W 4238/259/50/1928]

No. 6^d.

[Colonial Office.]

[April 8, 1925.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, March 19, 1925.

WITH reference to the letter from this Department of the 22nd February, 1907, and to your predecessors' report dated the 25th April, 1907, I am directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to inform you that the question of the right of Great Britain to exercise jurisdiction in the Straits of Johore has again been raised in connexion with the proposed establishment of a naval base and aerodrome at Singapore.

Prerogative
of the Crown as regards cessions of territory.

2. It will be seen from the report of the 25th April, 1907, that your predecessors were of the opinion that article 5 of the treaty of 1885 with Johore does not operate as a retrocession of any part of the sovereignty or property ceded by article 2 of the earlier treaty of 1824, and that article 5 of the later treaty only applies therefore to waters outside the 10-mile limit mentioned in the earlier treaty. It is not clear whether, in expressing this opinion, your predecessors were aware of the fact that, with the exception of the Johore Straits, there were no waters less than 6 miles in width to which article 5 of the treaty of 1885 could apply.

3. The Governor of the Straits Settlements has now reported that, while the opinion of your predecessors is doubtless conclusive as to the British claim to sovereignty over the Straits of Johore, it would not, in his opinion, be politic to insist on the strict legal interpretation of the above-mentioned articles. He has recommended, therefore, in a despatch of which a copy is enclosed, that the boundary between the territorial waters of the Straits Settlements and Johore should be an imaginary line equidistant from the shore of the mainland, on the one side, and the Islands of Singapore, Pulau Ubin, Pulau Tekong Kechil and Pulau Tekong Besar, on the other side. It will be seen that the Governor has selected the last three islands as well as Singapore because it has never been disputed that they belong to the Straits Settlements.

4. The Secretary of State is anxious to adopt Sir L. Guillemard's proposal, and he has secured the assent to this course of the Admiralty, the War Office and the Air Ministry, subject to the conclusion of a subsidiary agreement with the Sultan of Johore providing for the grant of certain facilities required for defence purposes. Assuming, however, that you concur in the report of your predecessors in 1907, the present proposal would involve a cession of British territory, and in view of the fact that the question whether the Crown has power to alienate British territory by treaty or agreement not following the close of a war has been much debated, the Secretary of State desires to have your opinion as to the procedure which should be adopted in such a case as the present one. It appears that the view held generally in modern times is that, even if the Prerogative of the Crown extends to cessions of this nature, it is desirable that, if the cession is of any substantial importance, it should be confirmed by Act of Parliament. This procedure was followed in the case of the Anglo-German Convention, 1890 (Heligoland), the Anglo-French Convention, 1904 (Gambia Boundaries and Iles de Los) and the recent Anglo-Italian Agreement involving the cession of British territory in Jubaland.

5. On the other hand, the main reason for requiring confirmation by Parliament appears to be that such a cession transfers the inhabitants of the ceded territory to the jurisdiction of a foreign Power. This argument is not, however, applicable in the present case, since the adoption of Sir L. Guillemard's proposal would involve merely the cession of territorial waters and of a few insignificant islands which are either uninhabited or without permanent inhabitants. As at present advised, therefore, the Secretary of State is inclined to the view that a cession of this character can properly be effected by the Prerogative of the Crown without the intervention of Parliament.

6. Mr. Amery trusts that the foregoing remarks will have made clear his position in the matter, and I am to request that he may be favoured with your replies to the following questions:—

- (1.) Do you concur in the opinion expressed by your predecessors in their report dated the 25th April, 1907, as to the interpretation of article 2 of the treaty of 1824 with Johore read with article 5 of the treaty of 1885?

3481A [17751]

C*

1925

16B

GENERAL.

- (2.) If so, what procedure should be adopted to give effect to the cession of British territory involved by the adoption of the proposals contained in Sir L. Guillemard's confidential despatch dated the 14th May, 1924?

I am, &c.

G. GRINDLE.

Report.

- (1.) We concur in the opinion expressed by our predecessors in their report dated the 25th April, 1907.
- (2.) In our opinion it is constitutionally within the Prerogative of the Crown to cede British territory not forming part of a self-governing Dominion. But we regard it as undesirable that such a prerogative right should be exercised without the concurrence of Parliament, and we should advise that any treaty or agreement containing such a provision should be submitted to Parliament for ratification.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
April 8, 1925.

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

GENERAL.

[W 9425/72/50/1932]

No. 7A

[Air Ministry.]

[December 17, 1925.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

HEREWITH are sent—

1. Departmental Minutes and Correspondence.
2. Convention for the Regulation of Aircraft flying over Great Britain and Northern Ireland, 1919 [Cmd. 1609 (Treaty 1639)].
3. Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923 [Confidential 12193*].
4. Minutes of Conference of the 4th February, 1925.
5. Air Staff Note on Prohibited Areas.

The advice of the Law Officers is desired in this case with regard to the powers of the Crown by Order in Council made under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to prohibit or restrict photography from aircraft flying over Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, a copy of which is herewith, provides by article 11 that a person shall not take or cause or permit to be taken from an aircraft flying within Great Britain and Northern Ireland any photograph of a prohibited area, or of any part thereof, or of any object therein, except with the special permission in writing of the Secretary of State, and subject to any conditions that may be attached to such permission. A prohibited area is defined by article 31 as meaning any of the areas referred to in schedule VII of the order.

In October 1924 a question arose as to the amendment of article 11. The proposal was to prohibit generally the carrying of photographic apparatus by aircraft when flying within Great Britain and Northern Ireland, except that such apparatus might be carried as goods for delivery in a sealed case or in virtue of a licence issued by the Secretary of State. It was further proposed that the amended article should provide that all negatives, films, reproductions and records should be subject to inspection by the Secretary of State, and that the Secretary of State should have power to order the destruction of any negatives or films or to prohibit their distribution or reproduction. The matter was referred to parliamentary counsel for his observations and in order that he might draft the proposed amending article. Parliamentary counsel, however, pointed out that, while, if a person were convicted of using apparatus in contravention of the article or in contravention of the terms of his licence, it might be reasonable to give to the court before whom he was convicted power to order the forfeiture of both the negative and the apparatus, it would be an entirely different matter to provide that photographs taken by the licensee should be liable to forfeiture if it appeared to the Secretary of State that this was desirable, and he suggested that it should be possible for the licence to indicate generally classes of places, objects and occurrences which were not to be photographed, and that the power might be given to impound any photographs taken apparently in contravention of these terms pending proceedings against the offender.

The question of the proposed amendment was very fully considered by the various departments of the Air Ministry concerned, and the conclusion was reached that there did not appear to be any practical method by which the prohibition of aerial photography could be enforced in Great Britain.

In the meantime, as the Law Officers will observe from the copy Departmental Minutes and Correspondence herewith, the Air Ministry had been approached by the War Office with regard to information which the War Office had received as to photographs of Gibraltar having been taken from the air.

On the 31st October, 1924, the Air Ministry addressed a letter to the War Office with regard to the possibility of preventing air photography of defended ports, in which it was stated (paragraph 7) that the Air Ministry were proposing to amend the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, so as to prohibit the 6526 [7506]

B

Power to Prohibit or Restrict Photography from Aircraft by Order in Council made under the Provisions of Air Navigation Act,
1920.

1925

16D
2

GENERAL.

taking of photographs from the air except under licence. It was pointed out that the Air Navigation Order does not apply to British territories overseas, but it was suggested that steps could be taken for the inclusion of a similar prohibition in an order relating to British colonies, &c.

In November 1924 the Admiralty communicated with both the War Office and the Air Ministry raising the question of aerial espionage, and suggesting a meeting to discuss the matter.

On the 2nd February, 1925, the Air Ministry addressed letters to the Admiralty, the War Office and the Colonial Office, with reference to the proposed meeting, in which it was stated that, since the last meeting between the departments with reference to prohibited areas, the question of prevention or control of photography from the air had been considered by the Air Ministry. The conclusion arrived at was, however, that there was no satisfactory solution to the problem, each solution considered being open to certain objections, which were pointed out in the letter.

A meeting was held at the Air Ministry on the 4th February, 1925, at which representatives of the Admiralty, the War Office and the Colonial Office were present.

The Law Officers may be referred to the minutes of the meeting and the conclusions arrived at, a copy of which is herewith. As the Law Officers will observe, the position was that the Admiralty and the War Office were of opinion that the existing situation was unsatisfactory and dangerous, and desired to curtail the right to take air photographs, while the Air Ministry did not wish to impose further restrictions. If any restrictions were required, it was, however, considered that it would be better that they should be on lines which had been proposed by the War Office, namely: (1) That photography from foreign aircraft should be prohibited; and (2) that air photographs should only be taken by persons holding a licence to be granted by the Air Ministry after reference to the War Office.

On the 22nd April, 1925, the Air Ministry addressed a further letter to the Admiralty, the War Office and the Colonial Office, stating the conclusions arrived at by the Air Council after consideration of the proposals outlined in the minutes of the conference held on the 4th February. These were to the following effect: (1) If, in the opinion of the Admiralty and the Army Council, it was desirable so to do, the Air Council would be prepared to amend the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, so as to prohibit the taking of photographs from foreign aircraft over Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The letter went on to point out certain reasons for which, in the view of the Air Council, it would be difficult to enforce such an order. The letter further stated that, with regard to photography from British aircraft, the council were of opinion that the scope of Official Secrets Act was wider than any powers which could be exercised by the Air Council under the Air Navigation Act, or which it was reasonable to suppose could be obtained in times of peace by means of further legislation. They would be prepared to take steps to draw the attention of persons concerned to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act, but they considered that the further restriction or prohibition of air photography would be both impolitic and of little value.

The Law Officers will observe from the copy Departmental Minutes and Correspondence herewith that the question of the power to prohibit or restrict aerial photography by Order in Council made under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, was referred by the Air Ministry in April 1925 to the Treasury Solicitor, who expressed the opinion that, if it was intended to impose a regulation embodying the extensive prohibitions indicated, it would be desirable, in view of the doubts which he entertained as to the extent of the powers of the Crown in this respect under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, that the matter should be referred to the Law Officers for the opinion (see minute of the 9th May, 1925, copy Departmental Minutes and Correspondence, p. 36).

On the 3rd July the War Office again communicated with the Air Ministry, stating that, although the council realised that espionage from the air was difficult to prevent, this should not preclude the taking of such steps as were possible to mitigate any evil consequences, and the council were of opinion that the proposals recorded in the seventh paragraph of the Air Ministry letter of the 31st October, 1924, should be adopted. They concurred that the best means for a reasonably effective control in the United Kingdom would be to prevent the taking of photographs from the air except under personal licence, the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order being amended accordingly. They suggested that the attention of licensees should be drawn to the relevant provisions of the Official Secrets Acts, and that this might be done by the insertion of a warning to be inserted in the licence, and they further suggested that there should be an opportunity for a voluntary censorship before the publication of the photograph.

GENERAL.

16E
3

On the 10th July the Admiralty communicated with the Air Ministry to the effect that, in the view of the Admiralty, foreign aircraft should be prohibited from taking photographs over Great Britain or Ireland, and they concurred in the proposal contained in paragraph 3 of the Air Ministry letter of the 22nd April (namely, that the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, should be amended so as to prohibit the taking of photographs from foreign aircraft over Great Britain and Northern Ireland). They further stated that, in connexion with the limitations to be imposed on photography from British aircraft, they strongly recommended that the prohibition of the carriage of cameras, except by special permission, should be adopted, and they suggested that British firms to whom such permission was granted would probably be willing to submit to reasonable safeguards as regards censorship of photographs taken in certain areas. They further recommended that private photography from aircraft should be prohibited.

In a subsequent letter of the 11th August, 1925, the Admiralty stated that they concurred generally with the views expressed by the Army Council in the letter of the 3rd July.

The Law Officers will thus see that the view of Air Council is that it might be desirable to prohibit the taking of photographs from foreign aircraft flying over Great Britain and Northern Ireland, but that the Air Council do not consider it advisable to extend the existing provisions of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, as respects photography from British aircraft. The Admiralty and the War Office, on the other hand, however, are desirous that, in addition to prohibition of photography from foreign aircraft, all photography from British aircraft should be prohibited except under licence, and both Departments appear to have in mind the imposition of some further provisions with regard to the censorship of photographs taken by licensees either generally or as to photographs taken in particular areas. Before dealing further with the question the Air Ministry are desirous of ascertaining how far there is power to impose the restrictions upon aerial photography which are now suggested by the Admiralty and the War Office by Order in Council made under the Air Navigation Act, 1920.

The proposals under consideration appear to be:—

1. To prohibit altogether the taking of photographs from foreign aircraft.
2. To prohibit the taking of photographs from British aircraft except in pursuance of a licence granted by the Secretary of State, this proposal being alternatively coupled with a further prohibition of the carriage of cameras and photographic apparatus in aircraft.

It is not, the Treasury Solicitor gathers, proposed to insert any provision with regard to censoring any photographs taken in pursuance of the Secretary of State's licence, inasmuch as it seems, from the War Office letter of the 3rd July and the Admiralty letter of the 10th July that the intention is to license only photographers or photographic firms of good standing, who would be disposed to fall in with reasonable arrangements for some sort of informal censorship being exercised by the Department over photographs taken by them from the air.

Article 27 of the Air Navigation Convention provides that each State may prohibit or regulate the carriage or use of photographic apparatus.

Article 28 empowers a contracting State to subject the carriage of other objects to restrictions, and article 29 provides that all restrictions mentioned in article 28 shall be applied equally to national and foreign aircraft, from which it would appear that the provision as to equal treatment is not applicable to article 27, and that so far as the convention is concerned, it is open to a contracting State to differentiate between its own nationals and foreign aircraft with regard to regulating the carriage or use of photographic apparatus.

The Air Navigation Act, 1920, recites that it is expedient to make further provision for controlling and regulating the navigation of aircraft, whether British or foreign, within the limits of His Majesty's jurisdiction, and provides

16 F
A

GENERAL.

(section 1) that His Majesty may make such Orders in Council as appear to him necessary for carrying out the convention and for giving effect thereto, or to any of the provisions thereof, and (section 2) that His Majesty may by Order in Council direct that the provisions of the convention . . . shall apply to, or in relation to, any aircraft in or over the British islands or the territorial waters adjacent thereto, and may make such consequential and supplementary provisions as appear necessary or expedient for the purpose of such application, and (section 3) without prejudice to the generality of the powers before conferred an Order in Council may make provision for the specific matters set out in the section. These specific matters are set out under thirteen heads, lettered from (A) to (M). None of these, however, appear to give any assistance with regard to the prohibition or control of photography from aircraft. The attention of the Law Officers should, perhaps, be directed to (E) "as to the conditions under which aircraft may be used for carrying goods, mails and passengers," and (J) "supplementing the convention in such manner as appears necessary or expedient by general safety regulations."

While it is submitted that a condition as to the carrying of photographic apparatus and the taking of photographs might possibly be imposed under (E), inasmuch as (E) relates only to aircraft used for carrying goods, mails and passengers, a condition limited to such aircraft would not apparently meet the requirements of the Department.

With regard to (J), it is submitted that the expression "general safety regulations" must be read as being intended to have reference to safety in connexion with the operations of flying and not to the safety of the Realm, and if this is so a regulation, the object of which is to prevent espionage, could not, it is submitted, be made under (J). If the Law Officers should be of opinion that no assistance can be obtained from section 3 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, it is then necessary to consider the provisions of section 1 and section 2.

Article 27 of the convention appears to be the only article dealing with photography, and it is to be observed that article 27 does not directly prohibit or restrict photography in aerial navigation, but merely provides that each State may (within its own jurisdiction) prohibit or regulate it.

It is submitted that in so far as the convention specifically requires that certain things are to be done or omitted by or in relation to aircraft and air navigation these requirements can be imposed by Order in Council upon aircraft in or over the British islands or territorial waters adjacent thereto, because the specific provisions of the convention can be so applied under section 2 or (alternatively) the Order in Council imposing the requirement may be regarded as being necessary for carrying out the convention or for giving effect thereto under section 1. It is not, however, so clear that where that which has to be dealt with is not a specific requirement of the convention, but merely something which the convention says may be done if the contracting State wishes to do it, the case is covered by the provisions of section 1 and section 2, and this seems to be the first question which may require the consideration of the Law Officers.

It is, however, submitted for the consideration of the Law Officers that the construction above indicated is an unfairly narrow one, and that it can reasonably be said that an Order in Council prohibiting or regulating the carriage or use of photographic apparatus (which is a matter clearly contemplated by the convention, although not, it is true, required by it) comes within the ambit of section 1 as being necessary for carrying out the convention or for giving effect to its provisions, and that it may further be said (although the powers of applying by Order in Council the provisions of the convention to or in relation to aircraft given by section 2 may not alone be sufficient in the case of a provision of the nature of that which is embodied in article 27 of the convention) that the further powers contained in section 2 of making consequential and supplementary provisions for the purpose of such application are sufficiently wide to enable specific regulations to be made by Order in Council prohibiting or regulating the carriage or use of photographic apparatus.

Assuming that there is power to make regulations by Order in Council prohibiting the carriage or use of photographic apparatus in aircraft, it is further submitted (in view of the somewhat wide provisions generally of the Act, which the Law Officers will observe is entitled "An Act to enable effect to be given to a convention for regulation of air navigation and to make further provision for the control and regulation of aviation," and which recites that it is expedient to make further provision for control and regulation in reference to aircraft . . . within the limits of His Majesty's jurisdiction), and having regard to the wide provisions contained in section 2 enabling such consequential and supplementary provisions as appear necessary or expedient to be made, that there is power to regulate as well as prohibit the taking of photographs and the use of photographic apparatus, and to regulate by providing that photographs may be taken under licence issued by the Secretary of State.

GENERAL.

16 G
B

It is further submitted that assuming that there is power to make regulations prohibiting or regulating the carriage or use of photographic apparatus in aircraft, that power extends equally to foreign aircraft and persons therein or to British aircraft and persons therein, and consequently that photography and the carrying of photographic apparatus can be prohibited absolutely, or prohibited subject to licence as may be thought expedient, and that this distinction can be made as respects different classes of aircraft, namely, foreign or British.

The attention of the Law Officers should be drawn to the point raised in paragraph 6 of Mr. Evan's minute of the 28th August (copy Departmental Minutes and Correspondence, p. 48), which is referred to in Mr. Webster's minute of the 2nd September (copy Departmental Minutes and Correspondence, p. 52), that inasmuch as the object of the proposed amending regulation is not the control of aviation but is the prevention of espionage, it is not an object which can fairly be regarded as being within the proper scope of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, and regulations made by Order in Council under that Act, and, further, having regard to these circumstances and having regard to the existing provisions of the Official Secrets Acts, 1911 and 1920, which are designed to prevent espionage and evils of that nature, there might be objections on that ground also to dealing with the matter in the way proposed, even assuming that technically there is power to make by Order in Council such a regulation as is proposed. The Law Officers will, no doubt, consider this aspect of the matter.

The Law Officers are requested to advise the Air Ministry:—

- (1) Whether or not there is power by Order in Council made by His Majesty under the provisions of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to make a regulation prohibiting the taking of photographs from foreign aircraft.
- (2) Whether or not there is power by Order in Council made by His Majesty under the provisions of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to make a regulation prohibiting the taking of photographs from British aircraft (a) absolutely, or (b) except in pursuance of a licence granted by the Secretary of State to an individual or firm authorising the taking of a particular photograph or photographs generally.
- (3) Whether or not there is power by Order in Council made by His Majesty under the provisions of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to make a regulation prohibiting the carriage of cameras or other photographic apparatus in (a) foreign aircraft, (b) British aircraft.
- (4) Assuming that the Law Officers are of opinion that there is power to make by Order in Council under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, a regulation prohibiting any of the acts referred to in questions (1), (2) or (3) above, there would be, in the view of the Law Officers, any objection, either legal or other, to such regulations being made having regard to the scope and intentions of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, and having regard to the existence of the provisions which are contained and the powers which are given in the Official Secrets Acts, 1911 and 1920, and
- (5) Generally upon the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

(1) and (2) We think an Order in Council may be made under the provisions of section 3 (e) of the Air Navigation Act prohibiting the taking of photographs from aircraft, whether British or foreign, which carry goods, mails or passengers. Apart from this limited power, we think there is nothing in the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to enable an Order in Council to be made prohibiting aerial photography from either British or foreign aircraft. In our opinion, an Order in 1925

16 H
B

GENERAL.

Council containing a prohibition which is not found in the convention cannot to that extent be said to carry out or give effect to or apply the provisions of the conventions.

(3) Yes, under section 3 (e), but not otherwise.

(4) We see no objection. The convention clearly contemplates prohibition by any of the signatories. The wide scope of the Official Secrets Acts which may render resort to the Air Navigation Act unnecessary cannot, in our opinion, make it improper to use whatever powers Parliament has given for expressly dealing with aerial photography.

(5) We have nothing to add.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
December 7, 1925.*

L
O
O
d
i q
a p hC
L
O
O
G
U
D
n
t
M r
t
i
a

GERMANY.

17

verba are handed on to the parties concerned. He cannot see that any harm could result from the communication of an opinion, unless there are special circumstances which impose secrecy in a specific case, to another Department of His Majesty's Government, if the matter is of interest to that Department, and similarly to any of His Majesty's diplomatic representatives abroad who may be concerned in the matter on which the opinion is sought.

4. Mr. Chamberlain proposes to be guided in this matter entirely by your advice; and I have therefore the honour to enquire whether you concur in the communication of the text of your opinions, under due precautions, and if the matter of the opinion is of interest to the recipient—

- (a.) To other Departments of His Majesty's Government;
- (b.) To His Majesty's diplomatic representatives abroad.

I have, &c.

S. GASELEE.

Report.

We see no objection to the proposal that the actual opinions given by us to the Foreign Office should be communicated to other Departments and to the diplomatic representatives of His Majesty, provided, of course, that proper precautions are taken to ensure that the opinions are treated as confidential.

We would, however, point out that in many cases the opinion by itself is apt to be almost unintelligible and often misleading unless it is accompanied by the case upon which it is based; and in these instances we should have thought that it would have been sufficient to give the gist of the opinion instead of sending the whole of the case and the text of the opinion itself.

This, however, is rather a matter of convenience than of policy, and no doubt there would be no difficulty in deciding in any particular instance which was the more convenient method.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 23, 1925.*

GERMANY.

[C 741/741/18/1925]

No. 8.

[January 16, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen, Foreign Office, January 9, 1925.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Chamberlain, to bring to your notice a question of some legal complexity, upon which it is felt that His Majesty's Government should have the advantage of the considered opinion of their highest legal advisers. The question is, briefly, the extent of the right of investigation into Germany's military situation which is conferred by article 213 of the Treaty of Versailles upon the Council of the League of Nations.

2. The articles of the treaty upon which the question turns are the following: In the first place, the demilitarisation of the Rhineland is provided for by articles 42-44, which read:—

"Article 42: Germany is forbidden to maintain or construct any fortifications, either on the left bank of the Rhine or on the right bank to the west of a line drawn 50 kilom. to the east of the Rhine.

"Article 43: In the area defined above, the maintenance and the assembly of armed forces, either permanently or temporarily, and military manoeuvres of any kind, as well as the upkeep of all permanent works for mobilisation, are in the same way forbidden.

[14641]

D

Investigation of Germany's
military situation by Council of League of Nations.

"Article 44: In case Germany violates, in any manner whatever, the provisions of articles 42 and 43, she shall be regarded as committing a hostile act against the Powers signatory of the present treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world."

3. Secondly, Germany's permanent military strength is governed by Part V of the treaty, which lays down detailed provisions for the permanent limitation of her military, naval and aeronautical forces. Article 203 provides that:—

"All the military, naval and air clauses contained in the present treaty, for the execution of which a time-limit is prescribed, shall be executed by Germany under the control of Inter-Allied Commissions specially appointed for this purpose by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers."

4. The functions of these commissions accordingly terminate when the time-limit clauses in question have been completely executed. Subsequent supervision is provided for by article 213 (the last article in the military, naval and air clauses), which reads:—

"So long as the present treaty remains in force, Germany undertakes to give every facility for any investigation which the Council of the League of Nations, acting, if need be, by a majority vote, may consider necessary."

5. The point upon which your counsel is now requested is whether the rights conferred upon the Council of the League by this article 213 are limited, so far as the demilitarisation of the Rhineland zone is concerned, to ad hoc investigations carried out, as and when required by the council, for certain specific purposes, or whether they can extend to the establishment of permanent commissions actually resident in the zone.

6. The view of the legal advisers to the Foreign Office has hitherto been that the right of investigation which the League of Nations possesses under article 213 does not warrant the institution of a permanent resident control organ, with the rider that this defect could, of course, be remedied with German consent. But the matter is of such vital political importance that the Secretary of State hesitates to accept the above advice without confirmation by the Law Officers of the Crown.

7. It may be well to indicate the trend of French thought in dealing with this question hitherto. In all their plans for safeguarding French "security," the French Government have for some time argued that the demilitarisation of the Rhineland zone stipulated for in articles 42-44 of the Treaty of Versailles can only be regarded as effectively assured if an organ of supervision appointed by the League of Nations is permanently established in the zone itself. Their view was that care must be taken to see that the right of investigation conferred upon the Council of the League was applied in a really effective manner; which they consider involves a permanent organ of control, with power to superintend the due observance not only of the disarmament clauses of the treaty (Part V), but also of the demilitarisation clauses (articles 42-44).

8. The practical issue underlying the question was brought into prominence last summer, when the scheme for making operative the similar powers vested in the League in regard to Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria was under discussion. When, in June 1924, the Council of the League instructed their Permanent Advisory Commission (constituted in accordance with article 9 of the covenant) to advise upon this matter, the French representative insisted that any scheme to be adopted should be made applicable to Germany as well as to the other ex-enemy States, and to this the council agreed.

9. When the actual terms of the scheme came to be discussed, the demands of the French representative on the Permanent Advisory Commission were found to be unexpectedly moderate. They did not, as had been expected, demand the establishment of permanent commissions on the territories of the several ex-enemy States. A copy of the scheme, finally approved by the council on the 27th September last, is transmitted to you herewith. Those of its provisions which bear, directly or indirectly, on the point now under discussion, are the following:—

"Chapter I: The investigations . . . shall, when the council so decides, cover such demilitarisation of territory as may be laid down in the same treaties."

"Chapter IV (d): Every local investigation shall be carried out by at least three experts of different nationalities."

"(1.) Commissions of investigation may during a period fixed by the council either carry out the operations without interruption or intermittently."

"Chapter V: Within the period fixed by the council and with its approval, the president of a commission of investigation may detach groups to remain at points in the demilitarised zones where continuity of investigation is required."

10. In so far as concerns the question of permanent resident commissions, it will be observed that the wording of these provisions is by no means clear. The French Government accordingly, at the December meeting of the council in Rome, submitted a resolution, subsequently adopted, to the effect that the Permanent Advisory Commission should be instructed to study the application to the Rhine zone, demilitarised by articles 42-44 of the Treaty of Versailles, of Chapters I and V of the League scheme already adopted on the 27th September, 1924. The desire of the French Government, as previously explained in a note handed to the Secretary of State by M. Herriot on the 5th December (see enclosed copy), was to see some system organised whereby the periods of investigation in the demilitarised zone might be so renewed as to constitute a body permanently established in the Rhineland. "Le contrôle rhénan," the note reads, "devrait comporter un organisme fonctionnant sur place."

11. It will be borne in mind that the scheme approved by the council on the 27th September last was drawn up independently of the German Government, to whom it has not been communicated so far. Nor would the question of German consent arise unless the scheme were to impose on Germany conditions going beyond the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles.

12. It is unnecessary to emphasise that in all matters touching French security the desire of His Majesty's Government is to meet French susceptibilities and fears so far as is compatible with the Treaty of Versailles. On the other hand, Mr. Chamberlain cannot take a course which is inconsistent with our treaty rights and obligations. Nor can he neglect the contingency that the German Government might ultimately demand that the matter should be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague. In this connection attention is invited to the significant German note of the 9th August last, of which a copy is also enclosed. It seems clear, in any case, that the question of the legality of a system of permanent resident commissions, even if disguised under the French formula of a "renewal of the periods," must turn, not upon the wording of the scheme of the 27th September, but entirely upon the proper interpretation of article 213 of the Treaty of Versailles, which is the binding authority.

13. In these circumstances, your advice is requested on the following points:—

- (1.) Is it possible under the Treaty of Versailles to comply with the desire of the French Government for the establishment by the Council of the League of "un organisme fonctionnant sur place" in the zone permanently demilitarised by articles 42-44 of the Treaty of Versailles; or
- (2.) Are the rights of the council confined to ad hoc investigations carried out from time to time by commissions of enquiry of a non-resident character?

I have, &c.

C. HOWARD SMITH.

List of Papers.

1. Scheme of Investigation, approved by the Council of the League of Nations, September 27, 1924.
2. Memorandum by M. Herriot, December 5, 1924 [C 18874/2048/18/1924].
3. German Ambassador's note, August 9, 1924 [C 12985/2616/18/1924].

Report.

In answer to the point submitted to us, we are of opinion that it is not possible under the Treaty of Versailles for the Council of the League of Nations to establish the permanent resident organisation which the French Government desire, but that the rights of the council are confined to the institution of specific investigations carried out from time to time by commissions of enquiry appointed for the purpose.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
January 16, 1925.

ITALY.

[C 9405/15/22/1925]

No. 8^d.

[Board of Trade.]

[July 10, 1925.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Italian restrictions on carriage of emigrants by British vessels;
position as regards
Anglo-
Italian
Commercial
Treaty of 1883.

COMPLAINTS have been received regarding discrimination on the part of the Italian Government against British shipping engaged in carrying Italian emigrants to Australia. It is understood that prior to the war no Italian passenger ships were employed in this service. Since 1918, however, two Italian lines have embarked in this traffic and the Italian Government, through their Emigration Department, have, it is alleged, sought by restrictive regulations to make it difficult for the Orient Line to carry these passengers. Further the Italian Commissioner of Emigration has informed the Orient Line that he would be unable in the future to license more than two or three Orient steamers for the carriage of third class passengers from an Italian port. The letter of the 30th December, 1924, of the Orient Line to the Colonial Office (a copy of which accompanies this case) indicates the nature of the Italian regulations. The Ambassador at Rome reports that the Italian Government inform him "that on account of restriction of American immigration their ships must find employment on other services and accordingly they intend to limit affixes [sic] to Orient Line vessels in proportion to the amount of Australian emigrant traffic and with due regard to Italian flag."

It has been suggested that the Australian Government might reply to this discrimination by providing that no Italian emigrants into Australia may travel in Italian ships or, at any rate, might intimate to the Italian Government that they must expect some counter-action calculated to neutralise the discrimination against British shipping.

The question has arisen whether the matter is affected by the above-mentioned treaty which provides, inter alia, as follows:—

"ARTICLE 1.

"There shall be between the Dominions and Possessions of the two High Contracting Parties reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation. Subjects of each of the two Parties shall have liberty freely to come, with their ships and cargoes, to all places, ports and rivers in the Dominions and Possessions of the other to which native subjects generally are or may be permitted to come, and shall enjoy, respectively, the same rights, privileges, liberties, favours, immunities, and exemptions in matters of commerce and navigation which are or may be enjoyed by native subjects, without having to pay any tax or impost greater than those paid by the same, and they shall be subject to the laws and regulations in force."

Article 13 provides for the privileges of subjects and gives freedom of residence and travel, for the hiring by them of houses and warehouses and for the carrying on of their commerce. The treaty applies to the greater part of Australia. By a protocol, disputes respecting the interpretation of the treaty or the consequences of the violation thereof are to be submitted to arbitration. It is significant that article 5 of the treaty provides for imports and exports being made of articles into and from the possessions of either contracting party in the vessels of either party, but there is no mention of the carriage of passengers, whereas in the corresponding article 16 in our treaty with Japan of the 3rd April, 1911, specific reference is made not merely to the import or export of merchandise, but also to the carriage of passengers.

The Foreign Office have raised the question whether article 1 of the treaty may not be invoked by this country on the ground that the embarkation and carriage of Italian passengers in and from Italian ports is one of the rights, privileges, &c., in a matter of navigation which are to be enjoyed by native subjects and British subjects alike under the provisions of that article. The view hitherto taken by the Board of Trade has been that the business of carrying passengers is not commerce in the ordinary sense, and that navigation ought to be interpreted in its strictest sense as referring to the actual movements of a ship and not to the business in which a shipowner may be engaged.

It should perhaps be added that, if the question raised by the Foreign Office is answered in the affirmative, Australia would equally be precluded from discriminating against Italian ships in the carriage of passengers from Italy to Australia.

The matter is one of considerable importance and urgency and the Law Officers are requested to give their opinion on the following questions:—

1. Does the reference in article 1 of the treaty to matters of commerce and navigation include the embarkation and carriage of passengers by ship?
2. Is the embarkation and carriage of passengers by ship affected by any of the other articles in the treaty?
3. Generally on any other point which may occur to the Law Officers.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. The word "commerce" must in our opinion be read as limited to transactions in commodities or finance and the word "navigation" as limited to the movements of ships. We therefore think that the embarkation and carriage of passengers by ship are not included in the matters covered by article 1.

2. An attempt to differentiate between British and Italian vessels catering for emigrant traffic by preventing the former from resorting to Italian ports except under some more onerous terms than Italian vessels as to duties or as to berths would in our opinion offend against the provisions of either article 6 or article 7, but, apart from such methods as the above, we do not see any objection so far as the treaty is concerned to restrictions placed by the Italian Government on the embarkation and carriage of passengers by ship.

3. Retaliation in the form of an embargo by the Australian Government upon the entrance of Italian subjects reaching Australia in Italian ships might be regarded by the Italian Government as infringing article 13, and though we think a good argument might be made against this contention it may be advisable to adopt measures which are not open to this criticism.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
July 10, 1925.

MEXICO.

[A 3976/57/26/1925]

No. 9.

[August 4, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 20, 1925.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Chamberlain to request the favour of your advice as to the validity of certain Mexican bond issues made by the Government of President Huerta in 1913 and 1914.

2. In order that the circumstances in which these issues were made may be fully understood, it is desirable in the first instance to give a brief historical survey of the principal events during General Huerta's régime.

3. At the beginning of 1913 the Presidency was held by General Madero, the first President of the so-called "revolutionary party," to which the present Mexican Government belong. President Madero had not been able to redeem the promises made by his party during the long years of the revolution, and, taking advantage of the discontent thus created, Madero's opponents started a revolution on the 9th February, 1913. Fighting in the capital continued for ten days, with great loss of life, and

Validity of certain Mexican bond issues of 1913 and 1914.

finally, through the mediation of the United States Ambassador, General Huerta, who had been leader of the Presidential forces, assumed the Presidency by agreement with the leaders of the insurrection. The steps by which this was achieved were as follows: President Madero and Vice-President Pino Suárez were arrested and forced to resign. Señor Lascurain, Minister for Foreign Affairs, succeeded as constitutional President, and, as soon as he had signed a decree appointing General Huerta Minister of the Interior, he resigned. General Huerta thus succeeded constitutionally to the Presidency on the 18th February, 1913. On the 22nd February Madero and Suárez were assassinated as they were being conveyed to prison from the National Palace. It seems probable that General Huerta was not directly responsible for this crime.

4. Shortly afterwards a complete change occurred in United States policy towards Mexico. Up to the 4th March the United States Government appear to have actively supported General Huerta, and in some degree he owed his elevation to the Presidency to the mediation of the United States Ambassador. President Taft, however, who was on the point of retiring, was reluctant to bind the hands of his successor by recognising the new régime in Mexico. On the 4th March Mr. Wilson succeeded to the Presidency and Mr. Bryan became Secretary of State. From the beginning both were strongly opposed to General Huerta, whom they considered to be a reactionary barring the progress of the revolutionary party towards the regeneration of Mexico. They accordingly refused to recognise the new President.

5. In April 1913, notwithstanding the attitude of the new American Government, His Majesty's Government recognised General Huerta as Provisional President on the ground that he was the de facto ruler, and that his succession to the Presidency had been in accordance with the Mexican Constitution. In due course General Huerta was also recognised as Provisional President by all Powers other than the United States, Argentine, Brazil and Chile.

6. Largely as a result of the attitude of the United States Government, General Huerta, hard pressed by the insurrections which occurred in various parts of Mexico, slowly lost ground, and by October 1913 his position in the capital had become so difficult that he decided to dissolve Congress. He arrested some 120 of its members, ruling thenceforward to all practical purposes as a dictator. It is true that new elections were held on the 26th October, but these are alleged to have been more than ordinarily corrupt, and have never been recognised as valid by the Mexican revolutionary party.

7. The coup d'état did not, however, save the President. The revolutionary forces under General Carranza continued to gain ground, and in November 1913 his position was further weakened by a hostile declaration issued by the President of the United States. This was to the effect that the United States would refuse to recognise as legal or binding any act of General Huerta since he had assumed dictatorial powers in the preceding October. Huerta continued a losing fight until July 1914, when he fled the country.

8. The struggle against this prolonged revolutionary movement had involved General Huerta's Government in heavy expenditure. On the 30th May, 1913, Congress had authorised the flotation of a foreign loan for £20,000,000. A translation of the decree is given in Appendix (A). In June of the same year the Mexican Government had entered into an agreement (Appendix (B)) with an international group of bankers, under which the former "issued a loan" of £16,000,000 under the following title: "Treasury Bonds of the Mexican Federal Government, 6 per cent., 10 years, 1913." The loan was to be secured by the hypothecation of 38 per cent. of the customs receipts of Mexico. The banks undertook to take firm £6,000,000 of this issue, known as the Series "A" of Huerta Bonds, and they were granted the option for six months from July 1913 to take up a further £5,000,000 and the option for one year to take up the remaining £5,000,000. These options were never exercised.

9. Under article 13 of the Loan Agreement the Mexican Government agreed that, for a period of two years from the date of this issue, they would neither issue a further foreign loan, nor negotiate any further bonds, nor give their guarantee to any further foreign bond issue without previous agreement with the group undertaking the issue of the Series "A" Bonds.

10. At the end of 1913 and early in 1914 the Mexican Government, again hard pressed for money, had concluded, under the authority of the law of the 30th May, 1913, the following further loan agreements:—

- (1.) £7,404,853 with the National Bank of Mexico and other local banks. This issue is stated to have been taken up under threats from the Government.

- (2.) £1,361,050 with the Guarantee Trust Company of New York. Against the Mexican Government's bonds the Guarantee Trust Company issued certificates in respect of the current interest due on bonds of the National Railways of Mexico. The latter have since been included in the agreement of 1922 with the International Committee of Bankers, to which further reference is made below (§ 15).

11. These issues, amounting in the aggregate to £8,765,903, are known as the Series "B" Bonds. Their validity is repudiated by the present Mexican Government, who, however, are understood to be ready to pay an ex gratia compensation to the banks concerned. So far as His Majesty's Government are aware, no British interest is affected by this issue except in so far as there may have been British shareholders in the Mexican banks on whom the loan was forced.

12. In January and March 1914 another issue of bonds of the 6 per cent. External Debt, 1913, was made to purchase 51 per cent. of the common stock of the Mexican National Packing Company from a man named Mr. John de Kay (recently extradited from this country). Further bonds of the nominal value of £2,000,000 were deposited with Mr. de Kay's bankers to serve as collateral security for a credit of 35,000,000 fr., with which de Kay was to purchase arms and munitions for the Mexican Government. As part of this arrangement the Mexican Government undertook to guarantee the principal and interest of the two series of Mortgage Bonds issued by the Packing Company, and believed for the most part to be held by British subjects. The texts of the agreements with Mr. de Kay are annexed (Appendices (C), (D), (E)). The bonds were delivered to de Kay upon the express condition that none of them should be sold before the 1st July, 1915, i.e., the date of expiry of the two-year period during which no fresh external loan might be floated without the assent of the bankers responsible for the issue of the "A" Series Bonds (see § 8 above).

13. On the 18th May, 1914, the London papers announced the offer of trust certificates to the value of £700,000, secured upon an issue of the 1913 bonds. The loan was offered by Reuter's Bank (Limited), and the prospectus (Appendix (F)) contained a copy of a letter from Señor del Paso, the Mexican Financial Agent in London. The trustees for the issue were Messrs. W. B. Peat and Co. It is understood that the bonds deposited as security were a portion of those given to de Kay in payment for his shares in the Mexican National Packing Company. On seeing the announcement of the loan, Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell and Co., issuing bankers and contractors for the London portion of the "A" Series Loan, addressed a letter to the "Times" (Appendix (G)) declaring that their consent had not been given to this new negotiation of bonds, although such consent was required under the terms of their agreement. The Banque de Paris et des Pays-Bas, representing the French group concerned with the issue of the "A" Series Bonds, addressed an identical protest to the Mexican Government through their financial agent in London. It is understood that this issue by Reuter's Bank was a failure. At a later date bonds of this series were offered in fortnightly auction sales by a London firm of estate and furniture agents.

14. As regards the provision of arms to the Mexican Government, which formed an integral part of the agreement under which that Government had purchased de Kay's controlling share of the Mexican National Packing Company, there is evidence that de Kay did in fact place contracts with various armament firms (including Messrs. Vickers) for the supply of arms and ammunition, but the delivery of this material was prevented by the outbreak of the Great War.

15. It has been shown that between June 1913 and May 1914 there had been three issues of 6 per cent. External Bonds by the Huerta Government, Series "A," "B" and "C." According to the information available in this Department, these issues amounted respectively to £6,000,000, £8,766,000 and £3,025,000, making a total of £17,791,000. The attitude of the present Mexican Government towards these issues is as follows: The bonds of the "A" Series are included in an agreement for the adjustment of Mexico's external debt, which was signed at New York in June 1922 between the Mexican Minister of Finance and the International Committee of Bankers on Mexico, and their validity has to this extent been admitted by the Government of President Obregón. As regards the "B" and "C" Series, the Mexican Government deny all responsibility for their issue and refuse even to submit to arbitration the claims of their holders. It was this refusal which, more than any other cause, led to the breakdown of the negotiations conducted between His Majesty's Government and the Mexican Government in 1922 with a view to the renewal of diplomatic relations.

16. His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington recently received instructions to open negotiations with the Mexican Ambassador in Washington in the hope that the present situation may prove more favourable than in 1922 to the conclusion of an agreement which would give adequate protection to British interests. The negotiations begun at Washington are being continued at Mexico City. An indefinite prolongation of the present phase of our relationship with Mexico is obviously undesirable and there are grounds for fearing that if arrangements cannot soon be made for the resumption of diplomatic intercourse, the Mexican Government may embark on a campaign of injustice and even of violence against the property and interests of British subjects in Mexico. A tendency to discriminate unfairly against these interests is, indeed, already noticeable. In these circumstances, it would be most unfortunate if the negotiations now opening should again break down primarily on the question of Mexico's repudiation of the Series "B" and "C" Bonds of the Huerta Loan. It is to enable the Secretary of State to be advised as to the legal validity of these issues that the present case is being submitted for your consideration.

17. The question is somewhat complicated by the absence of any detailed statement of the grounds on which the Mexican Government repudiate responsibility for the "B" and "C" Series of the Huerta Bond issues, while apparently accepting responsibility for the "A" issue. Their only official utterance on the subject has been a bald denial of the right of General Huerta to make these issues. Having regard to the insignificance of the British interests involved in the "B" Series Bonds, it is unnecessary in the present reference to go further into the circumstances of their issue. As regards the "C" Series Bonds, it would appear from the information derived from a variety of sources that the case against their recognition may be summarised as follows:—

- (a.) General Huerta executed a coup d'état on the 10th October, 1913. Unlike the "A" Series of bonds, which were issued in June and July 1913, the "B" and "C" Series were issued after the coup d'état. The present Mexican Government have repudiated all the acts of General Huerta's Government since that date and refused all responsibility for the results of those acts.
- (b.) A similar attitude was adopted by President Wilson, who, as stated above, announced publicly that his Government would not recognise as legal or binding anything done by General Huerta since he became dictator (October 1913) or by the Congress elected after Huerta's coup d'état.
- (c.) The issue of the Series "C" Bonds, arranged with de Kay in March 1914, to the public in May of that year, of which a part served as security for the issue of £700,000 of trust certificates by Reuter's Bank, was held to be a violation of article 13 of the agreement of June 1913, under which no further foreign bond issue was to be made before July 1915 without the assent of the syndicate of bankers which issued the Series "A" Bonds. The actual bonds of the "B" and "C" issues were, it is true, delivered to de Kay subject to a proviso that they should not be sold to the public before the 1st July, 1915, but the delivery of these bonds to de Kay to serve as collateral security for the public issue of trust securities in London and for the purchase of arms in foreign countries was a breach of the spirit if not of the actual letter of article 13. The purpose of this article was evidently to prevent the premature depreciation of the "A" Series Bonds and to retain for a period of two years the whole security afforded by the hypothecation of 38 per cent. of the Mexican customs receipts. This purpose was defeated by the procedure adopted in issuing and circulating the "C" Bonds to banking and armament firms in Europe.
- (d.) The attention of the public was drawn to this breach of the agreement by the letter in the "Times" of the 18th May, 1914, from Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell and Co.
- (e.) It is understood that the Mexican Government claim that the agreement, under which de Kay received the £3,025,000 of Bonds constituting the "C" Series, was to all intents and purposes a fraudulent one, since the shares of the National Packing Company, which de Kay sold to the Mexican Government for £1,025,000, were at the time valueless. The concern is understood to have been in difficulties since 1911. Moreover, none of the arms and ammunition ordered by de Kay in virtue of the credits created by the delivery to him of the further £2,000,000 of bonds ever reached the Mexican Government, although a sum of £400,000 is stated to have been paid to a French firm in settlement of an old debt. General Huerta's position at the time is affirmed to have been so desperate that he felt compelled to make this altogether excessive payment to de Kay in order to obtain through his agency the munitions which he had been unable to secure by direct contract with foreign munition firms.

- (f.) The purchasers of these bonds (it is understood that most of them are held by the Bank of Montreal and a Captain J. G. Bennett) are declared to be undeserving of sympathy or of support for their claim against the Mexican Government since the purchase of these bonds, designed as they were to finance the supply of arms to a Government which was in the last stages of its unsuccessful struggle against revolutionary forces, was a transaction of an unduly speculative nature, and was, moreover, undertaken in face of the warning published by Morgan, Grenfell and Co. that the issue was a violation of an earlier agreement entered into by the Huerta Government.
- (g.) It is stated by Señor Barrios, attorney for the Mexican Government in Europe, that Señor del Paso had no authority from his Government to agree to the public issue of the Trust Securities by Reuter's Bank in May 1914. The only instruction to him on the subject from his Government was a decree issued by the Mexican Government on the 27th February, 1914 (Appendix (H)), authorising the payments to de Kay to be made in bonds of the External Debt instead of in bonds of the Internal Debt as originally provided in the agreement with de Kay of the 8th January (Appendix (C)). It was on this decree that the agreement of the 2nd March (Appendix (E)) was based, but the decree contained no authority for any public issue of trust certificates. Señor del Paso subsequently admitted in conversation that de Kay had "bullied him into the whole business."

18. As against the arguments enumerated above, the case of the holders of the "C" Series Bonds may be summarised as follows:—

- (a.) The agreements concluded with de Kay in January and March 1914 were perfectly valid. While the National Packing Company was at the time temporarily in difficulties owing to the distracted state of the country, which interfered with the supply of cattle for slaughter, nevertheless it had been before and has since again become a paying concern. Having regard to this and to the services which de Kay had for many months rendered to the Mexican Government as adviser in matters concerning the supply of meat to the capital and the troops, the sum of £1,025,000 was not an excessive price to pay for de Kay's controlling interests in the company.
- (b.) The fact that the "C" Series of bonds was issued after Huerta's coup d'état was immaterial, seeing that this Series (like the "A" Series which had been recognised by the present Mexican Government) was issued under the authority of a law passed in May 1913 by a Congress the validity of whose acts had not been called in question.
- (c.) The rights of the signatories of the 1913 agreement respecting the "A" Bond issue were safeguarded by the insertion of a stipulation in the de Kay agreement respecting the "C" Bond issue, to the effect that these bonds should not be sold before July 1915, the date by which the control exercised by the "A" bondholders would cease.
- (d.) Lord Balfour's view, when in office, was that no real reason had been shown to justify the repudiation of the "C" Bonds by the Mexican Government, and he expressed his willingness in a letter to Captain Bennett to give such assistance as he could to the bondholders. When Lord Curzon was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Colonel Vaughan Morgan was informed in reply to a parliamentary question that His Majesty's Government could not accept repudiation of the Huerta and National Packing Company Bonds, but considered that the liability or otherwise of the Mexican Government should be submitted to a mixed commission on claims. A letter was also sent to Captain Guest in September 1924 stating that nothing has since occurred to cause His Majesty's Government to change their attitude.
- (e.) General Huerta's Government having been recognised by His Majesty's Government, the Series "C" bondholders maintain that they were justified in considering that this was a reputable Government deserving of financial support. They maintain further that Lord (then Sir E.) Grey as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had encouraged the investment of British capital in support of the cause of President Huerta. (No trace can, however, be found in the Foreign Office records of this Department having encouraged the public to purchase the Huerta bonds.)

1925

26

MEXICO.

- (f) The fact that the mortgage bonds of the National Packing Company were endorsed by the Mexican Financial Agent in London with the guarantee of the Mexican Government is held to prove that the latter were satisfied that Mr. de Kay had fulfilled the obligations assumed by him in regard to the supply of munitions.
- (g.) Before the London trustees of the Packing Company accepted the £1,025,000 of bonds of the Mexican External Department, all the documents were submitted to a number of legal and financial authorities and approved. A list of these authorities is given in Appendix (I) (paragraph 3 (d)).

A legal opinion by M. Chenue, Advocate of the Court of Appeal in Paris, holding that the issue of Trust Certificates by Reuter's Bank was valid, is annexed as Appendix (J).

I am to request that you will be so good as to take this question into your consideration and to favour the Secretary of State with your opinion:—

- (a.) Whether the Mexican Government are justified, whether on any and, if so, which of the grounds summarised in paragraph 16, or on other grounds, in repudiating responsibility for the issue of the bonds of the Mexican Federal Government 1913 Loan, Series "C"?
- (b.) If the reply to (a) is in the negative, whether the claim on the Mexican Government of the British holders of "C" Bonds is a sufficiently strong one to justify His Majesty's Government in carrying the matter to arbitration with a reasonable expectation of securing a decision in their favour?

Mr. Chamberlain would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

ROBERT VANSITTART.

List of Papers.

APPENDIX (A).—Decree of Mexican Congress of the 30th May, 1913, authorising flotation of a foreign loan of £20,000,000.

APPENDIX (B).—Agreement concluded at Paris on the 8th June, 1913, between the Financial Agent of the Mexican Government and an International Syndicate of Bankers respecting the Mexican Federal Government 6 per Cent. Ten-Year Loan.

APPENDIX (C).—Agreement concluded at Mexico City on the 8th January, 1914, between Mr. P. L. y Parra, Sub Secretary of Finance and Public Credit, and Mr. John W. de Kay respecting the transfer to the Mexican Government of the control of the Mexican National Packing Company.

APPENDIX (D).—Agreement concluded at Mexico City on the 10th January, 1914, between the Mexican Minister of War and Mr. John W. de Kay respecting the purchase of munitions of war for the Mexican Government.

APPENDIX (E).—Agreement concluded in London on the 2nd March, 1914, between Señor del Paso, Financial Agent of the Mexican Government in London, and Mr. John W. de Kay modifying the terms of the agreement of the 8th January.

APPENDIX (F).—Announcement in London papers on the 18th May, 1914, of offer of trust certificates to value of £700,000 secured upon an issue of the 1913 bonds.

APPENDIX (G).—Letter of the 18th May, 1914, from Messrs. Morgan, Grenfell, to the "Times."

APPENDIX (H).—Mexican decree of the 25th February, 1914, granting authority for the modification of the agreement of the 8th January mentioned above.

APPENDIX (I).—Memorandum by Captain J. G. Bennett giving list of authorities consulted before the London trustees of the National Packing Company accepted the agreements transferring control of the company to the Mexican Government.

APPENDIX (J).—Opinion by M. C. Chenue, Advocate of the Court of Appeal in Paris, in regard to the legality of the issue of the so-called "Peat" trust certificates.

[The above-mentioned documents will be found in "South and Central America," July 20, 1925, Section 1.]

MOROCCO.

27

Report.

Some of the contentions which are set out in paragraphs 17 and 18 of the letter of instructions depend upon questions of fact with regard to which we have not the necessary information to form an opinion. For instance, the statement that de Kay obtained the bonds fraudulently, the statement that del Paso had no authority from his Government to agree to the issue of trust securities and the suggestion that in that event he was at any rate held out by the Mexican Government as having such authority, are all matters of fact which would have to be investigated if the issue were unobjectionable on other grounds. Even the question as to the position of Huerta after October 1913 depends upon a close study of events of October 1913 and on the Mexican law and Constitution, with which we are not familiar.

For the purposes of this opinion we assume that the acts of Huerta in that month were not in accordance with the Mexican Constitution, and that after that date he was not legally President, but was in fact in the position of an usurper. On that assumption, in our opinion, the Mexican Government of to-day is justified in repudiating responsibility for the Series "C" Bonds. It is true that the issue of these bonds by the Mexican Executive was authorised by Congress in May 1913; but this authority was an authority given to the Government of Mexico, which must mean to the lawful Government of that country. Huerta was not lawfully governing at the time when the bonds were issued, and therefore when he is ejected and a lawful Government reinstated, that Government is not bound to recognise the validity of the acts done by him during his usurpation of power.

We think that the issue of the bonds was a violation of article 13 of the agreement of June 1913; but in our opinion this would not in itself invalidate the bonds in the hands of the holders as against the Mexican Government, but would only give a right to the issuing banks with whom the agreement was made to claim damages against that Government.

It follows that in our opinion the answer to the first question is in the affirmative and to the second in the negative.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
August 4, 1925.

MOROCCO.

[W 2274/94/28/1925]

No. 10.

[March 16, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 10, 1925.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to inform you that the Spanish Ambassador in London has been apprised of the alleged intention of certain British subjects to purchase an aeroplane in this country for the use of the Riff tribes in rebellion against the Government of the Spanish zone of Morocco. In communicating this intelligence to His Majesty's Government, his Excellency requested that steps should be taken to stop the export from this country of the aeroplane in question.

2. Aeroplanes are not at present specified in "The Arms Export Prohibition Order, 1921," and are therefore not subject to licence on exportation from this country. The Secretary of State has considered whether "The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870," can properly be invoked in order to give effect to the Spanish Ambassador's request. The Riff tribes are situated within the boundaries of the Spanish zone of Morocco, as defined in the Franco-Spanish Treaty of 1912 (vol. cvi, "State Papers," at p. 1025), and their military operations against the Spanish forces constitute, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, rebellion against the Government of a friendly Power. In the circumstances it would seem that the Riff tribes cannot be regarded as a foreign State within the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and that to invoke the Act generally in the present case might be held to involve recognition of the Riff tribes as a belligerent.

[14641]

Export from Great Britain of aeroplane for use of Riff tribes in revolt against Spanish Government.

F

PALESTINE.

3. From the information communicated by the Spanish Ambassador, it appears that it is the intention of the British agents of the Riff tribes that any aeroplane purchased in this country should be flown direct to Morocco rather than transported as cargo by land or sea. If it can be shown that this is so, action might perhaps be taken under section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act without any implicit recognition of the Riff tribes' belligerent status, provided that the wording of section 11 does not exclude the application of the section to aircraft. In the contrary event, apparently no powers exist under which the export of aeroplanes to the Riff can be prohibited.

4. The Secretary of State will be glad to learn whether you concur in the conclusion set forth above, and in particular whether you consider that section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act can be held to apply to an expedition by aircraft against the dominions of a friendly power.

I have, &c.
G. H. VILLIERS.

Report.

In our opinion the conclusion reached by the Secretary of State that the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, other than section 11, are inapplicable to the present situation is correct.

The proposed application of section 11 presents more difficulty. We think it possible that an expedition of aircraft fitted with armament, such as guns, bombs, &c., might constitute a military expedition within the meaning of the section.

On the other hand, we do not think that an unarmed aeroplane can constitute a military expedition, even if it be intended to convert it into an engine of war when it reaches its destination. The expedition that leaves this shore must be a military one, and a commercial aeroplane does not answer this description.

If the aeroplane be designed by a Government contractor, upon information acquired by him in that capacity, its exportation might be stopped under the Official Secrets Acts. Unless it can be shown either—

- (a.) That the aeroplane in itself is so fitted up as to constitute a military expedition; or
- (b.) That it comes within the provisions of the Official Secrets Acts, we do not consider that its exportation can be legally stopped under the existing law. There might, of course, be an Order in Council extending the prohibition of the existing "Arms Export Prohibition Order, 1921," to aeroplanes, if the Board of Trade consider this course advisable; but, unless power is obtained in that way, we do not think that the exportation can legally be prevented.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
March 16, 1925.

PALESTINE.

[E 2379/338/65/1925]

No. 10^a.

[Colonial Office.]

[April 7, 1925.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen.

Downing Street, March 31, 1925.

Constitutional position of Government of Palestine.

I AM directed to state that certain questions have arisen in Palestine and will doubtless continue to arise which depend for their solution on a definition of the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine.

2. For example, questions have arisen in connection with the following points:—

- (a.) The extension to Palestine of imperial preference, which was dealt with by your predecessors in reports dated the 18th February, 1921,* and the 3rd January, 1923.†

* Confidential 11933, p. 35.

† Confidential 12470, p. 17.

PALESTINE.

- (b.) The status of civil servants in Palestine, with particular reference to the question whether or no they are to be regarded as "in the service of the Crown."

- (c.) The proper way for the Governor of Palestine to sue and be sued, either in this country or in Palestine—the proper method of entering into contracts, and matters of a similar nature.

3. As you are doubtless aware, His Majesty the King was selected by the Principal Allied Powers as mandatory for Palestine. The terms of the mandate were approved by the Council of the League of Nations in July 1922 and brought into operation by resolution of the council on the 29th September, 1923. A copy of the instrument is transmitted herewith.

4. The article of the covenant of the League of Nations concerning mandates is No. 22, and the mandates contemplated in that article have generally been regarded as of three distinct classes, viz.:—

- (1.) Territories defined in paragraph 4 of the article: A Mandates.
- (2.) Territories defined in paragraph 5 of the article: B Mandates.
- (3.) Territories defined in paragraph 6 of the article: C Mandates.

5. Except in the case of Nauru, His Majesty's Government are not directly concerned with the territories referred to in (3) above as being under C Mandates. The territories under B Mandates are administered pursuant to orders in council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. At the time article 22 of the covenant of the League of Nations was drafted it appears to have been contemplated that both Iraq and Palestine would come under paragraph 4, and that in both cases States could be created whose existence as independent nations could be provisionally recognised. In Iraq this step has actually been taken; His Majesty has recognised King Feisal as a sovereign ruler, and has concluded with him a treaty of alliance with protocol and subsidiary agreements thereto. His Majesty, therefore, exercises no direct jurisdiction in Iraq and only such control as is conferred by the treaty of alliance and connected instruments.

6. It was not possible to take the same course in Palestine as that taken in Iraq, both for political reasons and more especially inasmuch as the Principal Allied Powers had decided that the mandatory should be responsible for putting into effect the declaration made on the 2nd November, 1917, by His Majesty's Government and adopted by those Powers, in favour of the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people. The terms of the Palestine Mandate were, therefore, so drafted as to give His Majesty full powers of legislation and of administration, and the largest possible discretion as to the form of government which should be set up.

7. A form of government has in fact been established by the Palestine Order in Council (1922) made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. A copy of this order in council is attached for your information. The general scheme of the order in council is similar to that adopted in the case of B Mandates, and also in the case of countries under His Majesty's protection in which His Majesty possesses and exercises jurisdiction, and which are generally known as British protectorates.

8. It should be mentioned in this connection that it is proposed in Palestine to create a Palestinian citizenship, and a draft of the order in council which is in preparation for this purpose is enclosed.

It must be pointed out, however, that the effect of this arrangement will be to create only local citizenship—the persons holding certificates thereof being, when out of Palestine, simply in the position of British-protected persons.

9. I am further to state that, with the concurrence of the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade, "The Copyright Act, 1911," has under section 25 of that act been extended to Palestine as a territory under His Majesty's protection. A copy of the order in council is transmitted herewith.

10. It is submitted that the order in council mentioned in paragraph 7 above is the document which must be looked at to determine the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine. It will be observed that by the order in council His Majesty creates the legislature upon which he confers the power of legislation, subject to his ultimate power of disallowance under article 27: that he gives to the High Commissioner under article 25 a limited power to assent to ordinances, and delegates to him his prerogative of mercy under article 16: that he sets up courts of law from which there is an appeal to the Privy Council under article 44: and that he lays down generally the form of government. A copy of the order in council (Appeal to the Privy Council) is attached hereto.

11. The High Commissioner is appointed by the King under a commission. A copy of this document is enclosed together with a copy of the Royal Instructions which are issued to the officer holding that appointment.

12. I am to request therefore that the Secretary of State may be favoured with your advice on the following point:—

Whether the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine in relation to His Majesty is the same as that of other Governments established by order in council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, and if not, in what material respect the relationship is different.

I am, &c.
H. YOUNG.

List of Papers.

- (1a.) Law Officers to Foreign Office, February 18, 1921. [Confidential 11933, p. 35.]
- (1b.) Law Officers to Colonial Office, January 3, 1923. [Confidential 12470, p. 17.]
- (2.) League of Nations Mandate for Palestine, July 24, 1922. [Cmd. 1785.] [Parliamentary 5152.]
- (3.) Covenant of League of Nations. [Cmd. 2300.] [Treaty 1741.]
- (4.) Foreign Office telegram No. 1032 to Sir R. Wingate, November 2, 1917.
- (5.) Palestine Order in Council, 1922. [Confidential 11940*.]
- (6.) Draft Order in Council for Palestine. [T 23/23/378/1925.]
- (7.) Copyright Act, 1911 (Extension to Palestine) Order in Council, 1924. [Confidential 12109*.]
- (8.) Palestine (Appeal to Privy Council) Order in Council, 1924. [Confidential 12159*.]

Report.

IN our opinion, in any British court the Palestine Order in Council, 1922, is the document determining the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine; and that position in relation to His Majesty is the same as that of other Governments established by order in council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. Internationally, foreign States are bound to recognise the position of His Majesty in Palestine as defined in the mandate; and by article 1 His Majesty has the right to exercise all the powers inherent in the Government of a sovereign State, save as therein limited. But since those rights are conferred by the mandate, we think that a foreign Government would have the right to appeal to the League against a breach by His Majesty of the limitations contained in the mandate, and to that extent the position in Palestine differs from that in other British possessions.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
April 7, 1925.

E 3176/1178/65/1926

No. 10^B.

[Colonial Office.]

[June 19, 1925.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, May 27, 1925.

Preferential treatment
in United Kingdom of goods imported from
Palestine.

I AM directed by M. Secretary Amery to refer to the report of your predecessors in office of the 18th February, 1921,* addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and to your report of the 3rd January, 1923,† addressed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies on the question of the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine, and to request you, in the light of the circumstances hereinafter appearing, to be so good as to consider the question anew.

At the time when the reports above referred to were made, the exact status of Palestine was not entirely clear despite the wide terms of the mandate and the provisions of the Palestine Order in Council, since it was undoubtedly one of the communities referred to in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

* Confidential, 11933, p. 35.

† Confidential, 12470, p. 17.

In a letter which Mr. Amery caused to be addressed to you on the 31st March, 1925, it was, however, pointed out that His Majesty's Government had not in fact accorded to Palestine any recognition as an independent nation, but, on the contrary, had, as they were entitled to do under the terms of the mandate, arranged for Palestine to be administered under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act.

In your report of the 7th April, 1925,* you state that the position of Palestine in relation to His Majesty is the same as that of other Governments established by Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act—in other words, that the Government of Palestine is His Majesty.

In considering whether, in the event of an Order in Council being made applying the provisions of section 8 of "The Finance Act, 1919," to Palestine as a mandated territory, any breach of the most-favoured-nation clause contained in various commercial treaties would be involved, it is necessary, it is submitted, to determine the proper construction of the clause in question. These clauses differ considerably in language, but they resemble one another in conferring upon the foreign State with which the treaty is made as favourable treatment as is, or may be, granted to any "other" foreign State, or any "other" foreign nation, or any "other" foreign country, or any "third Power," or any "third nation."

These expressions appear to be used as synonymous and interchangeable phrases.

The question therefore seems to be whether Palestine, in existing circumstances, should be regarded as enjoying a status which is analogous to that of the foreign State with which the particular treaty is made, so that the principle of equally favoured treatment must apply to the one as much as to the other.

It is submitted that if due weight is given to the wording of these clauses, it is clear that the favoured nation must be a foreign country in the full sense of the term, enjoying independent sovereignty and free from British jurisdiction.

Palestine, it is true, is a foreign country in the sense that it is not part of His Majesty's dominions, but in that narrow sense so also are protectorates and "B" mandated territories.

It has never been suggested that the most-favoured-nation clause is applicable to protectorates, and, as regards "B" mandated territory, your predecessors advised the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in a report dated the 21st September, 1921,† that there was no objection to the extension of Imperial preference to such territories.

I am to request you therefore to be good enough to advise Mr. Amery whether, in view of the information which, since the date of your previous report on this matter has been supplied to you, as to the action which His Majesty's Government have in fact taken with reference to Palestine, and in view of your report of the 7th April, 1925, you are still of opinion that the extension to Palestine of Imperial preference would infringe the obligations arising from the "most-favoured-nation clauses" of commercial treaties.

Copies of the reports referred to, the Palestine Order in Council and the mandate, are enclosed for convenience of reference.

I am, &c.
H. YOUNG.

List of Papers.

- Law Officers to Colonial Office, February 18, 1921. [Confidential, 11933, p. 35.]
- Do. Do. , September 21, 1921. [Confidential, 11933, p. 30.]
- Do. Do. , January 3, 1923. [Confidential, 12470, p. 17.]
- Do. Do. , April 7, 1925. [Confidential, , p. .]
- Palestine Order in Council, 1922. [Confidential, 11940*.]
- League of Nations Mandate for Palestine. [Parliamentary, 5152.]

Report.

We have reconsidered this question in the light of the observations contained in the Colonial Office letter above referred to, but we still consider that the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine would be a breach of the most-favoured-nation clauses of British commercial treaties. The question depends upon whether Palestine must be regarded as a "foreign" or a "third" State or nation within the meaning of these treaties. We have already expressed the view, which we gather is

* No. 10A.

† Confidential, 11933, p. 30.

not disputed, that Palestine falls within the category of States included in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations; and it seems to us necessarily to follow that internationally it is an independent nation, although the administration of its affairs is mandated to His Britannic Majesty.

The point upon which we advised in April last depended upon the municipal law of this country; the point which we are now considering depends entirely upon the international status conferred upon Palestine by the Covenant and other international documents. In our opinion those documents do constitute Palestine a foreign or third nation within the meaning of the treaties. We would add that Palestine cannot on its side grant Imperial preference to this country by reason of the provisions of article 13 of the mandate.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
June 19, 1925.

[E 3918/2989/34/1925]

No. 11.

[June 30, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 18, 1925.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list on the subject of the fiduciary issue of the Imperial Bank of Persia.

2. This matter was originally referred to your predecessors in a letter signed by Sir Louis Mallet on the 21st August, 1912, as well as in a further communication dated the 5th February, 1913. Copies of these letters and of your predecessors' opinions of the 23rd December, 1912,* and the 13th March, 1913,† are enclosed in print for convenience of reference. The bank is now desirous of receiving a confirmation of an opinion given by their solicitors in 1913 to the effect that the bank is entitled, in accordance with the terms of its charter, concession and deed of settlement, to expand its note circulation to an unlimited extent, provided that any excess over a circulation of £1,100,000 is secured by a metallic reserve of the full amount of such excess.

3. In view of the importance to His Majesty's Government that the terms of the charter and concessions of the Imperial Bank of Persia should be meticulously adhered to, Mr. Chamberlain will be glad to have the benefit of your opinion once more, and I am to request you to take the enclosed papers into your consideration and to inform him whether, in your opinion, the bank is entitled to expand its circulation from time to time over the limit of £1,100,000, provided that the excess be secured by a metallic reserve of the full amount of such excess.

4. As the Royal Charter, &c., of the Imperial Bank of Persia is the only copy in the possession of this Department, I have the honour to request that it may be returned with your reply.

I have, &c.

LANCELOT OLIPHANT.

List of Papers.

- (1.) Imperial Bank of Persia to Foreign Office, May 22, 1925. [E 2989/2989/34/1925.]
- (2.) The Charter, the Deed of Settlement and the Concession of the Imperial Bank of Persia. (8vo 9982.)
- (3.) Law Officers' Opinions of December 23, 1912, and March 13, 1913. [Confidential 10192, pp. 22 and 23; and Confidential 10391, pp. 40 and 41.]

* Confidential 10192, p. 22.

† Confidential 10391, p. 40.

Report.

By clause 3 (b) of the charter it is provided that the—"difference between the metallic reserve and the amount of notes so issued and in circulation shall not at any one time exceed the amount of the capital of the company for the time being actually paid up, after deduction of the amount which, in pursuance of the deed of settlement hereinafter mentioned, is to be paid for the acquisition of the said concession."

The amount of the capital paid up after deduction of the amount paid for acquisition of the concession amounts, we are told, to £450,000. It follows, in our opinion, that, so far as the charter is concerned, the only limit upon the right of the bank to issue notes beyond £1,100,000 is that the notes in circulation shall not exceed the metallic reserve as defined in the charter by more than £450,000.

The deed of settlement (article 14) is less stringent in its requirements. The concession (article 3) requires a cash reserve of at least one-third of the value of notes in circulation and a guarantee of the difference between the cash reserve and the notes issued consisting of securities belonging to the bank and deposited in its coffers in Persia.

So long as these conditions are fulfilled, in our opinion there is no limit to the amount of notes which may be issued; but previous notice of any issue beyond £800,000 must be given to the Persian Government under article 3 of the concession.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
June 30, 1925.

[C 14118/2265/37/1925]

No. 12.

[November 4, 1925.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 20, 1925.

I HAVE the honour by direction of Mr. Secretary Chamberlain to request the favour of your observations on the following matter:—

In November 1916 the victorious German armies invaded Roumania and it became evident that within a very short time they would occupy the whole country. It was essential at that stage of the war to prevent Germany replenishing her stocks of oil products, and the Roumanian Government were therefore urged by the three Allies, Britain, France and Russia, immediately to destroy the oil plant and wells so as to prevent, or at least delay, the exploitation of these resources by the enemy. In order to secure the assent of the Roumanian Government the three Allies found it necessary to furnish them with a joint guarantee to the effect that they would be compensated for the loss which might result from this destruction. The terms of this guarantee will be found in Paper (A).

2. Further, and in order to make certain that the destruction for which the consent of the Roumanian Government had then been obtained should be carried out with the greatest expedition and efficiency, His Majesty's Government despatched a mission under Sir John Norton-Griffiths, who, acting under the authority and with the co-operation of the Roumanian Government, succeeded in the short time at his disposal in effecting what amounted to a wholesale and complete destruction of the existing oil plant and properties. The military advantage secured for the Allies by this destruction was considerable, and in this advantage all the Allied Powers benefited.

3. On the conclusion of the armistice a joint Anglo-French commission proceeded to Roumania to assess the damage done. A counter-assessment was also prepared by the Roumanian Government. These two assessments were then examined by a joint committee which, in October 1922, agreed on a figure of, roughly, £10 million sterling as the total compensation due to the oil companies.

4. The French and British representatives on this joint committee only accepted this figure on the two conditions (1) that the Roumanian Government themselves made proper provision for compensating the companies, and (2) that they accepted as discharge of the guarantee given in 1916 by the Ministers of the three Allied Powers the cancellation of an equivalent amount of Roumanian external debt.

Standard Oil Company's claim against His Majesty's Government in respect of the destruction of Roumanian oil wells in 1916.

5. The Roumanian Government have not yet formally acquiesced in these conditions, and they have, in fact, given it to be understood that they do not consider themselves bound by the assurances furnished on their behalf by the Roumanian Finance Minister when in London in 1920. The text of these latter assurances, which have become known as the "Blackett-Titulesco Agreement," will be found in Paper (B). At the same time, the Roumanian Government have always contended, and still contend, that it is for them, and not for the Allied Governments, to pay compensation to individual companies. In this connection attention is invited to Paper (C).

6. Among the properties destroyed were those of the "Romano-Americana"—a company incorporated under Roumanian law and having its seat and sphere of operations entirely within Roumania. The shares of this company are, it appears, held almost wholly by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. The amount of compensation which, under the assessment agreed to by the joint committee, would fall to the Romano-Americana is, roughly, £2 million.

7. In the year 1919 and again in the year 1920 the United States Embassy in London made verbal enquiries of the Foreign Office in regard to the claim of this company. A reply was in each case given that His Majesty's Government did not admit any liability to individual companies, but only to the Roumanian Government, to whom the companies should apply.

8. In 1924 the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, evidently despairing of obtaining any early compensation from the Roumanian Government, decided to press their claim in London. They contended, at this stage, that His Majesty's Government were morally responsible for the damage done, that the guarantee given to the Roumanian Government was in substance a joint and several guarantee to the individual companies, and that His Majesty's Government were not justified in setting this liability against the Roumanian war debt, which arose from quite distinct and separate circumstances.

9. In September 1924 the American Ambassador in London, in a conversation with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, drew his attention to the claim which had been raised by the Standard Oil Company, and begged the then Prime Minister to give the matter his personal attention. After examining the papers which then existed on this matter, Mr. MacDonald addressed Mr. Kellogg a private letter, of which a copy is annexed as Paper (D).

10. This letter provoked an official note from the American Ambassador, enclosing a detailed memorandum, in which the basis of the claim was stated in somewhat fuller detail, although in different terms. The United States Government suggested arbitration on the ground that this issue had proved incapable of settlement by diplomacy and appeared therefore to fall within the Arbitration Treaty concluded between His Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States on the 4th April, 1908, and extended by the Agreement of the 23rd June, 1923. The full text of this note, which is the document on which your observations are primarily invited, will be found as Paper (E) annexed to the present letter.

11. The issue raised by the American demand for arbitration has been carefully considered by the Departments of His Majesty's Government directly concerned. Strong reasons exist both in favour of and against the acceptance of the proposal to submit this claim to arbitration. The financial risks involved in any such submission of the case to arbitration are very great. If His Majesty's Government were defeated, compensation would have to be paid directly by His Majesty's Government not only to the Standard Oil Company, but also to the other companies whose property was similarly destroyed. On the other hand, if His Majesty's Government are in the right, there should be every reason to expect a successful issue to the arbitration. Experience has shown that it is not easy for His Majesty's Government permanently to resist demands by the United States Government for arbitration, and in this case the power of the oil interests in the United States is so great that continued insistence by the American Government on the arbitration of the claim may be anticipated.

12. These conflicting considerations may ultimately have to come before the Cabinet for a decision as to the terms of the answer which should be returned to the United States note, but before steps can be taken to submit the matter to the Cabinet, Mr. Chamberlain is anxious to obtain your advice as to the extent to which the Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty of 1908 (Paper (F)) entitles the United States Government to claim arbitration as of right in this case, and as to the right of the United States to intervene on behalf of the Romano-Americana Company.

13. You will observe that the treaty relates to differences of a legal nature or relative to the interpretation of a treaty.

14. What is a difference of a legal nature? No exact definition of the term which can be said to be binding on His Majesty's Government is in existence so far as Mr. Chamberlain is aware. Disputes are frequently characterised as justiciable or non justiciable, and disputes are regarded as justiciable if they are capable of solution by the application of a rule of law. Frequent attempts have been made to define the type of dispute to which compulsory arbitration should apply, and by article 13 of the Covenant of the League of Nations parties to that instrument are pledged to regard certain categories of disputes as generally suitable for submission to arbitration, but this provision is not one of which the United States can claim the advantage, unless it may be taken as affording a key to the meaning of the phrase "differences of a legal nature" in the treaty of 1908.

15. The Arbitration Treaty of 1908 pledges the contracting parties to submit to arbitration differences relating to the interpretation of a treaty. If the United States allege that the claim for compensation for the destruction of the "Romano-Americana" oil properties falls within the Arbitration Treaty as being "of a legal nature," and His Majesty's Government maintain that it does not, it is possible that the United States Government may contend that this question as to the meaning of the treaty should itself be referred to arbitration as being a difference relating to the interpretation of a treaty.

16. An exception is made in article 1 of the Arbitration Treaty by the terms of which differences affecting the vital interests, independence and honour of the contracting States and those concerning the interests of third parties are excluded.

17. This dispute can scarcely be said to affect the vital interests, or the independence or the honour of Great Britain, but it is clear that it affects the interests of third parties. It certainly affects Roumania as the territorial sovereign of the locality where the oil properties were destroyed, and it affects France and (in theory) Russia as parties with Great Britain to the guarantee given to the Roumanian Government (Paper (A)). It is not clear, however, whether the exception as to differences concerning the interests of third parties constitutes an objection which should be raised before the tribunal by way of defence, or whether it constitutes an objection excluding the operation of the article altogether.

18. The questions dealt with above relate to the interpretation of the Arbitration Treaty of 1908. Another question which arises is whether the United States Government are entitled to put this claim forward at all in view of the fact that the Romano-Americana had been incorporated as a company in Roumania, and therefore enjoyed Roumanian nationality. On this point I am to transmit a memorandum by one of the assistant legal advisers to this Department (Paper (G)).

19. A further reference will, if necessary, be made to you on the question whether the claim is one which can be resisted on the ground that it falls within the principle that a party who suffers injury as the result of "war losses" is not entitled to compensation as of right.

20. In communicating to you the accompanying papers, I am to request that you will favour Mr. Chamberlain with your opinion on the questions:—

- (1.) Whether, having regard to the fact that the Romano-Americana Company is incorporated in Roumania, the Government of the United States of America is entitled, pursuant to existing principles of public international law, to take up the claim of the company against His Majesty's Government on the ground that the ultimate financial interests are those of United States citizens or on any other ground?
- (2.) Whether the claim of the United States Government to represent the interests of the Romano-Americana Company is in itself a matter on which the United States Government are entitled to claim arbitration under the Treaty of 1908?
- (3.) Whether the difference between the United States Government and His Majesty's Government on the subject of the right of the Romano-Americana Company to compensation from His Majesty's Government constitutes a difference of a legal nature?
- (4.) Whether a disagreement between the two Governments as to whether or not this claim is covered by the Arbitration Treaty of 1908 would constitute a difference relating to the interpretation of a treaty?
- (5.) If the answer to (3) is in the affirmative, whether it would be advisable for

ROUMANIA.

His Majesty's Government to raise (a) by way of objection to arbitration, or (b) as a defence in arbitration proceedings on the claim of the Romano-Americana Company, the allegation that the United States Government is not entitled to arbitration under the Treaty of 1908 because the claim concerns also the interests of parties other than His Majesty's Government?

21. I am further to request you to furnish Mr. Chamberlain with any observations of a general character which you consider may be useful in this connection.

I have, &c.
MILES W. LAMPSON.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Joint Guarantee of three Allied Ministers to Roumanian Government. [31119 F 23234/1917].
(B.) Blackett-Titulesco arrangement, August 11, 1920. [C 4366/4366/19/1920].
(C.) M. Léon Wenger to Mr. Wills (Board of Trade), February 9, 1925. [C 2144/329/37/1925].
(D.) Mr. MacDonald to Mr. Kellogg, October 6, 1924. [C 15033 8593/37/1924].
(E.) United States Ambassador, February 16, 1925. [C 2330/2265/37/1925].
(F.) Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty, April 4, 1908. [Treaty 1322].
(G.) Memorandum by an Assistant Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office. [C 3321/2265/37/1925].

Report.

1. We answer the first question submitted to us in the negative. It is a recognised maxim of international law that citizenship is an essential condition of diplomatic protection. In the matter of the presentation and enforcement of international claims no rule is more strictly observed. The nationality of corporations is a matter which has been much discussed; but both in England and in America it has been repeatedly decided that the citizenship of a corporation is determined by the place of its incorporation. Further, it is well settled that a corporation is a different entity from its corporators, and that the corporation is not the agent of the individual shareholders. In the present case the allegation is made that the British Government has destroyed certain property in Roumania belonging to a Roumanian corporation. Apart from precedent, it would seem clear that any claim for compensation must be made by the Roumanian company; and that, as that company is not an American citizen, the United States Government has no right to take up its claim.

We have read and considered a number of cases in order to ascertain whether there is any precedent conflicting with this view; and we have also considered the memorandum prepared in the Foreign Office, in which many of these cases are discussed. We do not analyse them in detail in this report, but we may say that we have found nothing conflicting with the view which we are putting forward in any decision. There are several cases in which States (including the United States) have refused to take up claims of foreign corporations in which their citizens held a substantial interest, and conversely there are cases in which the claims of corporations incorporated in a State have been treated as claims by a citizen of that State, although the shareholders were mainly foreign. The cases in which the claims of a foreign corporation have been taken up by a State on the ground that the shareholding interest belongs to its citizens are all cases in which the facts shew a right in the shareholders as distinct from the corporation. The most usual instance is where the corporation has ceased to be a going concern and has gone into liquidation, so that its assets really belong to its creditors and shareholders.

The United States in its memorandum refers to the Delagoa Bay case. In that case a claim against Portugal was made in respect of the infringement of a concession granted to an American citizen and assigned by him to a Portuguese company in which an English company held substantially all the shares. It is true that both the United States and the British Government took up the claim; but the grounds upon which they did so do not in any way support the contention of the United States Government in the present case. In that case the Portuguese Company was, to use the language of Lord Salisbury, "practically defunct," and it is expressly on this ground that Lord Salisbury bases his right to intervene. It is, therefore, only an example of the principle explained above.

ROUMANIA.

The American memorandum seems to us consistently to ignore the distinction between the company and its corporators. It speaks of an American mutual corporation "engaged in business in Roumania through a Roumanian subsidiary." This seems to be an echo of the old fallacy that a company is the agent of its shareholders. It goes on to refer to the destruction of American-owned property, whereas this property was Roumanian owned. It might be conceded that either the United States or Great Britain might fairly be called upon to go to arbitration in regard to damage done with the approval of the Roumanian Government to a Roumanian corporation owned exclusively by nationals of a third State, if that State could establish that that damage was the immediate consequence of acts on account of which the law of nations imposed upon the actor an obligation to make reparation, if it were made clear that the obligation was to make reparation to the shareholders and not to the Roumanian corporation. In the present case the obligation (if any) is clearly an obligation to make reparation to the Roumanian corporation for the destruction of its property.

2. We do not think that the question can be stated quite in the form in which it is put in our instructions. The claim of the United States Government must be a claim, not to represent the interests of the Roumanian company, but to assert a right in the shareholders of the Roumanian company to recover compensation. That right, if it is pressed, might be a proper subject of arbitration, and one which the United States Government could properly put forward.

3. We think the difference stated in the third question is a difference of a legal nature, but, for the reasons already given, we do not think it is one which the United States Government is entitled to assert.

4. We think this question must be answered in the affirmative.

5. We think the British Government would be well advised to raise the objection mentioned in the fifth question by way of objection to arbitration, among other grounds, if it were decided to refuse to arbitrate.

6. Whether or not the British Government should persist in refusing arbitration obviously raises questions of a political character, on which we express no opinion. If for any reason it were ultimately decided to go to arbitration, we desire to call attention to the fact that it is most important that the matters submitted should be defined with accuracy. In more than one case the question whether the State asserting a right was entitled to maintain the claim has been ruled by the tribunal not to be open for discussion, on the ground that, by submitting the merits to arbitration, the point had been conceded. It would therefore be very important so to frame the submission as to make it clear that the matter was not submitted in a form to admit the right of the United States Government to put forward a claim on behalf of the Roumanian company.

We would also point out that it is not usual to allow diplomatic intervention until the party aggrieved has exhausted his remedies in the municipal courts. In the present case the United States Government seek to meet this objection by stating that the claim is not founded in contract, and that it is only for contractual claims that the British courts entertain a petition of right. We think that care should be taken, if any arbitration takes place, to hold the United States Government to this position, and to limit the claim put forward to the claim of a legal right not founded in contract.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
November 4, 1925.

1925

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

TURKEY

[E 6006/408/44/1923]

No. 12^A

[Clearing Office.]

[July 13, 1925.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. J. H. Stamp.

UNDER article I (xvi) (b) of the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, all German property, rights and interests within His Majesty's Dominions are charged—

"Secondly, with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by British nationals, other than British nationals ordinarily resident in the self-governing Dominions and Egypt, with regard to their property, rights and interests in the territories of Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey, in so far as those claims are not otherwise satisfied."

These provisions are based upon the concluding words of clause 4 of the annex to section IV, Part X, of the Treaty of Versailles.

The Board of Trade will have shortly to decide whether there is to be an extension of release of property in this country to certain of the more meritorious classes of ex-enemy nationals, and, before doing so, it is necessary for them to have precise knowledge as to what classes of claims of British nationals are entitled to participate in the charge already conferred by the Order in Council.

The question upon which it is desired to take the opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Stamp is whether, having regard to the terms of the Treaty of Lausanne, it can be properly said that there are or may be amounts due in respect of claims by British nationals with regard to their property, rights and interests in the territory of Turkey, the payment of which is secured by the charge on German property contained in the paragraph of the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, set out above.

An examination of the Treaty of Lausanne suggests that the only articles under which it would appear possible that there may be amounts due in respect of such claims are the following: Articles 65, 66 and 71, and articles 2, 3, 6 and 7 of the protocol, being the instrument numbered xii of those signed on the 30th January, 1923, forming part of the Turkish peace settlement, and set out on pp. 205 to 209 of the official publication containing the Treaty of Lausanne.

In view of the fact that, in the earlier part of clause 4 of the annex to section IV, the expression "amounts due in respect of claims" is used as distinct from "debts" owing to Allied nationals by German nationals, and that the charge secondly conferred does not refer to "debts," this being doubtless due to the fact that, as appears in the reply of the Allied Powers to the observations of the German delegation on the conditions of peace, the Allied Powers stated themselves as prepared to omit from the charge on the property of German nationals the liability to satisfy the unpaid debts of nationals of Powers allied with Germany, it has been recognised that such claims cannot be deemed to include these unpaid debts. It is not therefore considered relevant to call the attention of the Law Officers to the articles in the Treaty of Lausanne which provide for the payment of these debts and for the determination of their amount, if need be, by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal.

Dealing with the various articles above referred to, it is suggested that, both having regard to the obligation of Turkey to restore property, rights and interests in specie or to pay the proceeds of the liquidation to the owner, and to the power of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal to order the addition to the proceeds of a liquidation of such amount as it shall consider equitable, there may well be amounts due in respect of claims by British nationals of the above nature.

As to article 71, having regard to the fact that this refers to claims or suits by Allied nationals with regard to their property, rights and interests against the Ottoman Government begun before the 29th October, 1914, and that the article merely states that the provisions of section I are not to prejudice such claims or suits which are to be continued against the Turkish Government and

7137 [9398]

33

E. 39

TURKEY

other Governments under previously existing conditions, it may be difficult to contend that the amount of such claims comes within the charge. As to this, it may be mentioned that the Law Officers, on the 14th June, 1922, advised, with reference to a somewhat similar article, viz., article 179 of the Treaty of Neuilly-sur-Seine, that the diplomatic and consular claims therein mentioned would not be entitled to participate in the benefit of the charge over Bulgarian property. Having regard, however, to the difference in the form of the two treaties, and to the special circumstances applicable to these diplomatic and consular claims against Bulgaria, it is not considered that this decision has much bearing on the present case.

With reference to the articles contained in protocol No. 12 relating to certain concessions granted in the Ottoman Empire, it would certainly appear prima facie as if amounts might become due to British nationals in respect of claims with regard to their property, rights and interests in the territory of Turkey, both in the case of the two British companies expressly referred to in article 2 and of the general body of beneficiaries (in so far as they are British), under concessionary contracts referred to in article 1, to whom indemnities and compensation may become payable under articles 6 and 7.

Article 297 (c) of the Treaty of Versailles, and the corresponding provisions of the treaties of peace with the other ex-enemy Powers other than Turkey, provided that the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers should be entitled to compensation in respect of damage or injury inflicted upon their property, rights or interests, in the territory of the enemy Power concerned, by the application of exceptional measures of war or measures of transfer, and these treaties contained provisions for investigation of claims and determination of the amount of compensation by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal or by an arbitrator. This paragraph of article 297 also provides that the compensation might be charged upon the property of the nationals of the ex-enemy State concerned, and that such property might be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the annex—i.e., the paragraph upon which the charge contained in the Treaty of Peace Order is based.

No such provisions are contained in the Treaty of Lausanne, and, except in the case of the articles specially referred to above, no machinery is provided by that treaty for ascertaining the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers.

A large number of claims were made to the Royal Commission on Compensation for Suffering and Damage by Enemy Action, presided over by Lord Sumner, by British subjects in respect of loss or damage to their property in Turkey which do not come within the provisions of articles 66 or 71 of the Treaty of Lausanne or articles 2, 3, 6 or 7 of the protocol.

The Law Officers and Mr. Stamp are therefore requested to advise—

- (1) Whether, having regard to the terms of the Treaty of Lausanne and other instruments forming part of the Turkish peace settlement, it can reasonably be contended that, under any of the articles, and, if so, which, amounts are or may become due in respect of claims by British nationals, with regard to their property, rights and interests in the territory of Turkey so as to entitle them to participate in the benefit of the charge over German property secondly conferred in the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, made in pursuance of the Treaty of Versailles.
- (2) Whether British nationals are entitled to participate in the benefit of the charge over German property referred to above in respect of claims with regard to their property, rights and interests in Turkish territory for which no specific provision for compensation or for the assessment of the amount of compensation is made in the Treaty of Lausanne.
- (3) Generally.

TURKEY

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. J. H. Stamp.

In our opinion, having regard to the terms of the Treaty of Lausanne and other instruments forming part of the Turkish peace settlement, it can reasonably be contended that under certain of the articles thereof amounts are or may become due in respect of claims by British nationals with regard to their "property, rights and interests" in the territory of Turkey so as to entitle them to participate in the benefit of the charge over German property secondly conferred in the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, made in pursuance of the Treaty of Versailles. The articles under which, in our opinion, it would be reasonably contended that amounts are or may become so due are articles Nos. 65, 66, 69 and 81, and the last provision of article 89 of the treaty, and articles Nos. 3 and 7 of the protocol numbered XII signed concurrently with the treaty.

2. In our opinion British nationals are not entitled to participate in the benefit of the charge referred to above in respect of claims with regard to their property, rights and interests in Turkish territory in cases where no provision for compensation is made in the Treaty of Lausanne.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.
J. H. STAMP.

*Law Officers' Department,
July 13, 1925.*

1926

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(13206)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1926.

1926

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 2^a, &c

ABYSSINIA.
No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	Apr. 22, 1926	Jurisdiction over British subjects in Abyssinia ..	1
GENERAL.
2	Law Officers ..	July 22, 1926	Administration of estates by consuls; article in British commercial treaties ..	3
PALESTINE.
2 ^a	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Jan. 13, 1926	Dead Sea salts: validity of Turkish pre-war concession ..	7
SWITZERLAND.
2 ^b	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Mar. 16, 1926	Assets of the Basle Mission Trading Society ..	10

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1926.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ABY—EST.	GOO—WES.
A.	G.
Abyssinia: jurisdiction over British subjects in, 1-3. " removal under Colonial Prisoners Removal Act, 1884, of British subjects sentenced by Mixed Court, 1-3.	Goods of Aikyo , 5.
B.	H.
Barnett's Trust , 5. Basle Mission, 10-12. Basle Mission Trading Society: disposal of assets, 10-12. Bennett, Captain J. G., 7-10.	Henry, Major J. D., 7, 8.
C.	J.
Claims: right of British dominion to bring claims against mother country before The Hague Court, 10. Colonial Prisoners: removal under Colonial Prisoners Removal Act, 1884, of British subjects sentenced by Mixed Court of Abyssinia, 1-3. Commonwealth Trust (Limited), 11, 12. Compensation: to national of friendly State for seizure of property, 11, 12. Concession: Turkish pre-war concession relating to Dead Sea salts; validity, 7-10. Consuls: administration of estates by; article in British commercial treaties, 3-7. Court: Mixed, in Abyssinia; removal under Colonial Prisoners Removal Act, 1884, of British subjects sentenced by, 1-3.	Jurisdiction: over British subjects in Abyssinia, 1-3.
D.	M.
Dead Sea: validity of Turkish pre-war concession for exploitation of mineral salts, 7-10. Domicile Act, 1861: suggested amendment of, 6, 7.	Macromatis , 10. Mizzi, Dr., 7, 8.
E.	P.
Edwards, Mr. W. M., 7, 8. Estates: administration of, by consuls; article in British commercial treaties, 3-7.	Prisoners. See Colonial Prisoners. Property: of nationals of friendly State; compensation for seizure, 11, 12.
	S.
	Sentences. See Colonial Prisoners.
	T.
	Treaties: British commercial treaties; article relating to administration of estates by consuls, 3-7. Treaty of Lausanne. See Treaty of Peace (Turkey). Treaty of Peace (Turkey): validity under article 77 of transfer of Turkish pre-war concession respecting Dead Sea salts, 7-10. Turkey: validity of concession granted in 1911 for exploitation of Dead Sea salts, 7-10.
	W.
	Westbury, Preston and Stavridi, Messrs., 7, 8.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1926.

ABYSSINIA.

[J 950/2/1/1926]

No. 1.

[April 22, 1926.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 9, 1926.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Austen Chamberlain, to request the favour of your advice on a point which has arisen in connection with the exercise of His Majesty's rights of jurisdiction over British subjects in Abyssinia. Jurisdiction over British subjects in Abyssinia.

2. The extent of that jurisdiction is less well-defined in Abyssinia than it is in other countries, and rests largely upon usage. His Majesty's Government have, however, always claimed and obtained the benefits of article 7 of the Franco-Abyssinian Treaty of Commerce of the 10th January, 1908, the text of which will be found in the memorandum enclosed as Paper A. It will be seen that the system of jurisdiction provided by that treaty for criminal cases between French citizens and Abyssinian subjects provides for such cases being heard by an Abyssinian magistrate assisted by a French consul. This system differs, as regards cases where a European is defendant or accused, from that which exists in other countries where the system of extra-territoriality prevails, since in those countries the rule is that the competent Court is that of the accused's nationality. The Tribunal established under the Franco-Abyssinian Treaty is known as the "Mixed Court"; its constitution and procedure are somewhat indeterminate, but it may be assumed for present purposes that it is not an ordinary Abyssinian Tribunal but a Court possessing an international character set up by treaty, and the principle is well established, as will be seen from the memorandum enclosed as Paper A, that criminal cases between British and Abyssinian subjects are tried by that Court and not by the ordinary Abyssinian Tribunals.

3. His Majesty's jurisdiction over British subjects in Abyssinia is exercised in accordance with the Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913 (Paper B). Article 35 of that Order makes provision for the detention in custody of a British subject, either pending his trial or while he is serving his sentence, in cases dealt with by the Mixed Court (the "Abyssinian Tribunal" referred to in the article). This is effected either by a separate warrant by the Consular Court or by the Court's endorsement on the warrant of the Mixed Court. Under that article, however, such detention can only take place in Abyssinia.

4. Recent cases have shown the necessity of making provision under which British subjects sentenced by the Mixed Court can be sent to serve their sentence in British territory, since there is no British prison in Abyssinia which is suitable for the reception of long-term prisoners, while the conditions of imprisonment in Abyssinian gaols are such that it is not possible to consent to British subjects convicted before the Mixed Court serving their sentences therein. In the case of British subjects convicted before the Consular Court, provision is made by article 56 of the Order under section 7 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890) for imprisonment at Aden, Bombay or Malta. In view of the fact, however, that section 7 of the Act is confined to the case of offenders "convicted before a British Court in a foreign country," it is not possible to make provision under that section for persons convicted before the Mixed Court, and the question arises whether, without an amendment to the Act, it is possible to amend the Abyssinia Order in Council in such a way as to provide the required facilities.

1926

2

ABYSSINIA.

5. There seems to be no difficulty as regards legalising the detention of the persons in question in prison after their arrival at the British possession to which they are to be sent; this can be effected by local legislation, of which the India Office and Colonial Office respectively are prepared to obtain the enactment. The difficulty arises as regards the detention of the persons concerned in custody in Abyssinia before their removal from that country and on their way from Abyssinia to the place of imprisonment. It has been proposed to effect this by making use of the provisions of section 8 of the Act, and an article, of which a copy is enclosed (Paper C), amending article 35 of the Abyssinia Order in Council, has been prepared for this purpose. Section 8 of the Act is the one on which are based the provisions in Foreign Jurisdiction Orders in Council providing for deportation (see, e.g., article 73 of the Abyssinia Order), and, in view of the fact that the word "removal" is used as well as "deportation" in the section in question, it is suggested that the section provides sufficient authority for the proposed amendment of article 35. It cannot, however, be denied that the effect of the proposed amendment would be to use section 8 to give power to do that which cannot be done under section 7, and doubts have accordingly been expressed as to whether, in the event of the lawfulness of the detention in custody of a convicted prisoner on his way from Abyssinia to Aden or Berbera being questioned before a competent Court, the provision in question would be upheld.

6. It has been suggested that an alternative method would be to deal with the cases in question under the Colonial Prisoners Removal Act, 1884, which was applied by article 79 of the Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913, to Abyssinia as if Abyssinia were a British possession, with the substitution of the Consul-General for the Governor of a British possession. No such express limitation as that contained in section 7 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act (the words "convicted before a British Court in a foreign country") is involved, and it is suggested that it could be argued that, even if the Mixed Court is technically an Abyssinian Tribunal, it is nevertheless exercising His Majesty's jurisdiction in the case contemplated; that it would, therefore, not be improper that persons convicted by it should be removed under the Act, and that there is nothing in the Act or in its application by article 79 to Abyssinia to prevent this being done.

7. If neither of these two courses can be adopted, it would appear that no power exists to make the necessary provision except by obtaining an amendment of section 7 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act so as to make it applicable to British subjects convicted before tribunals of the nature of the Mixed Court, a proceeding to which it is presumed there would be no legal objection.

8. I am also to transmit for your consideration the draft of an article (Paper D) to replace article 56 of the Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913, under which offenders convicted before the Consular Court can be sent for imprisonment to Aden, Bombay or Malta. The object of the new article is merely to add Berbera to the places in question, but, inasmuch as Berbera is in a protectorate and is not therefore "a place within His Majesty's dominions," it has been necessary to reword the existing article 56.

9. In these circumstances, I am to request you to take the enclosed papers into your consideration and to favour Sir Austen Chamberlain with your opinion on the following points:—

- (1.) Whether the terms of the proposed article to replace article 56 of the Abyssinia Order in Council (Paper D) are fit and proper to be submitted for His Majesty's approval?
- (2.) Whether the proposed amendment of article 35 of the Abyssinia Order in Council (Paper C) affords a satisfactory method of dealing with the situation described in paragraphs 2-4 above, and can properly be submitted for His Majesty's approval?
- (3.) In the event of your answer to question (2) being in the negative, whether the alternative method suggested in paragraph 6 above can properly be adopted?

GENERAL.

3

In the event of your being unable to advise the acceptance of either of the two suggested courses, Sir Austen Chamberlain would be grateful for any alternative suggestions which you may be able to offer as to the means to be adopted for dealing with the question.

I have, &c.
JOHN MURRAY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Library Memorandum, July 30, 1924 (9962).
- (B.) Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913 (Confidential 10352*).
- (C.) Draft article to replace article 35 of Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913 (J 3121/681/1/1925).
- (D.) Draft article to replace article 56 of Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913 (J 3588/681/1/1925).

Report.

- (1.) Our answer to the first question proposed is in the affirmative.
- (2) and (3). We do not think that the proposed amendment to article 35 affords a satisfactory method of dealing with the situation described in the letter under reply. In our opinion, sections 7 and 8 of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890, deal with two contrasted situations. Section 7 is designed to deal with the case of convicted offenders; section 8 is directed to the case of persons who have not been convicted and sentenced, but whose removal or deportation has been ordered under powers such as those afforded by paragraph 73 of the Abyssinia Order in Council. We do not, therefore, consider that section 8 is apt to deal with the difficulty arising in the case of convicted offenders.

We think, however, that a provision might be made by the alternative methods suggested in the Foreign Office letter, namely, by dealing with cases under section 2 of the Prisoners Removal Act, 1884. That Act has been applied to Abyssinia by paragraph 79 of the Abyssinia Order in Council; and the case seems to us to fall within section 2 (d) of the Act.

We have nothing to add.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
April 22, 1926.

GENERAL.

[K 9111/4417/250/1926]

No. 2.

[July 22, 1926.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 25, 1926.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Austen Chamberlain, to request that you will be so good as to favour him with your opinion on the question of a suitable form of words for adoption in commercial treaties to which this country is a party, relating to the rights of consuls to administer the estates, situate in the country to which they are appointed, of deceased nationals of the country in whose service they are.

2. In the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Japan of the 3rd April, 1911, article 5, the following provisions are found:—

"In the case of the death of a subject of one of the high contracting parties in the territories of the other, without leaving at the place of his decease any person entitled by the laws of his country to take charge of and administer the estate, the competent consular officer of the state to which the deceased belonged shall, upon fulfilment of the necessary formalities, be [16111]

B 2

Administration of estates by consuls;
article in
British commercial treaties.

GENERAL.

empowered to take custody of and administer the estate in the manner and under the limitations prescribed by the law of the country in which the property of the deceased is situated.

"The foregoing provision shall also apply in case of a subject of one of the high contracting parties dying outside the territory of the other, but possessing property therein, without leaving any person there entitled to take charge of and administer the estate.

It is understood that in all that concerns the administration of the estates of deceased persons any right, privilege, favour or immunity which either of the high contracting parties has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the consular officers of any foreign State shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the consular officers of the other high contracting party."

On account of certain doubts being felt as to whether it was possible under English law as it is at present for His Majesty's Government to fulfil the obligations contained in the above-quoted article, in the Anglo-Siamese Commercial Treaty of the 14th July, 1925, the following provisions were substituted for those of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty:—

"ARTICLE 28.

"In the case of the death of a subject of one of the two contracting parties in the territories of the other, leaving kin, but without leaving at the place of his decease any person entitled by the laws of his country to take charge of and administer the estate, the competent consular officer of the State to which the deceased belonged shall, upon fulfilment of the necessary formalities, be empowered to take custody of and administer the estate in the manner and under the limitations prescribed by the law of the country in which the property of the deceased is situated.

It is understood that in all that concerns the administration of the estates of deceased persons, any right, privilege, favour or immunity which either high contracting party has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the consular officers of any other foreign country shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the consular officers of the other contracting party."

It will be observed that in the first paragraph the words "leaving kin" have been inserted, and that paragraph 2 of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty has been altogether omitted in the treaty with Siam.

3. It is thought that under English law it is always within the discretionary power of the court to grant or refuse administration to a consular officer of the country to which the deceased belonged and to limit any grant made as the court may think fit. In particular, it is thought that, though leaving the discretion of the court unfettered, section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vic., cap. 77), and as regards the estates of persons dying on or after the 1st January, 1926, section 162 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, gives the court power to grant administration to consular officers. It would appear to be clear beyond question that in English law no person can obtain administration of the estate of a deceased person otherwise than by grant of the court, since upon the death of the deceased person his estate becomes vested in the President of the Probate Division of the High Court. The first question upon which your opinion is desired is, therefore, whether the first paragraphs of the two articles quoted above purport to give a right to consuls to administer the estates of deceased aliens without the necessity of a grant by the court. In this connection it will be observed that the article provides that the "consular officer . . . shall, upon fulfilment of the necessary formalities, be empowered to take the custody of and administer the estate in the manner and under the limitations prescribed by the law of the country . . .". If the answer to the above question should be in the affirmative, then it is clear that His Majesty's Government would only be able to fulfil the obligations of the above treaties in so far as, if at all, the case were covered by some special statute.

4. Assuming that the answer to the above question is in the negative, the second question is whether the first paragraphs of the two articles above quoted purport to give the consular officers a stronger right to a grant of administration of the estates of deceased aliens than that which they possess of applying to the courts under section 73 of "The Court of Probate Act, 1857," or section 162 of "The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925." In other words, do the articles in question purport to limit the discretion of the court in cases coming within the terms of these articles where foreign consuls apply for administration? In this connection attention is drawn to the words "shall, upon fulfilment of the necessary formalities, be empowered to take the custody of and administer . . .".

GENERAL.

5. Assuming that the answer to the second question is in the affirmative, it appears that it is only within the power of His Majesty's Government to fulfil the obligations contained in the first paragraph of these articles in so far as the case is provided for by statute. In this connection attention is drawn to section 4 of the Domicile Act of 1861 (24 and 25 Vic., cap. 121). It will be seen that the section gives power to consular officers to take possession and have the custody of the personal property of the deceased, but provides that such officers must immediately apply for and shall be entitled to obtain from the court administration of the effects of the deceased "limited in such manner and for such time as to such court shall seem fit." Therefore if the answer to the first question is in the affirmative it does not appear that this statute can be relied upon for rendering effective the right purported to be given by the treaties. On the other hand, assuming the answer to the first question to be in the negative and to the second question to be in the affirmative, it appears that section 4 of the Domicile Act covers the same cases as those provided for in the first paragraphs of the treaty articles above quoted and that, upon that section being put into operation by Order in Council as prescribed, it might have the effect of limiting the discretion of the court upon the application of a consular officer for administration.

6. The third question upon which you are desired to express an opinion is whether or not the words in section 4, "limited in such manner and for such time as to such court shall seem fit," give a wider discretion to the court in limiting the administration granted to a consular officer than that provided for in the words of the treaties, "in the manner and under the limitations prescribed by the law of the country in which the property of the deceased is situated." In this connection your attention is especially drawn to the case of an alien dying leaving personal property in this country without having disposed of it effectively by will and without leaving any kin entitled to succeed to it. In such cases by English law the Crown becomes entitled to the property as bona vacantia (in re Barnett's Trust, 1902, 1 Ch. 847), and care must, of course, be taken to ensure that this right of the Crown is safeguarded. If a foreign consul were granted administration of an estate and there should happen to be no person entitled to succeed to the estate, it is possible that such consul might, unless restrained by the conditions on which the grant is made, transfer the assets to the Government of his own country; in this connection it may be noted that the court, upon an application in 1912 in respect of the estate of a domiciled Chilean subject by a consul, as such, of Chile (a country with whom no convention existed within the meaning of section 4 of the Domicile Act), decreed administration to him, though not in his capacity as consul, under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, but only authorised him to collect the assets and pay the debts and then required him to bring the residue of the estate into the registry. The administration decreed was further limited to extend only until the proper persons from Chile applied for a grant or, in the case of their continued absence or non-application, until the Treasury Solicitor should apply. It is thought that had the case been covered by section 4 of the Domicile Act, a similar limitation could and would have been imposed by the court, and the answer to the third question will incidentally determine whether this limitation would be justified under the words of the treaties. In 1925, in the case of the Goods of Aikyo (130 L.T. 32) pursuant to the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of 1911 above referred to, a general grant of administration was made to the Japanese consul at Liverpool in the matter of the estate of a Japanese subject dying intestate at that place. No notice of this case appears to have been given either to the Treasury Solicitor or to the Solicitor to the Duchy of Lancaster, and it would seem that the court, after reading the terms of the treaty in question, acted without considering the matter further, and the rights of the Crown may have been prejudiced thereby.

7. The fourth question upon which your opinion is desired is whether the words of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty "without leaving at the place of his decease any person entitled" must be interpreted as necessarily implying "leaving some person entitled, but not at the place of his decease." In other words, whether paragraph 1 of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty bears the same meaning as paragraph 1 of article 28 of the Anglo-Siamese Treaty, in which the words "leaving kin" have been inserted, and thus gives no right to a consular officer unless the deceased leaves kin who would be entitled to succeed to the estate and excludes the cases where the assets might become bona vacantia.

8. It was apparently under the impression that the answer to the immediately preceding question was in the negative, and to guard against the event of the limitation referred to in paragraph 6 not being justified under the terms of the first paragraph of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, that the additional words "leaving kin" were inserted in paragraph 1 of article 28 of the Anglo-Siamese Treaty. The fifth question upon which you are requested to advise is, therefore, whether these or similar (and if similar what) additional words are (a) necessary, or (b) desirable. There would appear to be no necessity for such words if the answer to the fourth question is in the affirmative, or if, whatever the answer to the fourth question may be, the answer to the third question is in the affirmative, and therefore such limitations as those imposed by the court in the case of the estate of the Chilean subject above referred to are thought to be justifiable under paragraph 1 of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty.

9. The second paragraph of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty applies the provisions of the first paragraph in the case of an alien dying outside British territory. It will be observed that section 4 of the Domicile Act only covers the case where the deceased foreign subject dies within His Majesty's dominions. In other words, it only covers the case dealt with in the first paragraphs of articles 5 and 28 of the treaties quoted. It does not cover the cases dealt with in paragraph 2 of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, namely, where a foreign subject dies outside His Majesty's dominions, but leaves property therein. If, therefore, the answer to the second question is in the affirmative, it would appear that His Majesty's Government are not in a position to fulfil the obligations contained in the second paragraph of article 5 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. It was this doubt which caused this paragraph to be omitted in article 28 of the Anglo-Siamese Treaty. In addition to the five preceding questions to which this paragraph gives rise in the same manner as the first paragraph, there is also a sixth question applicable only to this paragraph upon which your opinion is desired, namely, whether, without any change in the law, a paragraph in such terms can be safely included in future commercial treaties.

10. Your opinion is lastly desired on the question whether, in the event of the answer to the sixth question being in the negative, it would be desirable to amend section 4 of the Domicile Act so as to cover the cases provided for in this paragraph.

11. Sir Austen Chamberlain would further be glad to be favoured with any observations of a general nature which may occur to you on the framing of an article dealing with this matter for insertion in the commercial treaties of this country.

I have, &c.

E. F. CROWE.

Report.

1. Our answer to the first question is in the negative. We think it clear that the words "shall, upon fulfilment of the necessary formalities, be empowered to take the custody of and administer the estate in the manner and under the limitations prescribed by the law of the country" include the application to the court for grant of probate.

2. Our answer to the second question is in the affirmative. The court has power under "The Probate Act, 1857," and "The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1885," to grant administration to Consular officers, but it has the right to exercise its own discretion in so doing.

3. Our answer to the third question is in the negative.

4. Our answer to the fourth question is in the negative. We do not think that the Anglo-Japanese Treaty can be interpreted in the manner suggested.

5. Our answer to both parts of the fifth question is in the affirmative. We think that the Anglo-Japanese Treaty imposes upon His Majesty's Government obligations which under existing legislation it is unable to discharge. We think that the Anglo-Siamese Treaty contains satisfactory provisions.

6. Our answer to the sixth question is in the negative. This necessarily follows upon the view we have already expressed in answer to the second question.

7. The seventh question seems to us to raise matters of policy rather than of law. Presumably foreign countries will not give us rights in these treaties wider than those we are prepared to concede to them. If, therefore, there is any large number of cases in which it is desired to obtain the protection afforded by the language of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty for the property of British subjects dying outside a foreign country, and leaving property within that country, it will be necessary to alter section 4 of the Domicile Act. But before doing this we think it would be advisable to consult Somerset House as to the effect on the rights of the Crown in the case of bona vacantia if the Act is so extended.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
July 22, 1926.

[E 742/742/65/1926]

No. 2^A.

[Colonial Office.]

[January 13, 1926.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, December 16, 1925.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to inform you that he has had under consideration a claim advanced by a Mr. W. M. Edwards and a Major J. D. Henry in respect of rights to a concession granted by the Ottoman Government in 1911 to certain Turkish subjects for the exploitation of certain mineral resources of the Dead Sea, and to transmit to you in this connection copies of the documents and correspondence noted in the attached schedule. A copy of the translation of the original firman granting the concession will be found as an enclosure to the letter from Captain J. G. Bennett of the 7th June, 1923, as also of an opinion on the validity of the claim by a Dr. Mizzi, who, however, is understood himself to be or to have been financially interested. The accuracy of the translation is by no means guaranteed, but Mr. Amery has not thought it necessary to incur the trouble and expense involved in having the translation checked in detail.

2. As you will observe, Mr. Amery has been advised that the present claim is one which cannot be substantiated, and he has accordingly caused the claimants to be informed that he is unable favourably to consider their application. A full discussion of the case as it presents itself to Mr. Amery will be found in the letters from this Department to the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade No. 20425/25 of the 28th May.* With respect to the question of the validity of the transfer of the concession from the original Turkish holders to Captain Bennett, attention is directed to the closing words of article 77 of the Treaty of Lausanne. In reply to the letters referred to above, both the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Board of Trade expressed their general concurrence with the arguments advanced therein. It will be observed that, in the letter from this Department No. 27969/25 of the 10th July to the claimants' solicitors, Messrs. Westbury, Preston and Stavridi, the latter were merely informed that His Majesty's Government did not recognise the concession or admit that their clients possessed any rights in respect thereof. It should be explained, however, that the matter was subsequently discussed at the Colonial Office with Sir John Stavridi, a partner in the firm of solicitors employed by the claimants, and full oral explanations were given to him of the grounds on which Mr. Amery had been advised to reject the claim.

3. It may be held that the question whether or not Messrs. Westbury, Preston and Stavridi's clients have had the concession actually assigned to them or merely hold an option to acquire it has a material bearing on the whole case. Mr. Amery, however, has no definite evidence on this point, and Sir J. Stavridi was inclined to be evasive when questioned thereon. Such information as is available tends, as will be seen from the attached correspondence, to the former view.

4. I am to add that, as the Crown Agents for the Colonies, acting on behalf of the Palestine Government and on instructions from the Secretary of State, had publicly

* Printed below.

Dead Sea salts:
validity of Turkish pre-war concession.

invited the submission on or before the 31st October of tenders for a concession to develop the mineral resources of the Dead Sea, it was suggested to Messrs. Westbury, Preston and Stavridi that their clients would be well advised to submit a tender themselves, and as will be observed from the later correspondence, viz., the letters from this Department of the 16th September and the 27th October, and the solicitors' reply, a tender has been deposited on behalf of Mr. Edwards and Major Henry on the understanding that their claim to rights in respect of the Turkish concession will not be in any way prejudiced thereby.

5. For the above reasons, Mr. Amery is anxious that, should the claimants' tender be found less acceptable than that of some other applicant for a concession, he may be furnished with your advice as to the correctness, or otherwise, of the position adopted by His Majesty's Government in the matter before a concession conflicting with the rights purported to be bestowed by the alleged concession is actually granted to the successful tenderer; and he would ask that, as the date by which tenders were to be received has already passed, you will be good enough to give the matter your early consideration.

6. Mr. Amery is further advised that it is of importance in the present case, and in any similar cases which may arise in the future, to know whether any tribunal, international or otherwise, exists before which it is at the moment open to the claimants themselves to bring their claim. I am accordingly to request you to furnish him with your views on this additional point.

I am, &c.

J. E. SHUCKBURGH.

*List of Papers.

Captain Bennett to Colonial Office, April 19, 1923.
Colonial Office to Captain Bennett, May 9, 1923.
Captain Bennett to Colonial Office, June 7, 1923 (with enclosures).
Colonial Office to Captain Bennett, July 27, 1923.
Captain Bennett to Colonial Office, November 10, 1923.
Colonial Office to Foreign Office, December 4, 1923.
Foreign Office to Colonial Office, December 8, 1923.
Colonial Office to Captain Bennett, December 14, 1923.
Mr. Tillett to Mr. J. H. Thomas, July 22, 1924 (with enclosures).
Major Stewart to Colonial Office, October 18, 1924.
Colonial Office to Major Stewart, November 11, 1924.
Westbury, Preston and Stavridi to Colonial Office, May 5, 1925.
Colonial Office to Foreign Office and Board of Trade, May 28, 1925.†
Westbury, Preston and Stavridi to Colonial Office, May 29, 1925.
Board of Trade to Colonial Office, June 18, 1925.
Foreign Office to Colonial Office, June 19, 1925.
Colonial Office to Westbury, Preston and Stavridi, July 10, 1925.
Colonial Office to Westbury, Preston and Stavridi, September 16, 1925.
Westbury, Preston and Stavridi to Colonial Office, September 29, 1925.
Westbury, Preston and Stavridi to Colonial Office, October 8, 1925 (with enclosures).
Westbury, Preston and Stavridi to Colonial Office, October 24, 1925 (with enclosure).
Colonial Office to Westbury, Preston and Stavridi, October 27, 1925.
Westbury, Preston and Stavridi to Colonial Office, October 29, 1925.

Sir,

Downing Street, May 28, 1925.

WITH reference to—

- (1.) Your letter No. E. 11572/11572/65 of the 8th December, 1923.
- (2.) The letter from this Department No. 28744/23 of the 5th December, 1923.

(To both.) I am directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to transmit to you, to be laid before Mr. Secretary Chamberlain/the Board of Trade, the enclosed copies of further correspondence in regard to a claim advanced by certain British subjects to a concession in respect of the salts of the Dead Sea, alleged to have been granted by the Turkish Government in 1911 to certain Turkish nationals. I am also to enclose copies of the concession and of an opinion delivered by a Dr. Mizzi, who however is understood to be financially interested himself.

* Copies of these papers will be found in [E 7131/3118/65/1925].

† Printed below.

2. Mr. Amery is not disposed to recognise the claim as having any validity, and he is advised that the legal position may be stated shortly as follows:—

- (a.) That in the case of territory detached from a Power by reason of conquest, the succeeding Government, in the absence of express stipulations, has it in its discretion whether to recognise, or not to recognise, concessionary contracts entered into by the preceding Government.
- (b.) Further, or in the alternative, that where a treaty is made which contains provisions with respect to concessions, it is exclusive, and concession holders, whose concessions are not maintained by the terms of the treaty, cannot claim that nevertheless they are maintained by principles of international law.

3. As Mr. Chamberlain/the Board of Trade is of course aware, the question of concessions in Palestine and other parts of the pre-war Ottoman Empire is dealt with by the special Concessions Protocol attached to the Treaty of Lausanne. Under the terms of this protocol, concessionary contracts and subsequent agreements relating thereto duly entered into before the 29th October, 1914, between the Ottoman Government or any local authority, on the one hand, and nationals (including companies) of the contracting Powers, other than Turkey, on the other hand, are maintained. The present concession regarding the Dead Sea was granted in 1912 to Turkish nationals, and Mr. Amery is of the opinion that, if the advice given him as stated in the preceding paragraph in regard to the general position is correct, unless and until His Majesty's Government recognise the present concession, no property right or interest exists which could be claimed to be restored to its original owners under article 65 of the treaty. Further, he considers that the assignment of this concession without permission during the war to Captain Bennett, a British subject, does not render it any the less an Ottoman concession for the purpose of the treaty and of the rights of His Majesty's Government in the matter.

4. In addition, article 9 of the protocol provides that any State acquiring territory detached from Turkey under the treaty is fully subrogated as regards the rights and obligations of Turkey towards the nationals of the other contracting Powers, and companies in which the capital of the said Powers is predominant, who are beneficiaries under concessionary contracts entered into before the 29th October, 1914, with the Ottoman Government or any local Ottoman authority. In this connection also Mr. Amery is advised that the assignment of a concession originally granted to Turkish nationals without permission to British nationals after the beginning of hostilities with Turkey, precludes any claim of the sort under consideration, on the ground that "beneficiaries," correctly interpreted, can only refer to the original grantees.

5. I am also to observe in this connection that, in the case of German concessions in Tanganyika territory and elsewhere, His Majesty's Government have claimed to have the right to recognise or not, as they themselves decide, and in fact have only recognised concessions upon which substantial work has already been done. Only those, therefore, which His Majesty's Government have recognised have been treated as a property right and interest falling to be dealt with in accordance with the appropriate clauses of the Treaty of Versailles.

6. Mr. Amery would be glad to learn whether Mr. Chamberlain/the Board of Trade concurs in the foregoing statement of the position, and I am to request that an early answer may be furnished.

I am, &c.

H. YOUNG.

- (1) The Under-Secretary of State,
Foreign Office.
- (2) The Secretary,
Board of Trade.

Report.

In answer to the first question, we agree with the position taken up by the Government. In our opinion the claimants have no legal right against either His Majesty's Government or the Government of Palestine under the concession referred to for the reasons which are set out in the departmental correspondence submitted to us.

[16111]

2. We are not able to advise whether a claim would be entertained by the Courts of Palestine. We do not think that the claimants could successfully bring a claim before the English Courts. We do not think the claim falls within the jurisdiction of the Arbitral Tribunal set up by the Treaty of Lausanne. The only other International Tribunal would appear to be The Hague Court. That Court has already held in the Mavromatis case that it has jurisdiction under article 11 of the Mandate to consider claims that the mandatory is acting in breach of international obligations accepted by it. The Court has also held that these claims can only be brought before it by the Government of the party complaining. It would appear that in the present case the Government is the Commonwealth of Australia.

Whether or not on the true construction of the Covenant a Dominion could bring a claim against the mother country before The Hague Court is a matter of extreme difficulty; but we should not think it probable that the present Government of Australia would endeavour to assert such a right in the present case.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
January 13, 1926.

SWITZERLAND.

[W 2914/2914/43/1926]

No. 2^a.

[Colonial Office.]

[March 16, 1926.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Assets of the Basle
Mission
Trading
Society.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, February 26, 1926.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to invite your attention to the following matter:—

2. Prior to the war there was in the Gold Coast a missionary body called "The Basle Mission," which owned churches and schools and carried on missionary enterprise generally. The Head Office of the Mission was at Basle, Switzerland, but the Directorate was very pro-German, as was a large number of the missionaries in the Gold Coast. Associated with the Mission was a body called "The Basle Mission Trading Society," which appears to have been in the nature of a company registered at Basle.

3. One-fifth of its capital was held by the Mission, who could also nominate a certain number of Directors. By its constitution it had to pay 5 per cent. on its capital to the shareholders and to pay the balance of its profits to the Basle Mission for missionary work. The shares were held by persons of various nationality, about 6 per cent. being held in Germany and 11 per cent. by Germans living in Switzerland. The Society engaged in general trading operations in the Gold Coast, India, China and anywhere where the Mission operated, and its operations were very successful. Certain of the Directors and staff of the Society were Germans. On the outbreak of war most of the missionaries in the Gold Coast were interned and subsequently deported. The Trading Society, being staffed to some extent by Swiss nationals, carried on, the German employees being weeded out and interned.

4. So matters continued from 1914 to 1917, although representations were constantly being received to the effect that the Basle Mission was a thoroughly German body, but it is noteworthy that at this time a clear distinction was seldom drawn between the Mission and the Society. During 1917 the Society got rid of its German capital and prepared a new constitution, which was finally approved in November 1917. Under this the Society was not bound to the Basle Mission, but their surplus profits were to be devoted to "the furtherance of the Kingdom of God." A copy of the constitution is enclosed.

5. About this time the Governor of the Gold Coast recommended that the business of the Society there should be wound up on the ground of enemy association, and more particularly because some of the staff were alleged to have shown active pro-German sympathy. After some hesitation the Governor's proposal was accepted, and the business was wound up under Chapters 190 and 193 of the Laws of the Gold Coast Colony, copies of which are enclosed.

6. Mr. Amery does not anticipate that any question will arise with regard to the winding up of the Society's business, since the concern was certainly of enemy association, but he is concerned about the validity in international law of the action which was taken subsequently with reference to the assets of the Society.

7. In the ordinary course of events under a liquidation, the shops, trading stations and other property of the Society would have been sold and the proceeds lodged with the Controller of Enemy Property; and at the end of the war, if the Society had turned out to be legally German, credited through the Clearing Office, or, if it had turned out to be legally Swiss, returned to it. Strong representations were, however, made to the Secretary of State that if the properties were sold they would fall into the hands of commercial firms who would, among other things, sell liquor in the Trading Society's shops, and further that the work of the Mission would be at an end and the goodwill irretrievably lost. It was suggested that the Society could be regarded as operating a Trust for the benefit of the Basle Mission and that its assets could be regarded as impressed with that Trust, and that a proper course would be to pay to the shareholders of the Society the amount of their holdings and to convey the rest of the assets to Trustees to perpetuate the Trust. The argument as to the propriety of this course is conveniently stated in the note of the 11th February, 1919, from the Foreign Office to the Swiss Minister, of which a copy is enclosed.

8. This policy was eventually carried out. A company called "The Commonwealth Trust" was formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of the Trading Society in the Gold Coast, and the necessary steps were taken to complete the arrangements by the passing of Ordinance No. 40 of 1918 (Chapter 69), and the execution of a Deed of Trust. Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of the Commonwealth Trust (Limited), of the Trust Deed and of Chapter 69 of the Laws of the Gold Coast are enclosed.

9. The Society has never accepted the position, and the case which it makes upon the matter will be found in the volume of printed correspondence which is enclosed.

10. There is some reason to suppose that the whole question may be raised by the Swiss Government, who would, doubtless, ask for arbitration. Mr. Amery is not at all anxious to disturb the existing position if the action which has been taken can be defended under the provisions of international law. Otherwise it is proposed to try to effect some sort of settlement, but no settlement would be possible which did not involve the dispossession of the Commonwealth Trust. I am to ask, therefore, that you will be so good as to advise whether the action taken under Chapter 69 of the Laws of the Gold Coast and the Trust Deeds with respect to the assets of the Basle Mission Trading Society is justifiable under international law, and could be defended with a reasonable prospect of success before an international tribunal.

I am, &c.

C. STRACHEY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Constitution, of 1917, of Basle Mission Trading Society.
- (B.) Laws of Gold Coast Colony, Chapters 190 and 193.
- (C.) Foreign Office to Swiss Minister in London, February 11, 1919.
- (D.) Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Commonwealth Trust (Limited).
- (E.) Deed of Trust of the Commonwealth Trust (Limited).
- (F.) Laws of Gold Coast Colony, Chapter 69.
- (G.) Printed correspondence with Basle Mission Trading Society.

Report.

In our opinion international law in the sense in which the expression is used in the present instructions is really no more than the customary usage which prevails between sovereign States, and has no legal sanction. It would be necessary in any arbitration to define with precision the question submitted to any tribunal and the rules by which it was to be guided.

In the case under consideration the Governor of the Gold Coast has in effect confiscated the property of a Swiss Company and handed it over to another person. It is not in accordance with international usage to seize property of a national of a friendly State without making full compensation to the owner; and the fact that the owner had bound himself to apply some part of his property to charitable purposes does not, in our opinion, justify a State in seizing that property and giving it to someone else to use for one of the charitable purposes in question.

1926

12

SWITZERLAND.

Our answer to the question propounded is, therefore, in the negative.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
March 16, 1926.*

1927

[This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government.]

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

(13403)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1927.

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 4^a, &c.

GENERAL.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	Mar. 10, 1927	Foreign Jurisdiction (Military Forces) Order in Council, 1927	1

GERMANY.

2	Law Officers ..	Aug. 11, 1927	Participation of British shipping lines in German emigrant traffic to Canada	2
---	-----------------	---------------	--	---

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

3	Attorney-General ..	Dec. 22, 1927	Meaning of "arbitration" and scope of arbitration treaties	4
---	---------------------	---------------	--	---

ROUMANIA.

4	Law Officers ..	Dec. 1, 1927	Standard Oil Company's claim against His Majesty's Government in respect of the destruction of Roumanian oil wells in 1916	7
---	-----------------	--------------	--	---

TURKEY.

4 ^a	Law Officers .. [Treasury Solicitor]	Oct. 17, 1927	Claim of the Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government in respect of the concession granted by Turkey in 1903	12
----------------	---	---------------	--	----

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1927.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ANG—DEU.

A.

Anglo-Turkish Trust Company (Limited), 14, 15.
Arbitration: meaning of, 4-6.
" treaties; scope of, 4-6.
" right of United States to claim, in connection with the Standard Oil Company's claim against Great Britain, 7-12.
" of question of rights of shareholders of foreign company to compensation by a third State, 7-12.
Army. See Military forces.

B.

Bagdad Railway Company: claim against His Majesty's Government, 12-17.
Banca commerciale italiana, 14.

C.

Canada: German emigrant traffic to; participation of British shipping lines, 2-4.
Canadian Pacific Railway Company, 2.
Certificates. See Passenger certificates.
Claim: of Standard Oil Company of New Jersey for destruction of Roumanian oil wells, 7-12, 15.
" of Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government, 12-17.
" right of a State to support claim of foreign company against a third State, 7-12, 15.
Companies: foreign; right of a State to support claims of, against a third State, 7-12, 15.
" foreign; ownership of property of, by shareholders possessing a controlling interest, 7-12.
Compensation: for property destroyed to prevent its falling into enemy's hands, 7-12.
Concession: granted to Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company in 1913; claim against His Majesty's Government, 12-17.
" Turkish pre-war, relating to Dead Sea salts, 16.
Courts: consular; jurisdiction over military forces Order in Council, 1, 2.
Cunard Steamship Company (Limited), 2.

D.

Dead Sea: validity of Turkish pre-war concession for exploitation of mineral salts, 16.
Deutsche amerikanische Petroleum Gesellschaft, 9, 10.
Deutsche Bank, 13, 16.

EDW—PRO.

E.

Edwards, Mr. W. M., 16.
Emigration: participation of British shipping lines in German emigrant traffic to Canada and United States, 2-4.

G.

Germany: emigrant traffic to Canada and United States; participation of British shipping lines, 2-4.
Griffiths, Colonel N., 8, 11.

H.

Henry, Major J. D., 16.

I.

Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company: claim against His Majesty's Government, 12-17.
Iraq: claim of Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government, 12-17.

J.

Jurisdiction: of consular courts over military forces: Order in Council, 1, 2.
" British consular courts in China, over Shanghai Defence Force, 1, 2.

M.

Military forces: jurisdiction of consular courts, 1, 2.

O.

Oil wells: destruction of. See Roumania.
Order in Council: Foreign jurisdiction (Military forces), 1, 2.
Ottoman Anatolian Railway Company, 12, 13.
Ottoman Bank, 14-17.

P.

Passenger certificates: German; proposed British threat to discontinue recognition of, 2-4.
Property: destroyed to prevent its falling into enemy's hands; liability of destroyer to pay compensation, 7-12.
" of foreign companies: rights of ownership by shareholders possessing controlling interest, 7-12.

1927

(iv)

RAI—TRE.

R.

Railway: Bagdad; claim of Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government, 12-17.
 Romana Americana: right of United States to support claim of, against Great Britain, 7-12, 15.
 Roumania: destruction of oil wells in 1916; Standard Oil Company's claim against Great Britain, 7-12, 15.
 " Blackett-Titulesco Agreement, 1920, respecting oil wells, 7.
 Roumanian Consolidated Oil-fields, 8, 9.
 Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 2.

S.

Shanghai Defence Force: jurisdiction of British consular courts, 1, 2.
 Shipping: participation of British lines in German emigrant traffic to Canada and United States, 2-4.
 Standard Oil Company of New Jersey: claim against Great Britain for destruction of Roumanian oil wells in 1916, 7-12, 15.
 Survey. See Vessels.
 Swiss Bank Corporation, 14.

T.

Treaties: arbitration; scope of, 4-6.
 Treaty: Anglo-German Commercial, 1924; right of British shipping lines to participate in German emigrant traffic to Canada and United States, 2-4.

TRE—WHI.

T.--(cont.)

Treaty: Anglo-German Commercial, 1924; right of His Majesty's Government to discontinue recognition of German passenger certificates and exemption of German vessels from survey, 2-4.
 Treaty of Peace (Germany): article 327 and participation of British shipping lines in German emigrant traffic to Canada and United States, 2-4.
 " (Turkey): position of Bagdad Railway Company's concession as regards Irak, 12-17.
 Treaty of Lausanne. See Treaty of Peace (Turkey).
 Treaty of Versailles. See Treaty of Peace (Germany).

U.

United States: German emigrant traffic to; participation of British shipping lines, 2-4.

V.

Vessels: German; proposed British threat to discontinue exemption of, from Board of Trade survey, 2-4.

W.

White Star Line (Limited), 2.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1927.

GENERAL.

[F 2591/864/10/1927]

No. 1.

[March 22, 1927.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 10, 1927.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request that you will take into your consideration the attached papers and furnish him with your opinion on the question of the jurisdiction over the members of the Shanghai Defence Force to be exercised by the courts established in China under the China Order in Council, 1925 (Paper A).

2. Sir Austen Chamberlain has been in communication with the other Departments concerned, and a telegram, of which a copy is enclosed (Paper B), has been despatched to the Crown Advocate at Shanghai. The opinion of Lord Finlay,* to which reference is made in that telegram, was given in reply to a reference by the War Office on the 30th June, 1902, and a copy of this opinion, together with the opinion of Lord Carson,* then Solicitor-General, is enclosed for convenience of reference (Paper C).

3. In their letter concurring in the despatch of this telegram (Paper D), the Army Council asked that the question of amending the China Order in Council, 1925, to exempt explicitly the members of His Majesty's forces from the jurisdiction of the courts set up by that Order should be considered, and this has now been done in consultation with the Departments concerned. The Army Council only desire that the jurisdiction of the consular courts should be excluded in cases which can be dealt with by court-martial, but their view is understood to be that, while the instructions already sent should prevent proceedings being instituted against members of the force by the Crown in cases where this would be undesirable, the possibility of proceedings being instituted by private prosecutors cannot be ignored, and that, while it is to be hoped that the court would take the view of its jurisdiction indicated in Lord Finlay's opinion, it is undesirable that in existing circumstances in China such proceedings should be instituted before the consular courts at all, and that it is therefore very desirable that the legal position should be placed beyond doubt. Sir Austen Chamberlain is prepared to accept this view, provided that the necessary Order in Council is not confined in its operation to China alone, and subject to its terms being approved by you.

4. The draft Order in Council, of which a copy is enclosed (Paper E), has been prepared with this object. You will observe (1) that it applies to all countries where courts are established by Orders in Council for the administration of which the Foreign Office is responsible; (2) that it leaves the jurisdiction of the courts in civil matters unaffected; (3) that it applies only to persons who are on active service

Foreign Jurisdiction
(Military Forces)
Order in Council,
1927.

* Confidential 8022, p. 42.

1927

2

GERMANY.

within the meaning of the Army Act. One result of the last limitation is that the Order would not at present have any effect in Egypt, which is the only other country concerned where British forces are permanently stationed, since the troops in Egypt are held not to be on active service.

5. Sir Austen Chamberlain would therefore be obliged if you would favour him with your opinion as to whether the terms of the draft Order in Council are fit and proper to be submitted to His Majesty in Council. Inasmuch as it is obviously desirable that any legislation which it may be decided to enact should be passed as soon as possible, Sir Austen Chamberlain would be grateful for an early reply to this letter.

I have, &c.
GEORGE MOUNSEY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) China Order in Council, 1925. [Confidential 12770.*]
(B.) Telegram No. 23 to Shanghai, February 12, 1927. [F 1974/864/10]
(C.) Law Officers' opinions, June 30, 1902. [Confidential 8022, p. 42.]
(D.) War Office letter, February 11, 1927. [F 864/864/10.]
(E.) Draft Foreign Jurisdiction (Military Forces) Order in Council, 1927. [F 1974/864/10.]

Report.

In our opinion the terms of the draft Order in Council^a are fit and proper to be submitted to His Majesty in Council.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
March 22, 1927.

GERMANY.

[C 7293/3635/18/1927]

No. 2.

[August 31, 1927.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 11, 1927.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Austen Chamberlain, to transmit to you the papers noted in the attached list and to request the favour of your advice in the following matter.

2. Under a German law of the 9th June, 1927, all ships using German harbours for the purpose of carrying emigrants must be provided with a licence. A controversy with the German Government over the grant to British shipping companies of such licences has continued more or less continuously ever since the conclusion of peace.

3. As a result of official representations, the White Star, Cunard and Royal Mail Steam Packet Companies have been granted licences to engage in the emigration traffic from Germany to the United States, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have received a licence to engage in the traffic from Germany to Canada. But the first three lines have been refused licences to engage in the Canadian traffic, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has similarly been refused a licence for the American traffic, while licences for other British lines have been refused. The reason given for such refusal is that there is no need of further services, and the German Government state that, for the same reason, other applications, including those of German lines, have been refused. A translation of the last German note on the subject is enclosed (Paper A).

* The text of the Order in Council is contained in the "London Gazette" of April 26, 1927 (Confidential No. 13158*).

Participation of British shipping lines in German emigrant traffic to Canada.

GERMANY.

3

4. The question whether it could be successfully contended that the German action in refusing these licences involves a violation either of article 1 of the Anglo-German Commercial Treaty of the 2nd December, 1924, of article 6 of the Protocol of the same date (Paper B), or of article 327 of the Treaty of Versailles, has formed the subject of correspondence between the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office (Papers C and D). It will be seen that, apart from the difficulty arising from the unwillingness of the Board of Trade to submit to arbitration any question as to the interpretation of the Protocol of the 2nd December, 1924, Sir Austen Chamberlain was of opinion that under none of the treaty provisions in question was it possible to claim anything more than national treatment, and that it did not seem possible in the circumstances of the case to establish that Germany was not, in fact, granting such treatment to British vessels.

5. In these circumstances it has been suggested that pressure might be brought to bear on the German Government by means of a threat to discontinue the present arrangement under which German passenger certificates are recognised by the Board of Trade and German passenger vessels are exempted from the Board of Trade survey, in accordance with the provisions of section 363 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894." The question, however, at once arises whether such action is possible in view of the provisions of articles 3, 18 and 25 of the Anglo-German Commercial Treaty. This question is fully discussed in the enclosed memorandum prepared by the Board of Trade (Paper E). A copy of your opinion of the 10th July, 1925,* which is referred to in that memorandum, is enclosed for convenience of reference (Paper F).

6. Sir Austen Chamberlain is advised that the proposed action would be inconsistent with the provisions of article 25 of the Commercial Treaty. The reasons for this view are set out in the enclosed extract from a letter from the Second Legal Adviser to this Department to Sir Sydney Chapman (Paper G). Inasmuch as the German Government would be entitled to require the point to be submitted to arbitration under article 30 of the treaty, it is clear that the proposed action could not be taken unless it were considered that there was at least a reasonable prospect of success before the Permanent Court of International Justice.

7. In view, however, of the importance of the matter to the British shipping interests concerned, it is desired to submit the question to you, and Sir Austen Chamberlain would therefore be obliged if you would take the enclosed papers into your consideration and would favour him with your advice on the following points:—

- (i.) Whether it can be successfully maintained that the action of the German Government in refusing licences to certain British lines to engage in the emigration traffic to the United States and Canada constitutes a violation either of any provisions of the Anglo-German Commercial Treaty and Protocol of the 2nd December, 1924, or of article 327 of the Treaty of Versailles.
- (ii.) Whether, in view of the provisions of articles 3, 18 and 25 of the Commercial Treaty, it is open to His Majesty's Government to discontinue the present arrangement under which the German passenger certificate is recognised by the Board of Trade and German passenger vessels are exempted from the Board of Trade survey.

8. Sir Austen Chamberlain would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.
C. HOWARD SMITH.

List of Papers.

- (A.) German Government to British Ambassador, Berlin, April 6, 1926. [C 4641/818/18/1926.]
(B.) Anglo-German Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, 1924. [Treaty 1793.]
(C.) Board of Trade to Foreign Office, July 8, 1926. [C 7714/818/18/1926.]
(D.) Foreign Office to Board of Trade, July 27, 1926. [C 7714/818/18/1926.]
(E.) Board of Trade Memorandum. [C 6076/3635/18/1927.]
(F.) Law Officers to Board of Trade, July 10, 1925. [Confidential, 13004, p. 20.]
(G.) Mr. Malkin to Sir Sydney Chapman, June 27, 1927 (extract). [C 5056/3635/18/1927.]

* Confidential 13004, p. 20.

[17808]

B 2

Report.

1. We answer the first question in the negative. As regards the Treaty of Versailles, we agree with the view set out in the Foreign Office letter of the 27th July, 1926. As regards the Commercial Treaty and Protocol, we are of opinion that if it could be established that, under guise of a licensing system, Germany was, in fact, differentiating between British and German vessels, and was using the power of license to exclude British vessels from the emigration trade between Germany and North America, there would be a breach both of article 1 of the treaty and of clause 6 of the protocol. But the facts do not establish any such allegation; and it cannot be said that either the treaty or the protocol entitle British ships to licences whenever they desire them.

2. We answer the second question in the negative. In our opinion the proposed action would be inconsistent with article 25 of the treaty.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
August 31, 1927.*

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

[W 549/28/98/1928]

No. 3.

[December 22, 1927]

Minute by Sir C. Hurst.

Meaning of "arbitration" and scope of arbitration
treaties.

A MEMORANDUM has now to be prepared for submission to the League of Nations, giving the views of His Majesty's Government as to the measures which the League might take to promote treaties of arbitration, and to co-ordinate and generalise them.

For this purpose a study of existing arbitration treaties is recommended by the Security Commission of the League, showing the elements which are universal to them all—as upon these elements a model convention might be based—and also a study of the scheme which Dr. Nansen put forward at Geneva in 1927 for a draft optional convention for the obligatory arbitration of all disputes.

2. Before these studies can be undertaken, there is one point on which the policy of His Majesty's Government must be indicated. It is one on which, so far as I know, that policy has not yet been declared, and it is useless to prepare the necessary memorandum until it has been so declared.

3. What is the meaning which His Majesty's Government intend to attribute to the word "arbitration" in this connexion? Is it intended to be synonymous with "compulsory method of peaceful settlement" irrespective of the nature of the dispute? Or is it intended to apply only to disputes which lend themselves to decision by the application of a rule of law, disputes which are termed "justiciable," or, in the more accurate language of the Treaty of Locarno, disputes where the parties "se contestent réciproquement un droit"?

4. The above is much more than a question of words; it is one of first-class importance. The reason why it is so necessary to know exactly the sense to be given to the word "arbitration" is that the Covenant* uses the word with the later

* Article 13.—"The members of the League agree that, whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognise to be suitable for submission to arbitration or judicial settlement, and which cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject-matter to arbitration or judicial settlement."

"Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration or judicial settlement."

"For the consideration of any such dispute, the court to which the case is referred shall be the Permanent Court of International Justice, established in accordance with article 14, or any tribunal agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them."

"The members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award or decision, the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto."

meaning given above, and the protocol uses it with the earlier meaning. The protocol makes elaborate provision for the settlement by arbitration of disputes about which the Council, when handling a dispute under article 15 of the Covenant, fails to arrive at a unanimous report. The Council only deals with disputes under article 15 when they are not referred to arbitration (using the word in the Covenant sense). This may be for either of two reasons: (a) that the dispute does not lend itself to decision by the application of a rule of law, i.e., is not justiciable; (b) that the parties refuse to submit the case to arbitration even though the dispute is justiciable, but prefer to have it dealt with as a political issue by the Council. Consequently, a dispute can go to arbitration in the protocol sense of the word which does not, and cannot, go to arbitration in the Covenant sense of the word.

5. In the industrial and commercial life of every nation the term "arbitration" is habitually applied to the settlement of disputes which are not justiciable in their nature. A dispute as to the amount of the wages of the guards on the London and North-Eastern Railway, or as to the correct price of a piece of land, are not matters which can be settled by the application of a rule of law, but they readily lend themselves to the decision of an arbitrator.

Equally, in the international world there is no theoretical reason why a State should not agree to allow an arbitration tribunal to settle a question rather than go to war, even if the question is purely non-justiciable in character and arises out of the clash of political interests.

6. The importance of the question both from the point of view of security and of disarmament is this: If a dispute occurs between two States, it must be settled somehow. It is only very rarely that a dispute is of such a nature that it can drag on unsettled indefinitely. In general, some solution must be found for a dispute; if a solution by peaceful means is not found, it will be solved by war.

7. When a State refuses to pledge itself in advance to agree to submit a dispute to solution by pacific means, other States are entitled to assume that it reserves to itself the right to seek a solution of that dispute by war, and consequently, feeling that they may each be the State with whom solution may be sought by war, are entitled, in determining the extent to which their security would be imperilled by recourse to war in such an eventuality, to determine also the extent to which they can disarm.

8. Under the Covenant, resort to war is legitimate whenever the Council, acting under article 15, fails to arrive at a unanimous decision. In measuring the extent to which disarmament is possible for a member of the League, that member is bound to form its estimate of the extent to which its security would be imperilled if war ensued as the result of the Council failing to achieve unanimity in handling a dispute in which it was itself a party.

9. In the eyes of France, the possibility of the Council not being unanimous in a dispute in which France was a party is very great. The Council is a political body composed in the main of the representatives of continental States, and the representatives of continental States do not approach their duties in the Council in the spirit in which an Englishman approaches it. France has ever before her eyes the picture of 1914, and considers how the Council machine would have functioned in the crisis preceding the war. She sees that Germany would have backed Austria unhesitatingly in the latter's dispute with Serbia, and therefore the Council would necessarily have been divided; war would then have ensued without any violation of the provisions of the Covenant. If France wants confirmation of her views, she has only to think of Mussolini's instructions to the Italian member of the Council to support Hungary in any event in the Optants dispute at Geneva last September.

10. No French statesman in these circumstances dare regard the Covenant as it stands as a sufficient protection against war. Such interest as there may be in the Protocol of 1924 in France is wholly due to the feeling that to some extent it limited the cases in which war was legitimate under the Covenant; it did so by providing machinery for ensuring a peaceful settlement of a dispute about which the Council could not achieve a unanimous report, and the method was by sending the dispute in such a case to a committee of arbitrators.

11. The attitude of His Majesty's Government has been made clear as to the compulsory arbitration of justiciable disputes, cases which must come before a court and be settled by the application of a rule of law, but has never been defined on the question of compulsorily referring to some peaceful mode of settlement disputes about which the Council cannot achieve unanimity.

12. Wars do not arise out of justiciable disputes, and consequently a refusal to accept the system of compulsory arbitration for such disputes has no very profound effect on disarmament or security; but with disputes arising out of the clash of political interests it is a different matter. It is out of that class of disputes that wars arise, and if His Majesty's Government are determined to refuse to accept any compulsory system of solution by peaceful means for political disputes where the Council cannot agree, it will be very difficult for Geneva to make any progress in the direction of security or of disarmament.

13. British opposition to the protocol has been connected almost entirely with the "sanctions" provisions of that instrument, and has been occasioned by the fear that we should become involved in war with the United States of America through having to enforce the cessation of American trading with the recalcitrant State. It should be quite possible to separate this part of the protocol system from the part dealing with the machinery for ensuring a settlement by peaceful means of a dispute about which the Council cannot agree.

14. The suggestion that the continental nations should agree on some such system among themselves and that Great Britain should stand aloof is not attractive to the continental nations. Without doubt, the inhabitants of this country rightly regard themselves as the most pacific of peoples. Foreign nations take a somewhat different view. They regard Great Britain as a country which geographically, commercially, and even at times politically, lies across their path everywhere, and they regard disputes with Great Britain arising from the clash of political interests as by no means unlikely. The possibility of those disputes being solved by war if the Council cannot agree, and if Great Britain refuses to agree in advance to some method of peaceful solution, is not one which they can safely ignore.

15. Are His Majesty's Government prepared to accept some system under which, where the Council cannot agree, a political dispute would necessarily be submitted to some organ for peaceful settlement and war cease to be legitimate under the Covenant?

C. J. B. H.

December 19, 1927.

Opinion of the Attorney-General.

I think the memorandum to be prepared should deal with treaties of arbitration properly so called, not with all compulsory methods of peaceful settlement. In fact, so far as this country is concerned, arbitration treaties are usually confined to justiciable disputes.

In my opinion, the compulsory settlement of political disputes to an outside body for decision is the very thing which the Empire could not accept, for the reasons embodied in the recent decision of the Cabinet upon the recommendation of the Cabinet Committee, and it is no use recommending to other nations what we are not willing to do ourselves.

I think no harm would be done by the committee of the League of Nations exploring the peaceful settlement of political disputes; but I do not think that we can take a lead in advocating any form of compulsory settlement.

D. M. H.

Law Officers' Department,
December 22, 1927.

ROUMANIA.

[C 9737/4025/37/1927]

No. 4.

[December 1, 1927.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 13, 1927.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request the favour of a further opinion in the matter of the claim which is being preferred against His Majesty's Government by the United States Government on behalf of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey in respect of the destruction in 1916 of the oil properties of the Romano-Americana Company—a Roumanian corporation, the totality of the shares of which are owned by the Standard Oil Company.

Standard Oil Company's claim against His Majesty's Government in respect of the destruction of Roumanian oil wells in 1916.

2. In a note of the 16th February, 1925, the United States Government demanded arbitration of the claim, and your observations on this demand were sought in a letter from this Department of the 20th July, 1925. In your reply of the 4th November, 1925,* you stated that, in your opinion, His Majesty's Government would be justified (a) in refusing arbitration of the claim itself, and (b) in resisting, without recourse to arbitration, any effort of the United States Government to assert a right to interpose on behalf of a Roumanian corporation. You added, however, that, should it be the intention of the United States Government to assert a right to compensation in the American shareholders in the Roumanian corporation, as distinct from that corporation itself, that right might be a proper subject for arbitration. Copy of this correspondence is enclosed herewith for convenience of reference (Papers A and B).

3. The questions on which Sir Austen Chamberlain is now anxious to obtain your advice arise out of a further note (Paper F) from the United States Government of the 2nd May of the present year, in which they renew their demand for arbitration of the claim failing some indication of willingness on the part of His Majesty's Government to effect a cash settlement direct with the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. It is clear from this note that the United States Government now base their support of the Standard Oil Company mainly on a right to compensation which is alleged to be possessed by shareholders of a foreign corporation in cases where the property of the corporation has been destroyed by a third party to prevent its falling into the hands of an enemy. It will be necessary to revert to this allegation later in the present letter, but before doing so some mention must be made of the main developments that have occurred in this case during the past two years.

4. When this matter was referred to you in 1925, the Roumanian Government had taken no effective steps to implement the general assurances given in the Blackett-Titulesco Agreement of 1920, whereby they undertook to compensate the individual companies. At that time, the companies whose property had been destroyed in 1916 had received no compensation whatever. In October 1925, however, an agreement was reached between His Majesty's Government and the Roumanian Government for the funding of the Roumanian war debt to Great Britain, an essential feature of which was a subsidiary undertaking by Roumania to compensate the individual companies concerned and to negotiate direct with them the actual terms of payment. The terms of this agreement will be found in Paper C enclosed herewith. His Majesty's Government, for their part, undertook to cancel from the Roumanian war debt to Great Britain a sum equivalent to half the total assessed damage done to the Roumanian oil industry in 1916, thus carrying out their share of the pledges given to the Roumanian Government by the British and French (and Russian) Governments in December 1916 at the time when those Governments were pressing the Roumanian Government to destroy the oil properties. It will be noted that the convention of November 1926 provides for the payment of only half the total sums due to the companies, who will receive the remaining half when the Roumanian Government have made an arrangement with the French Government similar to that made with His Majesty's Government in October 1925 (see Paper C).

5. After protracted negotiations between the representatives of the large majority of interested companies on the one hand, and the Roumanian Government on the other, a convention was signed in November 1926 whereby a scale of annuities to be paid to the companies by the Roumanian Government was laid down. The terms of this convention will be found in Paper D. The first payments to the companies acceding to this convention were made in December 1926, and it should be noted in passing that all the companies affected—with the exception of the Standard Oil Company—have either definitely acceded to this convention or are in process of doing so. The Standard Oil Company have so far refused on the ground that the United States Government are claiming compensation on their behalf against His Majesty's Government and not the Roumanian Government.

6. After careful consideration had been given by the Departments of His Majesty's Government concerned to your report of the 4th November, 1925, a note was addressed to the United States Government on the 15th April, 1926, the text of which will be found in Paper E. In this note, the United States Government were again informed that His Majesty's Government could accept no responsibility whatever for the acts of destruction which were carried out with the approval and authority of the Roumanian Government and had received the ratification of that Government finally in the arrangement which had been reached for the compensation of the companies. His Majesty's Government also contested the right of the United States Government to interpose on behalf of a Roumanian corporation.

7. This note provoked a reply from the United States Government dated the 2nd May, 1927, the text of which will be found in Paper F, and it is in regard to the points raised in this note that Sir Austen Chamberlain requests the favour of your opinion. The note argues that from the evidence produced in the British courts in the Roumanian Consolidated Oil-fields case of 1920, His Majesty's Government were the actual destroyers of the property of the Romano-Americana, irrespective of the wishes of the Roumanian Government and in opposition to them, and that the ratification of the acts of destruction by the Roumanian Government in no way relieves His Majesty's Government, in their capacity of actual destroyers, from the obligation to compensate. It also sets out to prove by extensive quotations from authoritative sources that when, as in the present case, property is destroyed to prevent its falling into enemy hands, the destroyer (in this case His Majesty's Government) is burdened with an obligation to compensate the owners of the property. Further, the note asserts the claim that the United States Government have the right to intervene on behalf of the United States shareholders of the Romano-Americana Company, even though the latter is a Roumanian company. Lastly, the United States Government "insists" that if His Majesty's Government are not prepared to discuss the amount of indemnity to be paid, the question of the liability of His Majesty's Government in the premises and, if liable, the question of the amount of indemnity to be paid should be submitted to arbitration in accordance with the Arbitration Treaty of 1908 between His Majesty's Government and the United States Government.

8. The contentions raised in this note fall naturally into two categories: (a) questions regarding the facts of destruction, and (b) legal questions. Sir Austen Chamberlain considers that whatever may have been the facts regarding the destruction of the Roumanian Consolidated Oil-fields Company's property, they have no relation whatever to the facts of the destruction of the Romano-Americana's property. In the latter case, the destruction took place at a later date and in a different locality, and there is evidence to show that by the time Colonel Norton Griffiths took effective steps to destroy the Romano-Americana's property, he was fully authorised by the Roumanian executive authorities to do so. The text of a Roumanian army order of the 29th November, 1916 (new style), authorising the destruction of the wells, will be found attached to the record of the facts of destruction in Paper G, and it is to be noted that this army order was in the hands of the destroying commission—of which Colonel Norton Griffiths was no more than a member—some hours before the destruction of the property of the Romano-Americana Company was commenced. Sir Austen Chamberlain considers that whether or not it is eventually decided to refuse arbitration it is essential that His Majesty's Government, in order to maintain their fundamental argument that any claim for compensation lies against the Roumanian Government and not against His Majesty's Government, should (1) furnish the United States Government with a full statement of the facts of destruction, supported by all the material documents; (2) show that there is no analogy between the destruction of the Roumanian

Consolidated Oil-fields property and that of the Romano-Americana Company, and (3) refute the United States Government's contention that, notwithstanding the authorisation and ratification of the acts of destruction by the Roumanian Government, those acts remain primarily the acts of His Majesty's Government. A Departmental memorandum on the facts of destruction and the differences between the cases of the Consolidated Oil-fields and of the Romano-Americana Company (together with the comments of the Treasury solicitor thereon) will be found in Paper G, and Sir Austen Chamberlain would be glad to learn to what extent, in your view, it would be advisable to quote therefrom in replying to the United States note of the 2nd May, 1927. As regards the contention mentioned under (3) above, Sir Austen Chamberlain would invite your opinion on the following questions: Do the authorisation and ratification of the acts of destruction by the Roumanian Government make them legally the acts of the Roumanian Government? If so, what reliable authorities could be quoted to support this contention, and failing such authorities, how best can the contention of the United States Government in this connexion be refuted?

9. The next question concerns the arguments used in the United States Government's note as proof of the duty of a belligerent to compensate owners of property destroyed in order to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy. At the present stage this discussion appears somewhat irrelevant, and, subject to your views, I am to suggest that it is hardly necessary to follow the United States Government in their arguments on this point.

10. There still remains the assertion, now definitely made for the first time by the United States Government, that they possess the right to intervene on behalf of the United States shareholders of a Roumanian company. In this connection, your attention is invited to the terms of a judgment recently given by an arbitral court appointed by the Reparation Commission. The text of this judgment will be found in Paper H. The case is briefly as follows: In 1917, when a declaration of war by the United States Government against Germany grew imminent, the Standard Oil Company became anxious to avoid the confiscation by the German Government of nine of their oil tankers. They therefore arranged that their German subsidiary company—the Deutsche Amerikanische Petroleum-Gesellschaft (known as the D.A.P.G.)—should take them over. The vessels from that time on carried the German flag. Under the reparation clauses of the Treaty of Versailles they were handed over to the Reparation Commission by the German Government when the treaty came into force. The Standard Oil Company protested against this step on the ground that they owned practically all the shares of the Deutsche Amerikanische Petroleum-Gesellschaft, and that they enjoyed "beneficial ownership" of the tankers themselves. In other words, they claimed that the vessels were the property of the United States citizens, in the same way as they now claim that the property of the Romano-Americana Company is the property of United States citizens. A special arbitral court was set up to judge the case, and in August 1926 the court decided that, even though the Standard Oil Company did own the majority of the shares in the Deutsche Amerikanische Petroleum-Gesellschaft, this gave them neither beneficial nor other ownership of the property of the Deutsche Amerikanische Petroleum-Gesellschaft. The vessels were therefore handed over to the Reparation Commission.

11. I am to enquire whether, in view of this judgment, you still adhere to the view stated in your opinion of the 4th November, 1925 (Paper B), to the effect that a claim by the United States Government to assert a right in the shareholders of the Roumanian company to recover compensation might be a proper subject of arbitration and one which the United States Government could properly put forward, or whether you now consider that the judgment above mentioned has furnished His Majesty's Government with adequate legal grounds for enabling them, notwithstanding the Arbitration Treaty of 1908 between His Majesty's Government and the United States Government, finally and definitely to refuse the United States Government's demand for arbitration on the ground that the preliminary question whether the United States Government are entitled to intervene on behalf of the United States shareholders of a foreign company has already been decided in the negative. If you should still adhere to your view of the 4th November, 1925, Sir Austen Chamberlain would be glad to know whether it would nevertheless still be open to His Majesty's Government to refuse arbitration on other grounds, e.g., that the claimants have not exhausted their legal remedies in this country, or that the United States Government are not entitled to arbitration under the treaty of 1908 because the claim concerns also the interests of parties other than His Majesty's Government.

12. To sum up, the questions on which Sir Austen Chamberlain would desire to be furnished with your views are the following:—

- (1.) In replying to the United States note of the 2nd May, 1927, to what extent would it be advisable, in setting forth the facts of destruction of the property of the Romano-Americana Company, to quote from the memorandum in Paper G?
- (2.) Do the authorisation and ratification of the acts of destruction by the Roumanian Government make them legally the acts of the Roumanian Government. If so, what legal authorities could be quoted in support of this contention, and, failing such authorities, how best could the contention of the United States Government in this matter be refuted?
- (3.) Is it necessary in the present circumstances to reply to the arguments used in the United States note as proof of the duty of the belligerent to compensate the owners of property destroyed in order to prevent its falling into the hands of an enemy?
- (4.) In view of the recent judgment in the case of the claim of the Standard Oil Company to prevent the handing over to the Reparation Commission of certain "tankers" owned by the Deutsche Amerikanische Petroleum-Gesellschaft, do you still adhere to the view set forth in your opinion of the 4th November, 1925, to the effect that a claim by the United States Government to assert a right in the shareholders of a Roumanian company to recover compensation might be a proper subject of arbitration and one which the United States Government could properly put forward, or do you now consider that the judgment above mentioned has furnished His Majesty's Government with adequate legal grounds for enabling them, notwithstanding the Arbitration Treaty of 1908 between His Majesty's Government and the United States Government, finally and definitely to refuse the United States Government's demand for arbitration on the ground that the preliminary question whether the United States Government are entitled to intervene on behalf of the United States shareholders of a foreign company has already been decided in the negative?
- (5.) If the answer to No. (4) above is to the effect that the United States Government can properly demand arbitration, are there nevertheless still further reasons which His Majesty's Government could advance in order to refuse arbitration, such as the argument that the claimants have not exhausted their legal remedies in this country or that the United States Government are not entitled to arbitration under the treaty of 1908 because the claim concerns the interests of parties other than His Majesty's Government?

I have, &c.

ORME SARGENT.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Foreign Office to the Law Officers, July 20, 1925 (Confidential 13004, p. 33).
- (B.) Law Officers to the Foreign Office, November 4, 1925 (Confidential 13004, p. 36).
- (C.) Agreement for the funding of the Roumanian War Debt to the British Government (C 13397/4/62/1925).
- (D.) Convention between the interested Oil Companies and the Roumanian Government, November 1, 1926 (C 11659/49/37/1926).
- (E.) Sir Austen Chamberlain to United States Ambassador, April 15, 1926 (C 4421/1310/37/1926).
- (F.) United States Ambassador to Sir Austen Chamberlain, May 2, 1927 (C 4025/4025/37/1927).
- (G.) Foreign Office Memorandum, May 17, 1927 (C 5683/4025/37/1927), and Memorandum by the Treasury Solicitor, August 18, 1927 (C 7105/4025/37/1927).
- (H.) Reparation Commission, annex 2933 A, B and C (C 9293/257/18/1926).

Report.

1. In reply to the first question, we are of opinion that it is certainly desirable to state the facts as to the destruction of the Romano-Americana Company, and for that purpose to use such of the material set out in Paper G as appears to be of assistance. But the memorandum should be used with discretion. We do not think it desirable to stress any suggestion that Colonel Norton Griffiths was acting unconstitutionally or exceeding his powers even at the earlier period; but rather to emphasise that at the later period his action had been expressly confirmed and endorsed by the Roumanian Government and his colleagues on the commission. The statement should show that Colonel Norton Griffiths was throughout acting as a member of the Roumanian Commission, and therefore as the agent of the Roumanian Government, and the Roumanian Government orders of the 10th September, the 23rd November, the 24th November and the 26th November can be relied upon; and it should go on to show that, whatever doubt may have existed in the mind of some of his colleagues at the time of the first destruction at Targoviste, the orders of the 29th November and the 4th December confirmed his view as to the duties imposed by Roumania upon the commission, and that his action in the later destruction was with the complete concurrence of his Roumanian colleagues.

2. We answer the second question in the affirmative. There is no distinction in the doctrine of ratification between international and private municipal law; so far as we are aware no such distinction has ever been suggested. The authorities in support of the proposition that the act of a person purporting to act as agent for a principal can be ratified by that principal can be found in any text book, and are elementary both in American and in English law.

3. We answer the third question in the negative; but we think it would be as well to point out that the authorities relied on by the United States only purport to assert the right of owners of property destroyed to claim against the Government which actually destroyed the property, i.e., in the present case they would be authorities in favour of the view that the Romano-Americana Company had a right to compensation against Roumania, but not for the proposition that the shareholders in that company had a right to compensation against the United Kingdom.

4. The decision cited does not in any way conflict with our previous opinion of the 4th November, 1925. In the earlier part of that opinion we expressed our view that the right to claim compensation, if it existed, belonged to the Romano-Americana Company and not to its shareholders; the decision cited is an authority which confirms this view. In the second part of our opinion we were dealing with the right of the American Government under the Treaty of 1908 to claim arbitration; and we pointed out that under the terms of the treaty the United States Government would have a prima facie right to arbitrate upon the question as to whether or not their citizens as shareholders were entitled to have compensation for the destruction of property owned by the company. This is a question which is not affected by the decision of the Reparation Commission.

5. In our opinion, His Majesty's Government is entitled to refuse arbitration. This refusal can be based, first of all, on the ground that the interests of parties other than His Majesty's Government are concerned. France is concerned, since one of her nationals was a member of the commission equally with Colonel Norton Griffiths, and was equally responsible with him in the course which was taken. Roumania is also concerned, both because Roumania authorised and ratified the acts complained of and also because the property destroyed was that of a Roumanian company, which is the right claimant. Further, we notice that Roumania expressly objects to any interference in the matter as being an infringement of her sovereign rights, and this would seem an additional argument against the commencement of an arbitration between the United States and His Majesty's Government upon the question. Further, in our opinion, arbitration can be objected to on the ground that the legal remedies have not yet been exhausted. Apparently the claim purports to be a claim by the shareholders of a Roumanian company to recover the loss they have sustained by action taken against the property of that company. If that be the claim, even if (contrary to our view) it were well founded, its amount would obviously depend upon the extent to which the Roumanian company had been able to recover compensation for the injury done; and until that right had been asserted and pressed it cannot be said that the legal remedies of the parties concerned have been exhausted in the municipal courts. From the documents before us it appears quite clear that the Roumanian Government has actually offered compensation to the Romano-Americana Company for the injury sustained; and until and unless that company has obtained what it can by way of compensation no question can arise as to any further right by the shareholders for damages sustained by them. The principle that all legal remedies must be exhausted is a well recognised one; a discussion of it will be found in the British memorandum and counter-memorandum filed in the Danube case recently before the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague.

6. We would like to reiterate the caution contained in paragraph 6 of our previous opinion against any submission which would concede that the United States Government has any right to intervene, or that American shareholders of a Roumanian company have any right of claim for damage done to the property of the company.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
December 1, 1927.*

TURKEY.

[E 4430/72/44/1927]

No. 4^A.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[October 17, 1927.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Claim of the Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government in respect of the concession granted by Turkey in 1903. HEREWITH are sent:—

1. The Treaty of Peace with Turkey and other instruments. [Cmd. 1929. (Treaty 1681.)]
2. Convention made between the Imperial Ottoman Government and the Ottoman Anatolian Railway Company in 1903 and accompanying documents. (Parliamentary 4604.) [Cd. 5635.]
3. Case and opinion of the Law Officers in the matter of the claim by Messrs. Edwards and Henry. (Confidential 13206, pp. 7-10.)

Questions have arisen with regard to the position of the concession granted by the Turkish Government to the Bagdad Railway Company in territory part of which now belongs to Iraq, and it is possible that the company may allege that it is entitled to continue in enjoyment of the concession granted by the Turkish Government, or, alternatively, that it is entitled to compensation under the Treaty of Lausanne or otherwise. His Majesty's Government accordingly desire to be advised by the Law Officers in the matter.

By the convention known as the Bagdad Railway Convention of the 20th February, 1903 (Document 2), the Imperial Ottoman Government (herein referred to as the Turkish Government) granted a concession for the construction and working of an extension of the line from Konia to Bagdad and Basra. The concession was for ninety-nine years. The concession was actually granted to the Ottoman Anatolian Railway Company, but provision was made in the convention for the creation of a new company, which was to be an Ottoman Joint Stock Company and to be known as the Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company (herein referred to as the Bagdad Railway Company). The convention provided that when this company had been duly formed the rights granted by the concession were to be handed over to it, and as soon as this was done the Ottoman Anatolian Railway Company thereupon ceased to have any interest in the concession, except in so far as they might be the owners of shares in the Bagdad Railway Company.

The Bagdad Railway Company was duly formed in accordance with the convention as an Ottoman company. It has a share capital of £600,000, divided into 30,000 shares of £20 each, which are bearer shares.

The Law Officers are referred for details of the convention to the copy of that document which accompanies this case (Document 2, translation on p. 37), but its general effect may be summarised as follows:—

The company was to undertake to build a new line of railway from Konia to Basra and to maintain it during the period of the concession (article 16). Article 4 gives a time limit for the construction, viz., eight years, but this could be extended if loans were not forthcoming, or there was a war between European Powers. They were given the right to levy tolls and had to deposit a certain sum as guarantee for the performance of the provisions of the concession, which in certain events they might recover. The Turkish Government undertook to pay an annuity of 11,000 fr. per kilom. constructed, and a contract sum of 4,500 fr. per annum to the company during the period of the concession.

The Government reserved the right to withdraw the concession at any time on the payment of compensation (article 19).

The line was to be considered as divided into sections of 200 kilom. in length and by article 29, if the concessionnaires failed to carry out their obligations for each section within the appointed time, their concessionary rights became forfeit after due notice from the Turkish Government.

In 1908 the Turkish Government decided to extend the line for a further 840 kilom., which were to be completed within eight years, and a supplementary convention was framed for that purpose. Its text will be found at the end of the earlier convention (Document 2, p. 70), but, though for completeness reference is made to it, it does not seem to affect the questions now under consideration.

It will be observed that under article 35 of the convention, the Turkish Government undertook to issue certain bonds for the purpose of providing funds to meet the annuity above mentioned and that the Bagdad Company pledges the line to the bondholders as part of their security.

The bonds in question are outstanding and the interest upon them is in arrears, but it is understood that no steps have been taken by the bondholders to enforce their rights (if any) in respect of the pledge to them.

In the circumstances it is thought that for the purpose of the present case it is not necessary to consider especially the position of the bondholders, inasmuch as they cannot presumably have any greater rights than the company itself.

The Bagdad Railway Company duly commenced operations and before the outbreak of war the company had built in Iraq a railway line from Bagdad to Samarra, which is approximately 70 miles north of Bagdad. The Bagdad Railway Company, being a Turkish company, continued, it is understood, to carry on the construction of the railway up to the time when the territory of Iraq was occupied by the British military forces. During such military occupation a line from Basra to Bagdad was constructed by the British authorities, and the British authorities also extended the line (already constructed from Bagdad to Samarra) to Sharquat, which is approximately 100 miles north of Samarra, and it is understood that the route followed was almost identical with that contemplated in the Bagdad Railway Concession. Since the cessation of hostilities no steps have been taken by the Bagdad Railway Company under the concession in regard to the construction of any part of the railway in Iraq, though it is understood that certain steps have been taken with regard to that part of the railway which is situated in the territory which remains part of Turkey.

Under article 260 of the Treaty of Versailles, the Reparation Commission were entitled to demand that the German Government should become possessed of any rights or interests of German nationals in any concession operating in (among other countries) Turkey, and might require the German Government to transfer such rights to the commission. In fact, 13,510 shares were so acquired and transferred. The shares were apparently at that time under the control of the Deutsche Bank, who had given an option on them to the Ottoman Anatolian Railway Company. This option was to expire on the 31st December, 1926, but the Deutsche Bank has apparently attempted to extend the option, notwithstanding the fact that in the meanwhile the shares had been handed over to the Reparation Commission. The Reparation Commission have declined to recognise the extension of the option.

A protocol annexed to the Treaty of Lausanne (p. 203 of Document 1 herewith) makes special provision with regard to concessions granted by the Turkish Government.

Article 1 provides that concessionary contracts entered into before the 29th October, 1914, between the Turkish Government and nationals, including companies, of the contracting Powers other than Turkey were maintained. It is to be observed here that both the Anatolian and the Bagdad Railway Companies were Turkish companies, and article 1 does not, therefore, apply, unless it applies by virtue of article 10, which possibility is discussed later.

Article 9 of the same protocol (Document 1, p. 209) further provides that "in territories detached from Turkey under the Treaty of Peace signed this day the State which acquires the territory is fully subrogated as regards the rights and obligations of Turkey towards the nationals of the other contracting Powers, and companies in which the capital of the nationals of the said Powers is preponderant, who are beneficiaries under concessionary contracts entered into before the 29th October, 1914." The subrogation was to take effect as from the 30th October, 1918.

Several difficulties arise on the interpretation and construction of this article.

In the first place, it is not clear what is the material date for ascertaining whether the capital of the contracting Powers in the company owning the concession is preponderant. The alternatives appear to be (a) the 30th October, 1918, (b) the 23rd July, 1923, or (c) the 6th August, 1924.

The 30th October, 1918, is the date as on which subrogation takes place, and inasmuch as the subrogation is to be in respect of rights and obligations towards a certain class of persons on a certain date, it would appear reasonable to assume that the class must itself be ascertained on that date.

The 23rd July, 1923, is the date when the protocol was signed. As no date for ascertainment is mentioned in the article and there are no provisions in the protocol for ratification, such as are to be found in the treaty itself, it is arguable that the proper date is the date of signature. The 6th August, 1924, as the date of the ratification of the treaty, appears to be the only possible alternative if the other two dates are rejected.

Secondly, the question arises whether, on whatever may be the relevant date, the capital of nationals of contracting Powers other than Turkey was preponderant.

The distribution of share capital in July 1923 was approximately as follows:—

	Shares.
Reparation Commission	13,510
The Ottoman Bank (a company registered in Turkey but which held shares in the Bagdad Railway Company on behalf of a French group) ...	8,500
Anatolian Railway Company (a company registered in Turkey but whose chief shareholders were the Swiss Bank Corporation. The remaining shareholders are not known, but the Reparation Commission had a small holding)	3,000
Turkish Government	2,000
Banca Commerciale Italiana	480
Residue held by the Swiss and others	1,510

In October 1918 the distribution of shares was substantially the same, except that the shares mentioned in the above table as belonging to the Reparation Commission were held by German nationals.

In August 1924 the distribution was the same as in 1923, except that the Anglo-Turkish Trust Company (a British company with British shareholders) are understood to have obtained an option to purchase the Swiss Bank's interest in the Anatolian Railway.

If the 30th October, 1918, be the correct date, it is clear that the preponderant share of the capital of the company was not held by nationals of the contracting Powers other than Turkey, since on that date German nationals and the Turkish Government together held 16,510 shares.

If, however, one of the later dates be correct, it becomes material to consider whether the shares held by the Reparation Commission are to be regarded as held by an Allied national for the purposes of article 9. It is suggested that the distinction which is drawn in the article and in the treaty generally between "nationals" on the one hand and "contracting Powers" on the other hand is a clear indication that a holding of an inter-Allied commission such as a Reparation Commission cannot properly be regarded as a holding by a national for this purpose. So far as is known, no definition of "national" occurs in the treaty, but article 64, which is the first article in Part III, defines "Allied nationals" as including physical persons, companies and associations of the contracting Powers other than Turkish. It is submitted that associations ("associations et établissements") does not include such a body as the Reparation Commission.

If the Law Officers should be of opinion that the correct date for the purpose of article 9 is either 1923 or 1924, and also that the holding by the Reparation Commission is to be taken into account in determining whether on the relevant date the capital of nationals of the Allied Powers was preponderant, further questions will arise as to the exact position of the shares held by the Ottoman Bank; but as precise information on this point is difficult to obtain, it has been decided not to delay the present case. The only available information about the holding of this bank is that the shares are held by the bank on behalf of a French group, but the precise relationship between the bank and the French nationals concerned is not known. It may be that the bank are no more than custodians of the shares (which are bearer shares), and that the property is that of the French nationals concerned; and if this be so, there can be no doubt that these shares must be included amongst those held by Allied nationals. On the other hand, it may be that the legal ownership is that of the bank, and in this case a further question as to the nationality of the bank itself might conceivably arise, inasmuch as a large number of its shareholders are possibly Allied nationals.

Having regard, however, to the opinion expressed by the Law Officers* in connection with the claim of the Standard Oil Company in relation to damage suffered by the Romana Americana Oil Company, it is submitted that the nationality of the Ottoman Bank falls to be decided by the place of registration, and on this view it is clearly a Turkish company.

It may also be that the option obtained by the Anglo-Turkish Trust Company in 1924 affects the nationality of the holding of the Anatolian Railway Company, but for the purposes of the questions now submitted to the Law Officers this point is immaterial.

If it is decided that article 9 does apply, the consequence will be that article 1 will likewise apply, because by article 10 of the protocol it is specially provided that, with certain immaterial exceptions, the earlier articles of the protocol shall apply to such contracts and concessions as come under article 9.

The concession is therefore definitely maintained and the State which acquires the territory is fully subrogated as regards the rights and obligations of Turkey under the concession.

If article 9 applies, the further question arises whether there is any obligation on the part of His Majesty's Government or the Iraq Government to readapt the concession as provided by article 4. With regard to readaptation of concessions, there is a time limit fixed by article 5, the effect of which appears to be that in default of prior agreement the adaptation to be made shall be fixed by two experts to be mutually agreed within two months after the expiration of one year from the date of the ratification of the treaty. No steps have been taken by the Bagdad Company to claim the appointment of these experts, and it may therefore be that their rights have lapsed.

Two further references must be made to the protocol and the documents accompanying it before turning to the treaty itself.

There is attached to the protocol the following declaration (p. 211 of Document 1) by the Turkish delegates:—

"The undersigned, duly authorised, declare that the Turkish Government undertakes to apply the provisions of section 1 of the protocol of to-day's date with respect to certain concessions granted in the Ottoman Empire to Ottoman companies in which on the 1st August, 1914, the capital of nationals of the other Powers party to that protocol was preponderant.

"Done at Lausanne, the 24th July, 1923.

"M. ISMET.
"DR. RIZA NOUR.
"HASSAN."

And at p. 239 of the Treaty of Peace and other instruments (Document 1) will be found the following letter from Ismet Pasha to the president of the Third Committee:—

"Your Excellency,

"Lausanne, July 24, 1923.

"I have the honour to inform you that the concession contracts, as well as the subsequent agreements referring thereto, duly concluded before the 29th October, 1914, with the Ottoman Government in regard to the following undertakings are maintained: Anatolian Railway, Bagdad Railway, Mersina-Adana Railway, Oriental railways and Haidar-Pasha harbour. The clauses of the said contracts and agreements will, within a period of one year to be reckoned from the coming into force of the Treaty of Peace of to-day's date, be brought into conformity with the new economic conditions.

"I avail myself, &c.
"M. ISMET.

"To the president of the Third Committee of the Peace Conference."

* Confidential 13004, p. 36.

It is submitted that the declaration does not apply to the present concession, because in August 1914 the capital of the nationals of the other Powers party to the protocol was not preponderant, the Deutsche Bank being holders of 13,510 shares and the Turkish Government of 3,000.

With regard to Ismet Pasha's letter, it is submitted that the specific undertaking to maintain the Bagdad Railway concession can only relate to that part of the concession which related to the territories which remained part of Turkey after the treaty.

Moreover, if this were not so, it is submitted that the declaration and letter, being by their express terms merely unilateral, cannot be regarded as imposing any obligation upon the contracting Powers other than Turkey.

If article 9 of the protocol does not apply, certain further considerations arise. It may be that, although the concession does not come within the class of concessions which His Majesty's Government has expressly undertaken in the Concessions Protocol to maintain, yet by reason of general rules of international law, His Majesty's Government, or alternatively the Iraq Government, may, in fact, be under an obligation to maintain the concession. It is, however, suggested that the explicit recognition of certain concessions by the protocol involves the corollary that there was no obligation to maintain concessions not coming within those classes.

It is understood that no steps have been taken by His Majesty's Government or by the Iraq Government which could be relied on by the company as amounting to a recognition of the continued validity of the concession.

The questions which arise in connection with the possible application of general rules of international law have already been submitted to the Law Officers for their Opinion in relation to a claim advanced by Mr. W. M. Edwards and Major Henry in respect of rights to a concession granted by the Ottoman Government in 1911 for the exploitation of certain mineral resources of the Dead Sea. A copy of the Case* submitted to the Law Officers and of their Opinion* is sent herewith (Document 3).

The final question which appears to arise is whether the Bagdad Railway Company have any rights under article 65 of the Treaty of Lausanne (p. 53 of Document 1). This article defines three categories into which the concession might conceivably fall:—

- (a.) Immovable property situate in territory detached from the Ottoman Empire under the treaty (i) which, after having been subjected by the Ottoman Government to an exceptional war measure, was, at the date of the treaty, in the hands of the contracting Power exercising authority over the said territory, (ii) which can be identified, and (iii) which may have been liquidated by the contracting Power exercising authority over the said territory, is to be restored to its owner in its existing state.
- (b.) Property, rights, and interests, which still exist, and can be identified and which belong to Turkish nationals in territories detached from the Ottoman Empire under the treaty and which may have been subjected to liquidation or any other exceptional measure whatever on the part of the Allied Powers, are to be immediately restored to the owners in their existing state.
- (c.) Property rights, and interests, situate in territory detached from the Ottoman Empire under the Treaty which, after having been subjected by the Ottoman Government to an exceptional war measure, were, at the date of the treaty in the hands of the contracting Power exercising authority over the said territory and which can be identified, are to be restored to the owners in their existing state.

With regard to any claim under category (a), it is understood that certain land situate near Bagdad has, in fact, been restored to the company, but not the property and land relating to the 70 odd miles of track between Bagdad and Samarra laid by the company before the war in Iraq, and this still remains the property of His Majesty's Government, but the management of it has been handed over to the Iraq Government.

With regard to any other claims to restoration of its rights by the company, it is submitted that the article can only relate to rights in rem, such as mortgages and proprietary rights generally, and cannot include rights of a merely contractual nature. Even if this is not so, it is difficult to see how the concession, as such, can be said to be properly situate in territory detached from Turkey or to be in the hands of a contracting Power. It is submitted that the fact that special provision has been made in the protocol for concessionary contracts, and in articles 73, 74 and 75 of the treaty (pp. 59-61 of Document 1) for contracts other than concessionary contracts, strongly supports this view. It has been suggested that, inasmuch as the company has not put in a claim before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal under article 65, its rights (if any) have lapsed. This view, however, appears to be open to considerable doubt, as the jurisdiction of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal under the article is limited to the settlement of disputes as to identity of property and the consideration of the adequacy of amounts received in cases where the property in question has been liquidated. There does not appear to be much prospect of any dispute on either of these two points, and the obligation to restore the property if identifiable and in the hands of the contracting Power seems to be independent of any question of the jurisdiction of the tribunal.

* Confidential 13206, pp. 7-10.

The Law Officers are accordingly requested to advise:—

- (1.) In interpreting article 9 of the Concessions Protocol, which date is to be taken as the correct date for ascertaining the preponderant interest in the capital of a company holding a concessionary contract.
- (2.) Whether the 13,510 shares held by the Reparation Commission are to be regarded as the capital of nationals of the Allied Powers.
- (3.) If the answer to (2) be in the affirmative, and as the result of further enquiry into the position of the shares held by the Ottoman Bank it is found that the capital of nationals of Allied Powers was preponderant and, therefore, that the concession falls within article 9 of the protocol, whether the company are entitled to demand readaptation of the concession under articles 4 and 5 of that protocol; and, if not, whether the company are entitled to insist on the concession being maintained in its present form.
- (4.) Whether, under article 65 of the Treaty of Lausanne, the company are entitled to demand the restoration to them (a) of any immovable property physically situate in Iraq which formerly belonged to them, and/or (b) any rights which, but for the war, they would have been entitled to exercise in Iraq by virtue of their concession.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. We are of opinion that, for the purposes of article 9 of the Concessions Protocol, the correct date for ascertaining the preponderant interest in the capital of a company holding a concessionary contract is the 30th October, 1918. The subrogation is to have effect as from that date, and it seems to us necessarily to follow that the companies affected by the subrogation should be ascertained on the same date.

2. In view of our answer to the first question this question is not relevant to the present case, but we are of opinion—

- (a.) That the shares in question cannot be regarded as the capital of nationals of the Allied Powers.
- (b.) That the national character of the Ottoman Bank is conclusively determined by the fact that it is a Turkish company.

3. This question does not arise, having regard to the foregoing answers.

4. We are of opinion that under article 65 of the Treaty of Lausanne the company are entitled to the restoration of any immovable property physically situate in Iraq which formerly belonged to the company, but that the provisions of article 65 do not apply to rights which were conferred on the company by the concession but have not been exercised.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
October 17, 1927.*

1928

This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

(13565)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1928.

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

CHINA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Nov. 19, 1928	Legality of seizure at Singapore of arms and explosives ex German steamship "Deike Rickmers" intended for China. Effect of China Arms Embargo Agreement	1
GENERAL.
2	Law Officers .. [Treasury Solicitor]	Jan. 31, 1928	Claim of Ottoman Tobacco Régie to rights in Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan	6
3	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	May 24, 1928	Conditions of contract for harbour works at Haifa ..	14
4	Law Officers .. [Treasury Solicitor]	May 24, 1928	Possible conflict between British nationality and Palestine citizenship	16
5	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Nov. 12, 1928	Conditions of contract for harbour works at Haifa ..	19
IRAQ.
6	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Aug. 3, 1928	Interpretation of certain articles in Anglo-Iraq Military Agreement of March 25, 1924	21
TURKEY.
7	Law Officers .. [Treasury Solicitor]	Dec. 10, 1928	Claim of Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government in respect of concession granted to the company by the Turkish Government in 1903	23

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1928.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

AGR—CLA.

A.

Agreement: China Arms Embargo. See also Arms. ditto; not a general international convention, 5.
" Anglo-Iraq Military. See Treaty.
" Anglo-Iraq Financial. See Treaty.
Allegiance: oath of, to Government of Palestine; nature of, 16, 19.
Arbitration. See also Court of International Justice. of claims covered by Treaty of Lausanne, 13.
" at request of French Government of claim against His Majesty's Government of Turkish company with preponderant French capital, 7, 12, 13.
" of Ottoman Tobacco Régie's claim against His Majesty's Government, 6-13.
Arms: seizure at Singapore in transit for China from Germany, 1-5.
" ditto; as to application of China Arms Embargo Agreement, 1, 5.
" Embargo Agreement (China); not a general international convention, 5.
" export from Germany prohibited by Treaty of Versailles, 5.
" Saint-Germain Convention. See Treaty.
" Geneva Convention. See Treaty.
Army: British, in Iraq; period of retention, 21-23.

B.

Bagdad Railway Company: claim against His Majesty's Government, 23, 24.
Barcelona Convention: seizure of goods in transit contrary to, 5.

C.

Cargo: in transit on foreign vessels; general principle against interference with, by territorial authorities, 3-5.
" ditto; ditto; whether interference is justified in case of arms and munitions, 4, 5.
China: Arms Embargo Agreement, 1, 5.
" arms for, seized at Singapore in transit, 1-5.
Claim: of Ottoman Tobacco Régie against His Majesty's Government, 6-13.
" right of foreign State to take up claim of company which is not a national of that State, 7, 12, 13.
" under Concessions Protocol of Treaty of Lausanne, 1923, of company in which allied nationals preponderate, 7, 11-13.

4994 [19745]

CLA—CRO.

C.—(cont.).

Claim: period covered by Treaty of Lausanne, 13.
" of Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government, 23, 24.
" of Standard Oil Company against His Majesty's Government, 7, 12.
Company: right of French Government under Concessions Protocol of Treaty of Lausanne to support claim against His Majesty's Government of Turkish company with preponderant French holding, 7, 12, 13.
" right of foreign State to support claim of company not a national of that State, 7, 12, 13.
Compensation: suppression of Ottoman Tobacco Régie's monopoly in Palestine, Iraq and Transjordan, 6-13.
" ditto; basis for calculating damages, 13.
Concession: of Ottoman Tobacco Régie in Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan, 7-10.
" Concessions Protocol of Treaty of Lausanne. See Treaty of Peace (Turkey).
" of Bagdad Railway Company; rights under article 65 of Treaty of Lausanne, 23, 24.
Contract: of Ottoman Tobacco Régie—a concessionary contract within meaning of article 9 of Concessions Protocol of Treaty of Lausanne, 10, 11, 13.
" for harbour works at Haifa, 14, 15, 19, 20.
Convention. See Treaty.
Court of International Justice: right to bring claim of Ottoman Tobacco Régie before, without consent of His Majesty's Government, 12, 13.
" ditto; right of French Government to bring claim of Turkish company against His Majesty's Government before, 12, 13.
" ditto; ditto; position of Turkish Government, Turkey not being member of League of Nations, 12.
Crown: service under; service under Palestine Government equivalent to, for purpose of British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, 18, 19.

a

(iv)

DEL-MAN.

D.

"Deike Rickmers," steamship, 1.
 Diplomatic representations: concerning interference by territorial authorities with foreign merchant vessels in transit, 3.
 " " right of French Government under protocol of Treaty of Lausanne to intervene in claim of Turkish company against His Majesty's Government, 13.
 Discrimination: in inviting tenders for works in Palestine, 14, 15, 19, 20.
 Dynamit Actien-Gesellschaft, 1.

E.

Embargo. See Agreement.
 Explosives: seizure in Straits Settlements in transit to China, 1-5.
 " not covered by Saint-Germain Arms Convention of 1919, 4.
 " position under Geneva Arms Convention of 1925, 4.
 Export: definition of, in Straits Settlements ordinance, 2, 5.
 " whether goods in transit are covered, 2, 5.

G.

Garrison. See Army.

H.

Haifa: contract for harbour works, 14, 15, 19, 20.

I.

Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company: claim against His Majesty's Government, 23, 24.
 Iraq: British garrison in; period of retention, 21-23.
 " Military Agreement with Great Britain. See Treaty.
 " Financial Agreement with Great Britain. See Treaty.
 " rights of Bagdad Railway Company in, under their railway concession, 23, 24.

J.

Jurisdiction: over foreign merchant vessel in port, 2-5.
 " over cargo of foreign vessel in transit, 2-5.
 " ditto: effect of general international conventions respecting freedom of communications and transit, 3-5.
 Justice: Court of International. See Court.

L.

Law: Municipal; vessel in foreign port subject to, 2-5.

M.

Mandate: for Palestine; meaning of "discrimination" under article 18 as applied to tenders, 14, 15, 19, 20.
 Palestine, nature of citizenship contemplated by article 7 of, 17.

MAV-STR.

M.—(cont.)

Mavrommatis, 12.
 Military. See Army; Treaty.
 Monopoly: in Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan of Ottoman Tobacco Régie; suppression of, 6-13.
Muller v. Baldwin, 2.

N.

Nationality: effect on British, of acquisition by British subject of Palestinian citizenship under Palestine Citizenship Order in Council, 16-19.
 Naturalisation: acquisition by British subject of Palestine citizenship by; effect on British status, 16-19.
 " under section 2 of British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914; alien in Palestine Government service may qualify for, 18, 19.
 " service in Palestine Government as equivalent to "service of the Crown" for purpose of section 2 of British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, 18, 19.
 Nobel's Explosives Company (Limited), 1.

O.

Oath: of allegiance. See Allegiance.
 Order in Council: Palestine citizenship. See Nationality.
 Ottoman Tobacco Régie: claim respecting monopoly in Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan, 6-13.

P.

Palestine: tenders for works; limitation to British firms, 14, 15, 19, 20.
 " not a "foreign State" within meaning of section 13 of British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, 17-19.
 " Citizenship Order in Council, 1925. See Nationality.
 " oath of allegiance to Government of, nature of, 16, 19.
 " service in Government of, equivalent to "service of the Crown," 18, 19.
 Property: rights of Bagdad Railway Company in Iraq; application of article 65 of Treaty of Lausanne, 23, 24.
 Protection: British diplomatic and consular, of Palestine citizens, 17.

R.

Railway: rights of Bagdad Railway Company in Iraq, 23, 24.
Reg. v. Keyn, 5.

S.

Société de la Régie cointéressée des Tabacs de l'Empire ottoman. See Ottoman Tobacco Régie.
 Standard Oil Company: claim against His Majesty's Government respecting destruction of property belonging to Roumanian company, 7, 12.
 Straits Settlements: seizure of arms in transit to China, 1-5.
 " Arms and Explosives Ordinance; definition of "export" in, 2, 5.

(v)

TEN-TRE.

T.

Tenders: for works in Palestine; limitation to British firms, 14, 15, 19, 20.
 Tobacco. See Ottoman Tobacco Régie.
 Transit: freedom of, under Barcelona Convention and Statute, 3-5.
 " whether term "export" includes, 2, 5.
 " cargoes on foreign vessel in; jurisdiction of territorial authorities, 2-5.
 Treaty. See also Barcelona Convention.
 " Anglo-Iraq Financial Agreement, 1924; bearing of article 3 on retention of garrison in Iraq, 22.
 " Anglo-Iraq Military Agreement, 1924; period of operation, 23.
 " China Arms Embargo Agreement not a general international convention as contemplated by article 5 of Barcelona Statute on Freedom of Transit, 5.
 " Convention and Statute on International Regulation of Maritime Ports, 3, 4.
 " Geneva Arms Convention, 1925; position of explosives under, 4.
 " ditto: control of arms and explosives in transit not covered by, 4.
 " Saint-Germain Arms Convention of 1919; explosives not covered by, 4.
 " ditto: control of arms in transit not covered by, 4.
 " of Lausanne. See Treaty of Peace (Turkey).

TRE-WIL.

T.—(cont.)

Treaty of Peace (Germany): article 170 and Germany's obligation to prevent export of arms, 5.
 " (Turkey): period covered by, in respect of claims, 13.
 " article 9 of Concessions Protocol; application to claim against His Majesty's Government of Turkish society with preponderant French capital, 10-13.
 " article 65; application to Bagdad Railway Company's concessionary rights in Iraq, 23, 24.

V.

Vessel: jurisdiction over foreign, in port, 2-5.

W.

Wilson v. Robertson, 2.

1928

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1928.

CHINA.

[F 6606/20/10/1928]

No. 1.

[Colonial Office.]

[November 19, 1928.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, October 29, 1928.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to inform you that he has had under consideration the question of the legality of the seizure at Singapore in February 1927 of certain arms and explosives on board the German steamship "Deike Rickmers," belonging to the German company the Dynamit Actien-Gesellschaft. These seizures were effected under the authority of a proclamation of the 16th April, 1925, issued under Straits Settlements Ordinance No. 136 (Arms and Explosives). This proclamation was issued in order to carry out the obligations assumed by His Majesty's Government under the China Arms Embargo Agreement of 1919. Copies of the proclamation and the ordinance and of the agreement are enclosed. It will be observed that the categories of arms and munitions, to which they respectively apply, are defined in the proclamation in terms which are somewhat different from those of the agreement, and in particular that the proclamation mentions "explosives" without any qualification with regard to their intended use, whereas the agreement is confined to arms and munitions of war and material destined exclusively for their manufacture. It is not therefore certain whether the consignment of explosives (as distinct from the arms) seized at Singapore is covered by the terms of the Arms Embargo Agreement. The German Government is not a party to the Embargo Agreement, being already debarred from exporting arms and munitions under the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles.

Legality of seizure at Singapore of arms and explosives on board German steamship "Deike Rickmers" intended for China. Effect of China Arms Embargo Agreement.

2. Nobel's Explosives Company (Limited), acting on behalf of the Dynamit Actien-Gesellschaft, have now contested the legality of the seizures of these explosives in a letter dated the 16th May, of which a copy is enclosed. It will be seen that the grounds on which their claim is based are, first, that the explosives in question were industrial in character, and therefore there was no justification for their seizure from the point of view of the military situation in China, and, secondly, that the seizure was effected under the authority of "a very old police law in Singapore," which, however, cannot be regarded as applicable, since, under the legal advice given to the German firm, goods in transit through Singapore cannot be classed as exports. The company further contend that it is against established international practice to regard goods in transit as being exported from the intermediary territory concerned, and refer to the Barcelona Convention of 1921.

3. The first of these contentions is irrelevant to the question whether the seizure was or was not legal, and in any case it could hardly be maintained in view of the fact that Mr. Amery has information that the explosives in question were intended for Chang Tsung-chang, at that time the Military Governor of Shantung. Apart from that, the definition of explosives adopted in the proclamation of the 16th April, 1925, is so wide as to include explosives of all kinds, whether prima facie industrial in character or not.

4. The second contention is, however, a matter for serious consideration. The reference to the "very old police law in Singapore" is inaccurate, since, as previously stated, the proclamation under which the seizure was effected was dated the 16th April, 1925, but the question whether goods in transit through Singapore can be classified as exports is more difficult and appears to depend upon the interpretation of Straits Settlements Ordinance No. 136 (Arms and Explosives).

5. Section 4 of Ordinance No. 136 empowers the Governor to prohibit by proclamation the exportation of explosives from the colony. "Export" is defined in the ordinance as meaning "to take or cause to be taken out of the colony either by land or sea." Under section 30 of the same ordinance if any vessel about to leave any port in the colony is suspected of having on board any article, the exportation of which is prohibited, it may be searched, and if any article which is prohibited to be exported is found on board, it shall be presumed that that article was attempted to be exported, and the article may be removed from the ship.

6. Mr. Amery has consulted the Governor of the Straits Settlements in the matter and has received the following telegraphic reply:—

"The line of defence would be that the word 'export' had in the proclamation the same meaning as that assigned to it in Ordinance No. 136. It, therefore, covers goods in transit. Even if that meaning is inconsistent with established international practice, the proclamation must, nevertheless, be so construed. The proclamation in effect prohibits the passage through the colony of goods to which it applies. There is nothing in that prohibition which conflicts with the principle of international law."

7. Mr. Amery is advised, however, that there is some doubt whether this argument could be sustained in a Court of Law. The question appears to turn on what is the proper meaning of the expression "export from the colony." The ordinary meaning clearly is to take out of the colony something which was previously in the colony. Can it be said to include something which comes into the territorial waters of the colony in a ship which merely touches at a port? In other words, can it be said that a consignor in Germany who consigns explosives to China exports those explosives from the Straits Settlements merely because the ship in which they were loaded touches at a port in the Straits Settlements?

8. That the answer to these questions might well be in the negative is suggested by a reported case which appears to be in point (Wilson v. Robertson, 24 L.J.Q.B. 185). Under the statute of George III a duty was imposed on all goods imported or exported from Berwick Harbour. The harbour extended from Berwick Bridge down the Tweed to the sea, but not above the bridge. Goods were brought up the river in a sea-going vessel which, having first used the rings and posts in the harbour in order to moor the vessel temporarily, passed through Berwick Bridge and unloaded the cargo about 200 yards beyond the limits of the harbour. It was held that these goods were not imported into the harbour. It has, however, been suggested that in arriving at this decision the Court had in mind the purpose of the tolls. Mr. Amery further understands that the definition of "export" in Ordinance No. 136 is very similar to that given in the English case of Muller v. Baldwin (1874), 9 L.R.Q.B. 457.

9. There remains the contention that the seizure of these explosives was contrary to international law or practice. While the validity of the municipal law of the Straits Settlements is not affected by the international law, and it would, therefore, not be possible to plead that the ordinance was ultra vires by reason of the Barcelona Convention of 1921 or any other treaty, it is possible that the German Government might make the matter the subject of diplomatic representations.

10. I am to enclose a letter dated the 24th August from the Custom House, London, in which this matter is discussed.

11. For the purpose of considering the validity of the seizure from the point of view of international law and custom, the legality of the seizure under the municipal law of Singapore must be assumed. In principle, therefore, it would seem to be strictly irrelevant upon this aspect of the case whether or not the municipal ordinances or proclamations, under which the seizure was made, apply to these consignments in transit as exports from the Colony, though it may be somewhat unfortunate, in view of the provisions of certain international conventions, to which further reference will be made hereafter, that the jurisdiction thus exercised over goods passing in transit through a port should be based upon a treatment of such goods as exports. The question, therefore, seems to be whether it is contrary to any international convention or to any rule of international law and custom that the authorities of a British port should interfere with foreign-owned cargo consigned from one foreign port to another in the holds of a foreign vessel calling at such British port in the ordinary course of a voyage between two foreign ports, there being no reason whatever to suspect that such cargo would be removed from the vessel while she was in the British port or constituted any danger to the port while so lying in the holds.

12. The general rule of international law is no doubt that a merchant vessel entering a foreign port becomes subject to the plenary jurisdiction of the territorial sovereign of such port and to the municipal law in force therein, whatever it may be. This principle is of general application, save in so far as in the interests of freedom of international commerce exceptions thereto have been accepted in international conventions or in international law or custom. The answer to the question would seem, therefore, to depend on whether there is any provision of any international convention or any rule of international law or custom limiting the exercise of the jurisdiction of the local authorities over foreign-owned cargoes in transit on a foreign merchant vessel which applies to the facts of this case.

13. The rights of jurisdiction of the territorial authorities over foreign vessels calling at a port are fully treated in the following works: Moore, "Digest of International Law," vol. 2, pp. 269-363; Hall, "International Law" (eighth edition), pp. 253-256; Hyde, "International Law," p. 393. Reference may also be made to the "British Year Book of International Law, 1920-1921," at p. 45 (and article on merchantmen in territorial waters by A. H. Charteris). Such authority as there is, however, relates principally to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction over offences committed in foreign ships, and there seems to be no clear authority for the existence of any precise rule of international law or custom limiting the jurisdiction of the territorial authorities over the cargoes of foreign vessels in transit. It might be argued from this fact that, since the existence of such an exception to the general rule must be proved affirmatively, the absence of authority on the matter shows that no such exceptional limitation exists.

14. On the other hand, it may be contended that there is a principle of a somewhat undefined nature by which interference with foreign merchant vessels in transit should be limited to matters which affect the interests of the territorial authorities, and that this principle is generally followed in practice and has been recognised in certain international conventions referred to hereafter, concluded in pursuance of article 23 (e) of the Covenant of the League of Nations relating to the freedom of communications and transit. It is further worth notice that any new departure on the part of any State involving or alleged to involve any interference with foreign merchant vessels, which appears to infringe this general principle, has generally been the subject of diplomatic representations. Examples of such representations in somewhat analogous cases may be found quoted in Moore, loc. cit., at p. 282 et seq., with reference to the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876 (Plimsoll Act), United States against Great Britain; and at pp. 305-310 with reference to the United States Shipping Act of 1884 (relating to the engagement of seamen in United States ports), France against United States; and on pp. 326-333 with reference to a Colombian statute relating to the custody of ship's papers, United States against Colombia; and p. 339 relating to certain regulations in force in Singapore relating to the participation of the territorial authorities in all engagements and discharges of seamen, United States against Great Britain.

While it seems doubtful whether any such principle can be said at present to be sufficiently definite to constitute a rule of international law, it may be contended that departures from it would be contrary to international custom and undesirable, and that the seizure of these consignments of arms and explosives in the circumstances of this case constituted an interference with the foreign merchant vessels in transit which could not be justified by the proper interests of the territorial authorities.

15. This principle, limiting the interference with foreign merchant vessels and their cargoes in transit to cases where such interference is justified in the proper interests of the territorial authorities, appears to some extent to be recognised in two general international conventions, namely, the Convention and Statute on Freedom of Transit signed at Barcelona on the 20th April, 1921, and the Convention and Statute of the International Regulation of Maritime Ports signed at Geneva on the 9th December, 1923. Both these conventions, of which copies are attached, have been ratified by Germany and by His Majesty and apply to the port of Singapore. It seems to be clear that under article 1 of the Statute on Freedom of Transit these consignments of arms and explosives must be regarded as traffic in transit, and under article 2 it is provided that the measures to be taken by the contracting parties for regulating traffic across their territory shall facilitate free transit, and that transit will be allowed in accordance with the customary conditions and reserves across their territorial waters. Apart from this, the provisions of the convention appear to be irrelevant to the present issue, since they are directed to prohibiting discrimination on the grounds of nationality. The Convention and Statute on the International Regulation of Maritime Ports is also made, as the preamble records, to ensure the freedom of communications by guaranteeing in maritime ports and for the purposes of international trade equality of treatment. It does not appear, however, to contain any specific provision which is strictly relevant to the case under consideration.

CHINA.

16. Assuming, however, the existence in international custom or by virtue of convention of a general principle against the interference with cargoes in transit on foreign vessels, it might be contended in defence of the action taken in this case that the international traffic in arms and munitions is in an exceptional position, and that interference with such cargoes is justifiable in cases when it would not be right in the case of cargoes of an ordinary character. Such a contention might be based on the ground that the desirability of the strict control of traffic in arms and munitions has been recognised in article 23 (d) of the Covenant of the League of Nations, and in two international conventions on traffic in arms which have been signed. These conventions are the Saint-Germain Convention of 1919 and the Geneva Convention of 1925, of which copies are attached. Neither convention has, however, at present secured the number of ratifications necessary to bring it into force. The Saint-Germain Convention was signed by Great Britain and was made binding on Germany by virtue of article 126 of the Treaty of Versailles. The Geneva Convention has been signed by both Germany and Great Britain. Both these conventions provide for the control of exports of arms and munitions, but neither can (with the exception of certain provisions applicable only in certain regions known as "special zones" and which are irrelevant because China is not included in the special zones) contain any provisions for the control of arms in transit. The Saint-Germain Convention does not, however, apply to explosives. The Geneva Convention places explosives in category 5 and provides, in article 10, that materials covered by categories 4 and 5 may be exported without formalities or retention, except in the case of exports to the special zones. Neither of these conventions could be regarded, therefore, as containing any specific justification for the action taken in this case. On the other hand, it may be argued that these conventions and the Covenant of the League are evidence of a general international recognition of the fact that international traffic in arms and munitions is on a footing distinct from international commerce in other kinds of goods in general and requires special control and supervision in the general interests of peace. It might be contended, therefore, that there is at least as strong international authority for treating cargoes of arms and munitions as an exception as there is for the existence of any general rule forbidding the interference with goods in transit on foreign vessels. In this connexion attention may be called to the fact that the following provision is to be found both in the Statutes for the Freedom of Transit and for the International Régime of Maritime Ports (see articles 5 and 17 of these statutes respectively): "Nothing in this Statute shall affect the measures which one of the contracting parties may feel called upon to take in pursuance of general international conventions to which it is a party or which may be concluded hereafter, particularly conventions concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations relating to transit, export or import of particular kinds of articles such as opium or other dangerous drugs, arms or the product of fisheries . . ." and it may be argued that these provisions contain an express recognition of the exceptional nature of traffic in arms in transit. On the other hand, however, this argument is weakened by the fact that it only provides for measures taken in pursuance of general international conventions and that neither of the international conventions relating to arms traffic has come into force, and, further, that neither of these conventions contains any provisions (except in the special zones) providing for the existence of any control upon goods in transit. It is doubtful whether the China Arms Embargo Agreement can be described as a general international convention.

17. The questions upon which Mr. Amery desires your opinion are as follows:—

- (1.) Whether the seizure of the arms and explosives in question was legal under the municipal law of the Straits Settlements.
- (2.) If so, whether, assuming that the seizure was legal under that law, the German Government could claim that it constituted a violation of any international convention or any rule of international law or custom.

I am, &c.

WALTER D. ELLIS.

CHINA.

List of Enclosures.

Straits Settlements Proclamation, April 16, 1925.
Straits Settlements Ordinance No. 136 (Arms and Explosives).
China Arms Embargo Agreement, 1919.
Nobel's Explosives Company (Limited) to Colonial Office, May 16, 1928.
Customs to Colonial Office, August 24, 1928.
Convention and Statute on Freedom of Transit, Barcelona, April 20, 1921.
Convention and Statute on International Régime of Maritime Ports, Geneva, December 9, 1923.
Saint-Germain Convention for Control of Trade in Arms and Ammunition, September 10, 1919.
Geneva Convention for Supervision of Trade in Arms and Ammunition, June 17, 1925.

Report.

(1.) We are of opinion that the seizure of the arms and explosives in question was legal under the municipal law of the Straits Settlements. The definition of the word "export" contained in Ordinance No. 136 is sufficiently wide to cover the case of a vessel having arms and explosives on board and leaving the port, which must for this purpose be regarded as being part of the Colony. Section 6 (2) and section 30 support this view of the meaning of the word "export," and section 30 (3) renders lawful the seizure of articles whose exportation is prohibited by the proclamation.

(2.) Upon the assumption that the seizure was legal under the municipal law of the Colony, no objection can in our opinion be taken to the seizure on the ground of international law unless (a) the ship in question ought not according to international law to be regarded as subject, while within the port, to the municipal law; or (b) the municipal law is, in so far as it authorised the seizure of these goods, a violation of international law either as contained in express conventions or as generally recognised. With regard to (a), we cannot say that any rules of law which by agreement amongst nations in their dealings with each other have been generally accepted exempt a vessel in a foreign port from the municipal law. It has been stated in the English Courts that "a foreign merchant vessel going into the port of a foreign State subjects herself to the ordinary law of the place during the period of her commorancy there" (see per Sir Robert Phillimore: Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. at p. 82). A more restricted view is that States may exercise, besides such jurisdiction as is necessary for their safety and for the fulfilment of their international duties, such ordinary jurisdiction as is necessary to maintain customs and other public regulations within their territorial waters (Hall: "International Law," eighth edition, p. 258). In the light of these statements the vessel in question could not, in our opinion, on the basis of any rule of international law, claim immunity from the municipal law of the colony.

With regard to (b), we are of opinion that the seizure of the goods in question on the ground of destination to China was contrary to the international agreement contained in the Barcelona Convention and Statute. These goods were "traffic in transit" (statute, articles 1 and 2). The statute forbids any distinction which is based on destination, so as to prevent free transit (article 2). If it had been possible to rely on any general international convention of the character mentioned in article 5, the provisions of article 2 would not be effective in the present case. We are, however, informed that there is no such general international convention. We do not think the China Arms Embargo Agreement can be so regarded.

If, therefore, the Barcelona Convention stood alone, it would follow that diplomatic objection might properly be taken by the German Government to the seizure of these goods in transit. It is, however, in our opinion, not open to Germany to put forward the Barcelona Convention in this connexion. By article 170 of the Treaty of Versailles the export to foreign countries of arms, munitions and war material of every kind is prohibited, and Germany thereby came under an obligation to make illegal and to prevent the export by German nationals of arms and explosives. Any diplomatic protest against the seizure would therefore, in our opinion, be wholly lacking in substance and, in the circumstances of this case, without justification on any ground of international law or custom.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
November 19, 1928.

GENERAL.

[E 552/121/65/1928]

No. 2.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[January 31, 1928.]

Instructions to the Law Officers to Advise.

Herewith are sent—

- (1.) Correspondence passing between the Foreign Office and the French Embassy, including the claim.
- (2.) Volume 5 of Young's "Corps de Droit."
- (3.) Copy of the convention granted by the Ottoman Government to the Société on the 4th August, 1913.
- (4.) Copy of the protocol attached to the convention of the 4th August, 1913.
- (5.) Agreement made between the Turkish Government and the Société, dated the 23rd June, 1923.
- (6.) Copy of the procès-verbal (meeting of the Ottoman Public Debt Council), 27th August 1924.
- (7.) Procès-verbaux of the Ottoman Public Debt contained in Memorandum No. 53 of the 23rd March, 1925.
- (8.) Opinion of Count Ostrorog.
- (9.) Notes exchanged between French and British delegates at Lausanne Conference.
- (10.) Extract from a note made by B. H. Bourdillon, C.M.G., Counsellor to his Excellency the High Commissioner for Iraq.
- (11.) Treaty of Lausanne, 1923. Translations of documents 1 (claim only), 3, 4 and 5 are included and marked 1A, 3A, 4A and 5A respectively.
- (12.) Mandat for Palestine.
- (13.) Decision of the Council of, and undertaking given by His Majesty's Government to, the League of Nations on the 24th September, 1924.
- (14.) Treaty with King Feisal (October 1922).

Claim of Ottoman
Tobacco Régie
to rights in Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan.

LA Société de la Régie cointéressée des Tabacs de l'Empire ottoman, an Ottoman company (herein referred to as the Society), whose shareholders are now principally of French nationality, has presented, through the French Government, a claim against His Majesty's Government in respect of certain action taken by the Governments of Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan in regard to the tobacco monopoly for which the Society had, prior to the late war, obtained a concession from the Ottoman Government.

His Majesty's Government is concerned in the matter owing to its mandatory responsibility for the territories in question.

The claim is placed at £ T. 342,244 (gold), but it has not yet been examined in detail, as certain preliminary questions of law arise which may render such examination unnecessary.

The legal ground on which the claim is based is obscure.

The Law Officers will remember, from the case* recently submitted to them in connexion with the Bagdad Railway Company's claim, that article 9 of the Concessions Protocol of the Treaty of Lausanne, 1923 (p. 209 of document 11), provides that in territories detached from Turkey under that treaty the State acquiring the territory is fully subrogated as regards the rights and obligations of Turkey towards companies in which the capital of nationals of the Allied Powers is preponderant who are beneficiaries under concessionary contracts entered into before the 29th October, 1914, with the Ottoman Government. The subrogation is to take effect as from the 30th October, 1918.

By an interchange of notes between His Majesty's Government and the French Government, the texts of which are sent herewith (document 9), those two Governments agreed not to avail themselves as regards each other of section 11 of the protocol (which includes article 9), and they mutually recognised that each might have the power during one year from the coming into force of the treaty in territory in which it exercised authority as mandatory to acquire by repurchase concessions for the public services of which Turkish companies in which the interests of their nationals were preponderant were the beneficiaries.

* Confidential 13403, p. 12.

The effect of the interchange of notes is not altogether clear. It certainly recognised the right of the Government concerned, within one year from the coming into force of the treaty, to repurchase concessions existing in the territory concerned, but nothing is said as to the position if that option is not used. The notes, as will be seen, begin with the agreement not to take advantage of the provisions of the protocol, and it may therefore be that, failing repurchase, the concessionnaires are left without remedy. This, however, seems to be a harsh result, and the true effect of these notes may therefore be merely that, if the Government concerned does not avail itself of the option to repurchase, the concessionnaires' rights are those indicated in the protocol, and this is the view taken of the notes by certain Government representatives who took part in the negotiations.

It is necessary also to take into consideration the correspondence which passed between His Majesty's Government and the French Government in 1922, and subsequently, copies of which accompany this case (document 1). Particular attention is drawn to the letter of the 15th January, 1926, from the Foreign Office to the French Ambassador, in which the latter is requested to ask the Society to formulate their claim, and reference is made to the possibility of arbitration.

There is one other preliminary point which should, it is thought, be mentioned before proceeding to consider the merits of the claim.

In the recent case of the Standard Oil Company's claim in connexion with the destruction of the property belonging to a Roumanian company, the Law Officers will remember that objection was raised to the Government of the United States pressing the claim on the ground that the nationality of the true claimant, a Roumanian company, was in no way affected by the fact that the shareholders were almost entirely American, and that it was not in accordance with the usages of international law for a foreign Government to take up a claim on behalf of any company which was not a national of that country.

The Society is a Turkish company, and, although the shareholders may be entirely of French nationality, it may create an unfortunate precedent to permit the French Government to take the matter to arbitration.

It is true that article 9 of the protocol departs in some degree from the strict rule concerning the nationality of companies by referring to companies in which the capital of allied nationals is preponderant. The question whether a company is entitled to benefit under the protocol does therefore depend on the nationality of its shareholders; but the further question of the Government who is, under international usage, entitled to press the claim of the company must, it is suggested, be separately considered.

The circumstances relating to the Society's concession are as follows:—

By article 8, 1°, (a) of the Decree of Mouharrem, 1881 (a Turkish decree), (p. 69 and following of document 2) the revenue of the tobacco monopoly in the Ottoman Empire was ceded with other revenues to the Council of the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt (hereinafter called the "Debt Council") for the service of the Debt. By article 9 of the same decree the Ottoman Government declared itself not opposed in principle to arrangements being made for exploiting the monopoly by means of a Régie, subject to agreement between the Government and the Debt Council and subject to a division of profits between the Government, the bondholders and the exploiting Society.

In 1883 the Society obtained a concession from the Government for the administration of the monopoly in the Turkish Empire for thirty years (p. 192 et seq. of document 2), in return for which the Society undertook to pay a royalty of £ T. 750,000 annually to the Debt Council, and to be subject to the general control of the Debt Council (see articles 7 and 8 of the Cahier des Charges, pp. 194 and 195 of document 2). The net profits earned by the Society were to be divided on a sliding scale between the Government, the Debt Council and the Society.

In 1913, as the 1883 concession was nearing expiration, negotiations were opened between the Ottoman Government, the Debt Council and the Society for a renewal of the concession. It is understood that the monopoly was not popular in the empire, but that the Government, having become embarrassed financially, desired to obtain a loan from the Society in return for an extension of the monopoly. A convention was eventually drawn up between these three parties renewing the concession for fifteen years from the 15th April, 1914 (see document 3 herewith).

The convention states in terms that it contains the conditions under which the tobacco monopoly is to be exercised from the 2nd (15th) April, 1914. The terms of the earlier concession have therefore to a great extent been superseded except in so far as the national character of the Society was determined by them.

While the whole of this convention is of importance as constituting the concession on which the claim is based, reference may in particular be made to the following articles:—

Article 1.—The exploitation of the tobacco monopoly in the Turkish Empire is conceded to the company for the duration of fifteen years, dating from the 2nd (15th) April, 1914. The company pledges itself to continue the exploitation, without any break, in accordance with the stipulations of the present convention, when made definite by the promulgation of the Imperial Decree.

Article 6, which provides for payment to the Debt Council of an annual royalty of £ T. 800,000, "payable even if there are no profits," and for division of net profits between the Government, the Debt and the Society.

Following these there is a curious provision, which may prove of particular importance, as follows:—

In view of the fact that the fixed royalty and the amounts of surpluses indicated above apply to the territory of the Turkish Empire existing at the end of the Turkish year 1326 (1909).

That since that date the Treaty of Lausanne of the 18th October, 1912,* has made modifications to the above-mentioned territory and that current negotiations may result in others.

That the exploitation of the monopoly may become impossible in other parts of the territory.

These different eventualities may give rise to the following modifications in conformity with the examples on the attached list.

(Then follow provisions for the reduction of the royalty in proportion to loss of detached territories.)

It may be a question whether these provisions will apply to any events which result in the exploitation of the monopoly becoming impossible in other parts of the Ottoman Empire (e.g., the Treaty of Lausanne, 1923), or whether they refer only to the then current negotiations, but in considering this point it is material to note that a similar provision occurred in the 1883 convention (see p. 195 of document 2):—

Article 7.—As long as the debt indicated in the Decree of the 28th Mouharrem, 1299, and in the Supplementary Decree, 1321, is not entirely repaid, the Debt (Council) shall have the same rights of control as the Government.

Article 8.—The concession may be renewed by agreement to be drawn up between the interested parties two years or less before the date of expiry. . . . If, for any reason whatever, the tobacco monopoly should cease to be exploited by any company or individual, the monopoly shall revert to the Debt (Council).

Article 10.—The monopoly, the exploitation of which is conceded to the company by virtue of article 1, consists essentially in the right to manufacture and to sell, to the exclusion of all others, in the form of snuff, tobacco for smoking, for chewing, cigars and cigarettes within the extents of the Ottoman Empire, the tobacco produced in the Empire. As an exception, the vilayets of Bagdad, Basra and Mosul, &c., shall continue to enjoy provisionally the special régime now in force in each of these regions. The exploitation of the monopoly comprises, besides the collection of sundry receipts, viz. (inter alia):—

1°. The taxes in force at the present time in the regions enjoying the special régime indicated in the preceding paragraph.

(In the territory now known as Iraq, therefore, the only rights granted to the Society are those of collecting certain taxes.)

* This was a treaty between Italy and Turkey following on the war in Tripoli.

Article 14.—No alteration shall be made in any article in the present convention, except by agreement between the Government, the Debt (Council) and the company.

To the 1913 concession was attached a protocol which in Part 1 prescribed the conditions under which the new convention might be annulled by the company in the event of the Turkish Parliament affecting any modification or failing to confirm the concession before a certain date (see document 3), and in Part 2 set forth the conditions under which the Society made a loan of £ T. 1,500,000 to the Ottoman Government.

It was expressly provided in article 2 of the (1913) convention that the statutory modifications should be presented for their sanction to the Sublime Porte, but this sanction was never obtained, and although a provisional law was drawn up which was submitted to Parliament, no decision was taken upon it. Nevertheless, the Society did not demand its annulment under the protocol, but continued to operate, and Parliament is stated to have annually voted the money required to pay off the loan.

It had been suggested that in consequence of the failure to obtain the approval of the Ottoman Parliament the concession never became operative in law. As this question depended on Turkish law, an opinion on the matter was obtained from Count Ostrogrog, a copy of which is sent herewith (document 8). It will be seen that he takes the view that as the Society was allowed to operate on the basis of the 1913 convention, it cannot now be contended that the absence of confirmation by the Ottoman Parliament can be advanced as a reason for declining to admit the Society's claim to compensation.

The facts relating to the suppression of the monopoly can be shortly stated:—

In March 1915 British forces having entered Mesopotamia, the operations of the Society were suspended in the Basra Vilayet. In 1917 suspension occurred in the Bagdad Vilayet, and in 1918 in the remainder of Iraq. Suspension of the monopoly occurred in Palestine in April 1921, and in Transjordan on the 19th June, 1921, although in these territories the Society was permitted to carry on the commercial business of manufacturing and selling tobacco.

In 1922 the French Government were pressing on behalf of the Society for compensation in respect of the damage caused by the suppression of the monopoly, and the then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs informed the French Ambassador that "His Majesty's Government continue to hold the view that, failing an amicable settlement, the claim of the Ottoman Tobacco Régie should be submitted to arbitration" (p. 3 of document 1).

It may be noted that the Society at about this time also lost its monopoly in Turkey. Some time prior to January 1923 the Turkish Government deprived the Society of its revenues and set up a director of their own at Angora to administer the monopoly, though the Society was apparently permitted to carry on ordinary business in tobacco in Turkey itself.

On the 13th June, 1923, an agreement (document 5 herewith) was entered into between the Society and the Turkish Government (to which the Debt Council was not a party), by article 8 of which the Society agreed, "de son propre gré," to concede to the Government the right to suppress the administration of the monopoly before its natural expiration in April 1929, on the Government giving three months' notice (such notice to expire at the end of a financial year), neither party was to have any claim to indemnity or compensation, but the conditions of termination were (with certain exceptions) to be those provided for in the 1913 protocol. The Government were relieved from paying additional 25 per cent. prices on inventory stock taken over. It was provided that the Government might repay to the Society the amount of its capital, namely, 40 million francs, and itself take over all the rights, obligations and, upon payment of the inventory price, the stock of the Society in the Régie, with the exception of the reserves, which belonged to the shareholders.

During the six months before the signing of this agreement negotiations for the Treaty of Lausanne had been in progress. An extract from a note made by Mr. B. H. Bourdillon (Counsellor to His Excellency the High Commissioner for Iraq) as to the effect of these negotiations on the June 1923 agreement is sent herewith for the Law Officers' information (document 10).

The Society's version of the circumstances in which the 1923 agreement was signed is given in Part III of Annex III to their claim (pp. 18-23 of document 1).

The Debt Council were apparently not consulted at all in the 1923 agreement and subsequently entered a protest against it.

[19745]

On the 24th July, 1923, the Treaty of Lausanne and the concession protocol attached to it were signed.

On the 6th August, 1924, the treaty came into force and in the same month notice was given by the Ottoman Government to the Society in accordance with the 1923 agreement, and the cancellation date was fixed as the 1st March, 1925. In pursuance of the terms of cancellation the Ottoman Government has paid to the Society their full capital of 40 million francs, and from the 1st March, 1925, the control and sale of tobacco has been administered by the Ottoman Government direct.

In the same month the Debt Council sent a formal protest to the Society telling them that they, the Debt Council, did not recognise the 1923 agreement (document 6).

In August 1925 the French Embassy again took the matter up with the Foreign Office. In January 1926 the Foreign Office invited the Society to submit a specific claim which would be considered (p. 7 of document 1).

In February 1926 the Society accordingly furnished a detailed claim to the Foreign Office through the French Ambassador (pp. 9-23 of document 1).

The Society has now gone into liquidation and the liquidator is represented by an English firm of solicitors, Messrs. Johnson, Jecks and Colclough, who have written to the Colonial Office pressing for a settlement of their clients' claim (pp. 27-29 of document 1).

These being the facts relating to the matter, it remains to examine the basis of the company's claim and any possible objections which can be adduced to repel it.

The Society have formulated their claim in the following terms:—

- (1.) It considers that the rights accruing to it under the concession granted to it by the convention of 1913 are juridically incontestable.
- (2.) By the action of the British authorities it has been deprived of the monopoly of exploitation granted to it by this convention.

This dispossession gives it the right to an indemnity equal to the profits which it may legitimately have expected from its exploitation during the whole period during which it has been and will remain dispossessed.

In order to succeed in their claim the Society must, therefore, first establish that the rights accruing to it under the convention of 1913 remain incontestable. This contention involves questions of the construction of the Treaty of Lausanne and attendant documents including the Concessions Protocol and also general considerations of international law.

If article 9 of the protocol governs the position the State acquiring the territory is subrogated as from the 30th October, 1918, to the rights and obligations of Turkey towards the Society.

In order that it may apply, two conditions must be fulfilled:—

- (1.) There must be "a concessionary contract entered into before the 29th October, 1914, with the Ottoman Government or any local Ottoman authority."

It is to be observed that the tobacco monopoly in Turkey was originally granted to the Debt Council by the Decree of Mouharrem. That decree expressly recognised that the monopoly might be exploited by a company provided that the terms of any arrangement to that end were approved by the Ottoman Government and included a provision for a share of the profits being paid to them.

When the agreement of 1883 was originally made and when it was renewed in 1913 the Debt Council had already acquired indefeasible rights to the tobacco monopoly, and the Ottoman Government were not therefore in a position to create the monopoly or to grant away to anyone else the rights already conferred on the Debt Council. They were necessary parties to the agreements because they had to approve its terms and also because the exemptions from taxation, &c., to which the Debt Council itself was entitled could not be passed on to the Society except by the action of the Ottoman Government.

There is therefore, it is submitted, room for doubt whether the convention of 1913 is a concessionary contract made with the Ottoman Government within the meaning of article 9, since the monopoly conferred on the concessionnaires is derived from the Debt Council and not directly from the Government itself.

The Law Officers will remember that the treaty makes special provision for the partition of the Ottoman Public Debt. Territories detached from Turkey are made liable to contribute annuities of amounts to be ascertained, but these amounts being paid, they are free to dispose of their revenues in such manner as they think fit, and are no longer bound by those provisions of the Decree of Mouharrem which allocated certain revenues (including the tobacco monopoly) to the service of the Debt Council.

The paramount rights of the Debt Council under the Decree of Mouharrem having thus disappeared, can it be said the Concessions Protocol has the effect of keeping alive the derivative rights conferred on the Society by the agreement of 1913?

The fact that in the territory now known as Iraq the only rights acquired by the Society were to collect certain taxes makes it, it is submitted, all the more difficult to regard this convention as a concessionary contract within the meaning of article 9.

(2.) The next question is whether at the material date under the protocol, which the Law Officers will remember they have advised* in connexion with the case of the Bagdad Railway Company is the 30th October, 1918, the capital of nationals of the Allied Powers was preponderant in the Society. This is a question of fact, concerning which enquiries have been made, but it has not been possible to obtain positive information. It seems probable, however, that the only way to obtain definite information is to approach the Society direct, but it is not proposed to adopt this course at this stage unless the Law Officers so desire. If it was not, there is presumably no claim under article 9.

The question will then arise whether it is now open to His Majesty's Government to rely on this contention, having regard to the course the negotiations in the matter have taken, as set out in the correspondence between the Foreign Office and the French Government, to which reference has already been made.

If neither of the two suggestions already made is sufficient in the opinion of the Law Officers to dispose of the claim, there are certain further matters which require consideration.

It will be remembered that article 6 of the convention of 1913 refers to the possibility that the exploitation of the monopoly may become impossible in other parts of the territory and provides for the modifications to be made in this event in the financial provisions of the convention.

It has been suggested that, as the instrument under which the Society are claiming expressly recognises the possibility of further territory being detached, the rights of the Society are those conferred by the conventions, to have the financial provisions adjusted, and the sole obligation of Turkey (to which the succession States are subrogated) was to acquiesce in that financial adjustment.

The difficulty of accepting this view, apart from any question whether that article refers to anything beyond the negotiations then pending (but in this connexion the Law Officers will recollect that there was a similar provision in the 1883 convention), is that before the clause operates at all the exploitation of the monopoly must have become impossible in parts of the territory.

If article 9 of the Concessions Protocol does apply to the concession, then, so far from becoming impossible, the exploitation of the monopoly should apparently be permitted to continue, although it has been suggested that if the word "impossible" referred solely to the detachment of territory, the position might be different.

It has been suggested that the agreement of June 1923 between the Society and the Turkish Government relating to the termination of the monopoly and the subsequent termination thereof by notice on repayment of the whole of the capital of the Society affords a ground for contending that there is no valid concession within the meaning of article 9 of the protocol.

There appear, however, to be considerable difficulties in the way of sustaining this contention and the subsidiary suggestion that, even if the notice given by the Turkish Government did not in itself have the effect of putting an end to the rights of the Society in the detached territories, it is now open to the Governments of the territories concerned themselves to give notice under that agreement. While it is true that the States in question have been subrogated to Turkey's rights and liabilities and are thus prima facie entitled to take advantage of any agreement relating to the concession which Turkey may have made with the Society, that subrogation takes place as from the 30th October, 1918, a date long before the agreement of 1923, and it may therefore be difficult to contend that the succession States can be affected by or take advantage of anything Turkey may have done in relation to a concession after that date.

The Society will no doubt contend that the agreement of 1923 related only to that part of the monopoly which was being operated in territory remaining Turkish, on the ground that it must have been obvious to everyone by that time that Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan would be detached.

The fact that the Society succeeded in obtaining repayment of the whole of their capital may possess significance, but it is capable of explanation on the ground that it afforded a convenient method of liquidating the damages due to the Society for breach of the concession by Turkey in respect of the territory remaining Turkish.

* Confidential 13403, p. 17.

If it becomes necessary to admit the application of article 9 of the protocol, and that the State acquiring the particular territory is subrogated as from the 30th October, 1918, to the rights and liabilities of the Ottoman Government, the next point to consider is whether the basis suggested by the Society for assessing the compensation is correct.

The claim is based on the assumption that the claimants are entitled to compensation equal to the increased profits which it might have expected to gain had the exploitation continued during the whole period during which it has been and will remain dispossessed (see pages 11 to 17A of document 1).

Article 9 of the protocol does not in terms give any right to compensation, but only to have the concession maintained with such adaptations under article 4 as may be necessary to put it into conformity with new economic conditions.

"Where no request for readaptation has been made by a concessionnaire under article 4, it is by no means clear what his remedy is should the Government of the territory concerned decline to permit him to enjoy his rights under his original concession. By article 9 of the protocol that Government is subrogated to the liabilities of the Turkish Government under the existing concession, but the protocol is not a part of the municipal law of the territories in question and therefore he would appear to have no remedy in their municipal courts.

It remains to be considered whether, without the consent of His Majesty's Government, the Society could bring a claim before the Permanent Court of International Justice at the Hague. Assuming that article 9 of the protocol applies, the present claim of the Society bears some analogy to that of Mavrommatis (with which the Attorney-General will be familiar) inasmuch as the monopoly of the Society has been totally suppressed by the Governments concerned. It may therefore be that action could similarly be taken under article 11 of the mandate in the case of Palestine (document 12 herewith). In the case of Iraq, the position is somewhat different. By paragraph V of the Decision of the Council of the League of Nations of September 1924 (see document 13 sent herewith) any dispute between His Majesty's Government and another member of the League as to whether the provisions of the Iraq Treaty or of that decision are being fulfilled in Iraq, or as to their interpretation or application, if not settled by negotiation, is to be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice. By article 10 of the Iraq Treaty (document 14 herewith) the parties agreed to conclude separate agreements to secure the execution of any treaties, agreements, &c., which His Britannic Majesty is under obligation to see carried out in respect of Iraq. These engagements by a note of the 26th March, 1924, were interpreted as including the Treaty of Lausanne.

In view of the fact that the Society is a Turkish company, it would seem that the proper Government to take up the case diplomatically is the Turkish Government. But the Turkish Government, since Turkey is not a member of the League, could claim no right under article 11 of the Palestine Mandate or under paragraph V of the League Council's decision of September 1924 to bring a claim by the Society before the Permanent Court of International Justice. On the other hand, to concede the right of the French Government to take up the Society's claim might create a precedent which would be embarrassing in connexion with the Standard Oil Company's claim already mentioned. It is, however, possible that, having regard to the wording of the protocol and to the reference therein to questions of the nationality of the preponderant capital in societies, a distinction can be drawn between the present case and the claim such as that which the United States Government are attempting to press in the Roumanian case.

The Law Officers are accordingly requested to advise:—

1. Whether, in view of the correspondence which has passed between their respective representatives, His Majesty's Government is committed to the claim of the Society being referred to arbitration at the request of the French Government.
2. If so, whether any special reservation should be made in consenting so to refer the matter, having regard to the fact that the Society is a Turkish company.
3. Whether the French Government are entitled (under articles 11 and 26 of the Palestine Mandate and under the decision of the League of Nations of the 24th September, 1924, as regards Iraq) to take the claim to the International Court of Justice (without the consent of His Majesty's Government).

4. Whether His Majesty's Government has in law a good defence to the claim of the Society to compensation for the suppression of their monopoly, and, if so, on what grounds.
5. Whether, having regard to all the circumstances, an attempt should be made to settle the claim, and, if so, whether the basis of claims put forward by the Society is correct, or, if not, what is the true basis on which the compensation (if any) should be calculated.
6. Generally on the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. We observe in the claim enclosed in the French Embassy letter of the 22nd February, 1926, that the dates of the grievances set out, so far as relates to Mesopotamia, begin as far back as March 1915 (Appendix 2, p. 11), but when the claim is quantified (Appendix 2, p. 15) it appears that the claim really begins in November 1918. The distinction is material, since, in our view, claims in respect of acts done before October 1918 would not fall within the provisions of the Treaty of Lausanne, and therefore the special provisions of the 9th article of the protocol with regard to companies in which Allied nationals preponderate would not apply. We do not think that the correspondence with the French Government would necessarily pledge His Majesty's Government to submit to arbitration any claim whatever its nature; but, in our opinion, it would be very difficult for His Majesty's Government, in view of that correspondence, to refuse arbitration altogether; and we think that it may fairly be said that claims limited to the period covered by the Treaty of Lausanne must be submitted to arbitration.

2. We think it should be made clear that the reason why we recognise the right of the French Government to intervene lies in the express provisions of the protocol; and that we can only agree to arbitration on the basis that it is shown that French capital preponderated in the Society on the 30th October, 1918.

3. In view of the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Mavrommatis case, we think it would probably be held that the French Government was entitled to take the claim of the Society before that court without the consent of His Majesty's Government.

4. The contract is a Turkish contract; its validity and meaning and remedies for any breach are matters of Turkish law; we can only deal with this and the following question on the basis that English and Turkish law would interpret the contract alike and would give the same remedies if its provisions were not observed. Count Ostrorog has already advised that by Turkish law the contract was a valid one. In our opinion it is a concessionary contract within the meaning of article 9 of the protocol of the Treaty of Lausanne. It is true that the administration of the Ottoman Debt had a charge on the tobacco monopoly and that the concession could not, therefore, be granted without their consent; but in our opinion this does not render it any the less a concessionary contract when it was granted with that consent. We do not think that the provisions with regard to territories detached from the Turkish Empire have any effect as regards territories detached under the express provisions of the Treaty of Lausanne. Admittedly the Governments of those territories in Iraq, Palestine and Transjordan, have not observed the terms of the concession; and, therefore, there seems prima facie to be a good claim for compensation against these Governments.

5. In these circumstances, it would seem wisest to attempt a settlement of the claim. The claim being for damages would rightly be estimated upon the basis of the profits actually lost to the Society by reason of their being deprived of the rights granted to them under the concession. We do not think that the agreement with the Turkish Government of June 1923 covers territory which de facto ceased to be within Turkish territory at the conclusion of the war; this again, however, is a question of construction under Turkish law. Whether the figures put forward by the Society can be justified is a matter for expert criticism; but assuming that they are justified, the basis does not seem to us an unreasonable one.

DOUGLAS MCGAREL HOGG.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

Law Officers' Department,
January 31, 1928.

1928

14

GENERAL.

[E 2988/322/65/1928]

No. 3.

[Colonial Office]

[May 24, 1928.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, May 9, 1928.

Conditions of contract for harbour works at Haifa.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to state that, in connexion with the construction of certain harbour works at Haifa out of funds provided by the recent Palestine Loan which was issued under a guarantee by His Majesty's Government, a question has arisen with reference to article 18 of the Palestine Mandate.

2. In March 1926, Mr. Amery sought your opinion on the question whether it would be consistent with the terms of the mandates for Palestine and Tanganyika territory to attach to the British guarantee of the loan to be raised by the Government of those territories formal conditions, (a) that any contracts for the works of development to be paid for out of the loans should be given to British and not to foreign firms, and (b) that all non-local expenditure should be in the United Kingdom. You reported, on the 16th March, 1926, that in your opinion the attachment of such conditions to the guarantee by His Majesty's Government of the Palestine Loan would not be inconsistent with article 18 of the mandate.

3. No formal conditions of the nature in question were in fact attached to the guarantee of the Palestine Loan, but in the course of the debate on the Bill at the committee stage, recorded in pp. 2369 to 2378 of vol. 200 of the "Official Record of Parliamentary Debates," Mr. Amery stated that he was quite ready to give the most explicit assurance that, broadly speaking, with the exception of some particular small item or some unforeseeable circumstances of urgency, the whole orders for the executing of the public works to be paid for out of the loan, apart from the work to be done locally, would be placed in this country. Mr. Amery went on to say that this ensued quite naturally and automatically from the provisions already in force. The orders for the works would be issued through the Crown Agents for the Colonies, and the Crown Agents have standing instructions not to give any order outside this country, or outside the British Empire, without special reference to the Secretary of State.

4. The construction of the harbour at Haifa was one of the principal objects to be charged against the funds raised by the loan; and, though at the time when Mr. Amery made the above statement in the House of Commons no decision had been taken as to the manner in which this work should be carried out, it was evidently assumed that these works would be constructed by a staff employed for the purpose by the Palestine Government, and, as he stated on that occasion, that their orders would be issued through the Crown Agents for the Colonies. The Government of Palestine now desires, however, to arrange for the works to be constructed by contract, and will probably wish that tenders for the construction of these works should be invited from selected British firms only, the tenders to provide that the contractor shall use British or Palestinian materials as far as possible. The question therefore arises whether such a course would be contrary to article 18 of the Palestine Mandate. I am to enclose a copy of correspondence with the Foreign Office in which the position has been discussed. I am also to enclose a copy of the Palestine Mandate. Article 18, it will be seen, provides that the Mandatory shall see that there is no discrimination in Palestine against the nationals of any State Member of the League of Nations as compared with those of the Mandatory or of any foreign State in matters of commerce, or the exercising of industries or against goods originating in any of those States. It may be thought that this is a provision against a general discrimination by legislation or other Government action, and is not designed to prevent the Government of Palestine spending its money as it considers best. Otherwise, unless in placing all contracts the Government of Palestine issued world-wide invitations to tender and accepted the lowest suitable tender irrespective of the nationality of the tenderer, it would apparently be guilty of some discrimination within the terms of the article whenever it accepted a tender of a national of the Mandatory or of a State not a member of the League which was not the lowest suitable tender.

5. I am, therefore, to request that Mr. Amery may be favoured with your advice on the following points:—

Whether, having regard to article 18 of the Palestine Mandate, His Majesty's Government is under an obligation to prevent the Government of Palestine from proceeding in connexion with the contract for the harbour works at Haifa in any of the following ways:—

GENERAL.

15

- 1.—(a.) Placing the contract with a British firm without inviting any tenders.
- (b.) Inviting tenders from British firms alone.
- (c.) Issuing a world-wide invitation to tender and then accepting a British offer if it appears suitable, although not the lowest suitable tender.
- 2.—Making it a term of any contract that the contractor shall use British or Palestinian materials as far as possible.

I am, &c.

J. E. SHUCKBURGH.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Palestine Mandate. [Cmd. 1785.] [E 322/322/65/1928.]
 (B.) Colonial Office to Foreign Office, January 19, 1928. [E 322/322/65/1928.]
 (C.) Foreign Office to Colonial Office, January 30, 1928. [E 322/322/65/1928.]
 (D.) Foreign Office to Colonial Office, February 8, 1928. [E 322/322/65/1928.]
 (E.) Colonial Office to Foreign Office, March 14, 1928. [E 1373/322/65/1928.]
 (F.) Foreign Office to Colonial Office, March 29, 1928. [E 1373/322/65/1928.]
 (G.) Law Officers to Colonial Office, March 5, 1926. [E 1373/322/65/1928.]

Report.

Discrimination within the meaning of article 18 of the Mandate of Palestine must be a question of fact depending on the precise circumstances, and we have difficulty in answering the questions submitted to us without some qualification. If it is decided to be in the interests of the mandated territory that an offer by a British firm to enter into a contract on any particular terms should be accepted, we see no reason for requiring that tenders should be invited from firms of other nationality. Similarly, if after the issue of a world-wide invitation to tender, it is thought desirable in the interests of the mandated territory to accept a suitable British tender, though not necessarily the lowest suitable tender, we are of opinion that there is nothing in article 18 of the Palestine Mandate to compel the acceptance of any other tender. We are also of opinion that the mere circumstance that tenders were only invited from firms which were, in fact, British would not offend against article 18, but a general invitation to tender subject to a restriction that only tenders from British firms would be considered would, in our opinion, be on the other side of the line.

We think it would be discrimination within the meaning of article 18 to make it a term of the contract, without regard to the efficient execution of the proposed work, that the contractor should use British or Palestinian materials as far as possible.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
 F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
 May 24, 1928.

1928

16

GENERAL.

[T 7281/3/378/1928]

No. 4.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[May 24, 1928.]

*Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.*Possible conflict between
British nationality
and Palestine
citizenship.

THE Treasury Solicitor has received from the Home Office a letter dated the 24th February, 1928, of which the following is a copy:—

"496099/10.

"Home Office, Whitehall,

"Sir,

"February 24, 1928.

"I am directed by the Secretary of State to refer to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown dated the 7th April, 1925,* on the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine in relation to His Majesty, and to transmit to you, to be laid before the Law Officers, the accompanying case for their opinion on two points connected therewith which have arisen out of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914. The Secretary of State directs me to request that you will move the Attorney and the Solicitor-General to favour him with their opinion on the two questions raised.

"I am, Sir,

"Your obedient Servant,

"JOHN PEDDER

"The Treasury Solicitor,

"Storey's Gate, S.W. 1."

The Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers transmitted with the Home Office letter is annexed hereto.

The Law Officers are requested to advise upon the Questions raised in the Case.

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers.

I.

The Secretary of State desires to have the opinion of the Law Officers on the question whether a British subject who acquires Palestinian citizenship by the grant of a certificate of naturalization under Article 7 of the Palestinian Citizenship Order in Council, 1925, thereby ceases to be a British subject.

1. The Mandate for Palestine, Article 7, contains the following provision:—

"The Administration of Palestine shall be responsible for enacting a nationality law. There shall be included in this law provisions framed so as to facilitate the acquisition of Palestinian citizenship by Jews who take up their permanent residence in Palestine."

2. In fulfilment of the obligations in Article 7 of the Mandate, the Palestinian Citizenship Order, 1925, was made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890. By Article 7 (1) of this Order it is provided that the High Commissioner may grant a certificate of naturalization as a Palestinian citizen to any person who makes application therefor and satisfies the High Commissioner that he has fulfilled the residence and other qualifications specified in the Article. By Article 7 (2) of this order it is provided that the certificate of naturalization shall not take effect until the applicant has taken the oath of allegiance in the form stated in the Schedule to the Order, viz.:—

"I, A.B., swear by Almighty God that I will be Faithful and Loyal to the Government of Palestine."

3. The Oath of Allegiance in His Majesty's Dominions commonly connotes allegiance to the King, e.g., the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, prescribes that on naturalization the following oath shall be taken:—

"I, A.B., swear by Almighty God that I will be Faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George the Fifth, His Heirs and Successors according to law."

* Confidential 13004, p. 30.

GENERAL.

17

4. Section 13 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act 1914, is as follows:—

"A British subject who when in any foreign State and not under a disability by obtaining a certificate of naturalization or by any other voluntary and formal act becomes naturalized therein shall thenceforth be deemed to have ceased to be a British subject."

5. The question for determination appears to be affected by the consideration whether Palestine is a "foreign State" within the meaning of the above section.

6. The attention of the Law Officers is directed to the considerations set out in the enquiry addressed to them in 1925 by the Colonial Office with reference to the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine in relation to His Majesty, and to their Opinion thereon, dated the 7th April, 1925, viz., that the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine would in any British Court be determined by reference to the Palestine Order in Council, 1922, and that its position in relation to His Majesty is the same as that of other Governments established by Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890. The Opinion further expressed the view that internationally foreign States are bound to recognise the position of His Majesty in Palestine as defined in the Mandate; and by Article 1 His Majesty has the right to exercise all the powers inherent in the Government of a Sovereign State, save as therein limited.

7. It might be argued that the citizenship contemplated by Article 7 of the Mandate and established by the Palestinian Citizenship Order, 1925, is a national status which has all the incidents of the nationality of an independent Sovereign State. It may be mentioned that the Government of Poland, whose law provides for the loss of nationality upon naturalization in another State, have held that Polish subjects who have acquired Palestinian citizenship by naturalization have thereby lost their Polish status. From this it might be argued that, from the international standpoint, the acquisition of Palestinian citizenship does not differ from, and produces exactly the same consequences as, the acquisition of the nationality of an independent Sovereign State.

8. It might further be argued that, notwithstanding the special relationship between the Government of Palestine and His Majesty as Mandatory, Palestine is a "foreign State" within the meaning of Section 13 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, so that a British subject who becomes a Palestinian citizen by naturalization thereby loses his British nationality, in accordance with the general principle of British law that a person loses his British nationality on acquiring another nationality. In support of this argument it might be contended that any other conclusion would be inconsistent with the Mandate, as it would involve the position that Palestinian citizenship is a merely local status and that Palestine is not, for the purposes of British nationality law, in the same position as any other country which has a nationality of its own.

9. On the other hand, it can be argued that the question whether Palestine is a "foreign State" ought to be determined by reference to the right conferred on His Majesty by Article 1 of the Mandate to exercise all the powers inherent in the Government of a Sovereign State, subject to the limitations imposed by the Mandate and by reference to the constitutional position as determined by the Palestine Order in Council, 1922, and that the conclusion to be drawn is that Palestine is not a "foreign State" within the meaning of Section 13 of the Act of 1914 if that expression there is to be construed as meaning "independent foreign Sovereign State."

10. It may be urged further that if a British subject who becomes naturalized in Palestine is to be deemed to have become naturalized in a foreign State, he would apparently lose his British nationality by reason of a certificate of naturalization granted under authority conferred by the Sovereign to whom, as a British subject, he owed allegiance—which would seem anomalous.

11. It is to be borne in mind that, pursuant to Article 12 of the Mandate, diplomatic and consular protection is afforded by His Majesty to Palestinian citizens outside Palestine, and that for this purpose Palestinian citizens are in the same position as British protected persons. Thus a British subject who became a Palestinian citizen would continue to receive British Consular protection abroad even if he ceased to be a British subject and became an alien in contemplation of British nationality law.

12. One of the questions to be considered is whether the Palestine Order in Council, 1922, is the sole document which falls to be considered in determining whether Palestine is a "foreign State" for the purposes of Section 13 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, or whether it is also necessary to have regard to the position of Palestine as a territory administered under Mandate of the League of Nations in accordance with the principles laid down in Article 22 of the Covenant.

[19745]

D

13. The anomalies which would result from holding that Palestinian citizenship is a nationality in the full sense are due to the fact that the constitution of Palestine is inconsistent with its being an independent foreign State. In fact, it has never been recognised as such. It will be observed that paragraph 4 of Article 22 of the Covenant does not lay it down that the communities therein referred to "are hereby" or "must be" recognised as independent nations, but that they can be so recognised. The position is that Palestine can be recognised as an independent nation when the situation allows, but that it has not so far been possible to accord that country such recognition.

The Law Officers are requested to advise—

Whether a British subject who acquires Palestinian citizenship by the grant of a certificate of naturalization under Article 7 of the Palestinian Citizenship Order in Council, 1925, thereby ceases to be a British subject.

II.

The Secretary of State desires, also, to have the Opinion of the Law Officers on the further question, whether members of the Palestine Civil Service can properly be regarded as being in the service of the Crown within the meaning of Section 2 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, which provides that the Secretary of State may grant a certificate of naturalization to an alien who makes an application for the purpose, and satisfies the Secretary of State, inter alia, that he has "either resided in His Majesty's dominions for a period of not less than five years . . . or been in the service of the Crown for not less than five years within the last eight years before the application."

1. On the one hand, it may be contended that the Mandate for Palestine being vested in His Majesty the King, the Government of Palestine is merely the instrument by which His Majesty exercises his authority, and that the servants of that Government are in fact the servants of His Majesty, and may therefore qualify by such service for naturalization as British subjects, pursuant to Section 2 of the Act of 1914. On this view, members of the Palestine Civil Service are to be regarded as falling in the same category as persons employed in the service of the Government of a British Protectorate.

2. On the other hand, it may be contended that the Government of Palestine is not the Crown within the meaning of Section 2 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914. In this connection the attention of the Law Officers is directed to their Opinion dated the 7th April, 1925, with reference to the constitutional position of the Government of Palestine in relation to His Majesty.

3. It would appear to be open to question, moreover, whether a certificate of naturalization as a British subject could properly be granted to a person upon the basis of employment in the service of the Government of a territory which possesses a nationality of its own, assuming that Palestinian citizenship is a nationality in the full sense of the term, and which exercises the power of conferring that nationality by the grant of certificates of naturalization to persons within its jurisdiction.

The Law Officers are requested to advise—

Whether an alien who is employed in the service of the Government of Palestine may qualify by reason of such service for the grant of a certificate of naturalization under Section 2 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. So long as the constitutional position of Palestine continues as it is by virtue of the Palestine Order in Council, a British subject who acquires Palestinian citizenship under Article 7 of the Palestinian Citizenship Order in Council, 1925, does not in our opinion cease to be a British subject. The oath of allegiance to the Government of Palestine as established by the Order in Council made by virtue of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act is a recognition of the exercise by His Majesty of His powers as Mandatory for Palestine, and in our opinion Palestine is not a "foreign State" within the meaning of Section 13 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

2. We are of opinion that an alien who is employed in the service of the Government of Palestine may qualify by reason of such service for the grant of a certificate of naturalization under Section 2 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN

Law Officers' Department,
May 24, 1928.

[E 5645/322/65/1928]

No. 5.

[Colonial Office]

[November 12, 1928.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, October 27, 1928.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to refer to your report* dated the 24th May in regard to the interpretation to be placed on article 18 of the Palestine Mandate in so far as it concerns the invitation of tenders to construct harbour works at Haifa. A copy of the report is enclosed (Enclosure (A)).

2. As you stated in that report that you were of the opinion that the mere circumstances that tenders were invited only from firms which were in fact British would not offend against article 18 of the Palestine Mandate, Mr. Amery decided that invitations to tender for the work should be issued to selected British firms only. Preliminary invitations to tender were issued on the 9th August, and the contractors were given to understand that definite invitations and tender forms would be sent to them at the beginning of October. Certain foreign firms, who were aware of the proposal to construct a harbour at Haifa, approached the Palestine Government, or in some cases His Majesty's Government in Great Britain, and asked to be furnished with particulars of the works in order that they might have an opportunity of submitting tenders. Mr. Amery proposed that the reply to all enquiries on the point, whether emanating from foreign firms or Governments, should be that it had been decided to invite tenders for the Haifa harbour works from selected British firms only. The Acting Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs took exception to this course and the matter has been the subject of prolonged departmental correspondence, of which copies are attached (Enclosures (B-F)). From paragraph 9 of the Foreign Office letter of the 16th October (Enclosure (F)) it will be seen that the Acting Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs does not agree with the interpretation which Mr. Amery had placed upon your report of the 24th May. It has accordingly been decided, with the concurrence of the Acting Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to solicit an expression of your opinion on the question whether, on the facts of the present case, the limitation of invitations to tender to selected British firms is consistent with article 18 of the Palestine Mandate.

3. The arguments in support of Mr. Amery's view that this course is correct are set out at length in the Colonial Office letter of the 4th October (Enclosure (E)). There is one point only on which he would wish to develop those arguments. The statement which he made in the House of Commons on the 9th December, 1926, as recorded in columns 2379 and 2380 of volume 200 of Hansard (copy attached, Enclosure (G)) was, of course, within the knowledge of the Palestine Government before the loan was issued in December 1927. That Government, therefore, accepted the benefit of

Conditions of contract for harbour work at Haifa.

1928

20

GENERAL.

the guaranteed loan with the knowledge that the orders for the executing of the public works contemplated would, apart from work done locally, be placed in Great Britain, and they are accordingly proposing to place the contract for the construction of Haifa harbour with a British firm. The only question which arises is whether article 18 of the Palestine Mandate imposes on His Majesty, in his capacity as mandatory for Palestine, an obligation to prevent the Palestine Government from limiting to British firms the medium through which it will spend certain monies obtained under the guaranteed loan. Having in mind the terms of your report of the 24th May, and, in particular, the terms of the penultimate sentence of that report, Mr. Amery is of the opinion that no such obligation rests upon His Majesty.

4. I am to request that Mr. Amery may be favoured with—

- (1) Your advice on the question whether, on the facts of the present case, the limitation of invitations to tender to selected British firms is consistent with article 18 of the Palestine Mandate; and
- (2) Any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

5. As the preliminary invitations to tender were issued more than ten weeks ago the matter is urgent, and Mr. Amery would be grateful if he could be favoured with your advice at a very early date.

I have, &c.

O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

List of Enclosures.

- (A.) Law Officers to Colonial Office, May 24, 1928 [Confidential, p.].
- (B.) Colonial Office to Foreign Office, September 15, 1928 [E 4566/322/65/1928].
- (C.) From Foreign Office to Colonial Office, September 15, 1928 [E 4439/322/65/1928].
- (D.) From Foreign Office to Colonial Office, September 24, 1928 [E 4566/322/65/1928].
- (E.) From Colonial Office to Foreign Office, October 4, 1928 [E 4819/322/65/1928].
- (F.) From Foreign Office to Colonial Office, October 16, 1928 [E 4819/322/65/1928].
- (G.) Parliamentary Debates, Vol. 200, cols. 2379 and 2380.

Report.

On the facts of the case now fully stated to us we are of opinion that the limitation of invitations to tender to selected British firms is not consistent with article 18 of the Palestine Mandate.

We desire to emphasise our former opinion that the interests of the mandated territory afford the test of the propriety of the course proposed. It was not our intention that this test should be regarded as applicable only to two of the courses suggested and not to the third.

It is not disputed that the limitation of tenders to British firms is intended to give effect to the assurance offered to the House of Commons on the 9th December, 1926. There is, therefore, something more than the mere circumstances of a limitation to firms which are, in fact, British. The object of the limitation appears clearly to be to discriminate in favour of British contractors and not to further the interests of the mandated territory.

The assurance given by you to the House of Commons on the 9th December, 1926, is not a circumstance which in our opinion affects the question submitted to us, as the British guarantee was not made subject to the condition that preference should be given to selected British firms.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
November 12, 1928.

21

IRAQ.

[E 4047/133/65/1928]

No. 6.

[Colonial Office.]

[August 3, 1928.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, July 28, 1928.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to state that a question has arisen with regard to the interpretation of certain articles in the Military Agreement concluded under article 7 of the Treaty of Alliance between Great Britain and Iraq of the 10th October, 1922. This agreement, which was signed on the 25th March, 1924, entered into force on the 19th December, 1924, upon the ratification of the principal treaty. A copy of a print containing the text of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty of 1922 and the agreements subsidiary thereto (including the aforesaid Military Agreement) is enclosed (Paper 1).

Interpretation of certain articles in Anglo-
Iraq
Military Agreement of March
25, 1924.

2. By article 3 of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty of 1926 (copy enclosed, Paper 2) His Majesty's Government undertook inter alia to consider the possibility of amending the agreements referred to in article 18 of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty of 1922, namely, the Military Agreement of the 25th March, 1924, to which reference has already been made, and the Financial Agreement signed on the same day (Paper 1). In accordance with this undertaking, revised agreements were drawn up by His Majesty's Government and were submitted to the Iraq Government. Following upon preliminary negotiations, the Iraq Government have now formally expressed their inability to accept the revised draft agreements failing the acceptance by His Majesty's Government of certain important modifications. To these modifications His Majesty's Government are unable to agree.

A deadlock has accordingly been reached, and until this has been resolved and new agreements have been concluded, it would appear that, for the purpose of regulating the position of the Imperial garrison in Iraq and the financial relations between the two Governments, His Majesty's Government must continue to rely upon the provisions of the existing agreements.

3. The Iraq Government, however, have advanced the view that for the former purpose it will be impossible to rely upon the existing Military Agreement after the 19th December, 1928, since upon that date the greater part of that agreement will, in their opinion, cease to have effect. They apparently contend that, in view of the terms of articles 1 and 3 of the Military Agreement, the remaining articles, which depend for their effect upon article 3, will automatically become inoperative upon the expiry of the period of four years mentioned in article 1 (viz., upon the 19th December, 1928), and that there will then be no instrument safeguarding the position of the British forces in Iraq.

4. If this view is correct, it will be necessary for His Majesty's Government to consider what special measures will be necessary, failing the conclusion of a new agreement, in order to safeguard the position of the British forces in Iraq after December 1928, and to preserve the present powers and immunities secured to them under the existing agreement. But before doing so His Majesty's Government would wish to be satisfied that the interpretation placed by the Iraq Government upon articles 1 and 3 of the agreement is correct and cannot be resisted.

5. It will be observed that Article 1 of the Military Agreement only states that the two Governments "recognise the principle" that Iraq is to accept full responsibility before a given date for the maintenance of internal order and external defence and that article 3, which appears to be the more important article, continues the remaining provisions of the agreement in effect "so long as the presence of an Imperial garrison . . . is necessary in order to assist the Government of Iraq in attaining the full responsibility accepted in principle under article 1." Assuming, therefore, that no new agreements were concluded but that the Imperial garrison were to remain in Iraq beyond the maximum period contemplated in article 1 without objection being raised by the Iraq Government, it is submitted that it could be maintained that the two parties had tacitly agreed that the "principle" stated in article 1 could not yet be transformed into practice, that, therefore, the presence of the Imperial garrison was still "necessary" within the meaning of article 3 and that the following articles of the agreement accordingly remained in force.

6. In this connexion, however, the terms of article 3 of the Financial Agreement are of some relevance. This article also purports to impose a limit of time upon the continuance of British military support, since the financial assistance, to which reference is made in this article, is defined in the preceding article as meaning the maintenance in Iraq of an Imperial garrison. Owing to an oversight, the periods mentioned in article 1 of the Military Agreement and in article 3 of the Financial Agreement do not coincide, the one running from the date of the conclusion of the Military Agreement and the other from the date of the ratification of peace with Turkey. This discrepancy, however, is not, it is submitted, material to the question under consideration, and it is rather to the form of words employed in article 3 of the Financial Agreement than to this disparity of dates that the attention of the Law Officers is directed. It will be observed that in article 3 of the Financial Agreement the statement that the financial assistance (i.e., military support) provided by His Majesty's Government shall terminate within a given period is not conditioned by the use of any such qualifying phrases as "recognise the principle" or "accepted in principle" as in the Military Agreement, although the former expression is reproduced in article 1 of the Financial Agreement, in which no time limit is prescribed.

It might, perhaps, be argued that in case of doubt as to the meaning and intention of article 1 of the Military Agreement it would be reasonable to look to the wording of its counterpart in the Financial Agreement. It is suggested, however, that this view is by no means inevitable. The Military and Financial Agreements, although possessing certain points of similarity, are entirely separate and independent agreements. They were concluded under different articles in the principal treaty; they were designed to regulate entirely different matters and there is nothing in their terms to support the view that they depend upon each other either for effect or interpretation.

7. If it is held that the view of the Iraq Government set out in paragraph 3 above cannot be sustained and that articles 4 to 15 of the Military Agreement will not automatically cease to have effect upon the expiry of the period of four years mentioned in article 1 provided that an Imperial garrison be retained in Iraq after that date with the concurrence of the Iraq Government, it remains to consider whether the concurrence of the Iraq Government in, or at least the absence of objection on their part to, the retention of British forces in Iraq is essential in order to satisfy the requirements of article 3, i.e., whether the decision that the retention of those forces "is necessary" rests with His Majesty's Government or with the Iraq Government or, alternatively, requires the agreement of both Governments.

It is not anticipated that in practice the Iraq Government would, in any case for some time to come, feel able to dispense with British military support or desire the removal of the British forces from Iraq. The possibility that some extremist group might obtain temporary political control in Iraq and might then demand the withdrawal of the British garrison from the country cannot, however, be excluded from consideration, and it is therefore desirable that the question of what would be the position of His Majesty's Government under the Military Agreement in that event should be examined. In examining this question it is suggested that consideration should be given to the terms of article 7 of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty of 1922, in virtue of which the Military Agreement was concluded. Under that article His Britannic Majesty undertakes to provide such support and assistance to the armed forces of the King of Iraq "as may from time to time be agreed by the high contracting parties." It would thus appear that any decision affecting the extent of British military support and assistance, which is defined in article 2 of the Military Agreement as taking the form of the presence of a military garrison in Iraq, would require the prior agreement both of the Iraq Government and of His Majesty's Government. It would seem to follow that any proposal for the reduction (or increase) of the Imperial garrison and a fortiori any proposal for the total withdrawal of that garrison would also require the prior concurrence of both Governments, and, consequently, that it would not be open to the Iraq Government, by unilateral declaration and without the agreement of His Majesty's Government, to declare that the retention of the British garrison was no longer necessary within the meaning of article 3 and to demand its withdrawal from Iraq.

8. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I am to request that Mr. Amery may be favoured with your advice on the following points:—

Whether, in view of the terms of articles 1 and 3 of the Military Agreement, and having regard to terms of article 3 of the Financial Agreement, articles 4 to 15 inclusive of the former agreement will automatically cease to have effect upon the date of the expiry of the four years period mentioned in article 1 of that agreement if an Imperial garrison be retained in Iraq after that date (a) with the concurrence, expressed or implied, of the Iraq Government, (b) under protest from the Iraq Government to the effect that such retention is not necessary under article 3 of the Military Agreement.

I am, &c.

J. H. HALL.

List of Papers.

1. Anglo-Iraq Treaty of October 10, 1922; Protocol of April 30, 1923; and Agreements of March 25, 1924 (Cmd. 2370). [Treaty No. 1760.]
2. Anglo-Iraq Treaty of January 13, 1926 (Cmd. 2587). [Treaty No. 1810.]

Report.

In our opinion the period of the Military Agreement is fixed by the combined operation of articles 1 and 3 so as to end not later than the four years specified in article 1. Articles 4–15, therefore, in our opinion, will automatically cease to have effect upon the expiry of the four years. The maintenance of an Imperial garrison in Iraq after that date may be continued in accordance with any agreement made in pursuance of article 18 of the treaty, but in that event the conditions applicable to the maintenance of the force will be such as may be provided by the new agreement. If the Iraq Government, either by express or by implied agreement, concur in the maintenance of the garrison after the four years upon the same conditions as those contained in articles 4–15, those conditions will operate as a new agreement and not by virtue of the original agreement.

The retention of the Imperial garrison in Iraq in spite of the protest of the Iraq Government after the expiry of the four years would, in our opinion, be without any warrant derived from the Military Agreement and the provisions of the Military Agreement would be wholly inoperative.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
August 3, 1928.

[E 28/28/44/1929]

No. 7.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[December 10, 1928.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers.

Herewith are sent the Case and accompanying Documents submitted to the Law Officers in July 1927.*

IF the Law Officers will be so good as to refer the last question submitted on the previous Case they will observe that they were asked to advise whether Article 65 of the Treaty of Lausanne entitled the Company to demand restoration to them (a) of any immovable property physically situate in Iraq which formerly belonged to them, and (b) any rights which but for the war they would have been entitled to exercise in Iraq by virtue of their concession. The reply was to the following effect:—

"We are of opinion that under Article 65 of the Treaty of Lausanne the Company are entitled to the restoration of any immovable property physically situate in Iraq which formally belonged to the Company, but that the provisions of Article 65 do not apply to rights which were conferred on the Company by the Concession but have not been exercised."

The High Commissioner for Iraq, who is dealing with the matter in that country on behalf of His Majesty's Government, has now raised the question whether the concluding words of the answer just quoted imply that the Company is entitled to the restoration of or compensation in respect of rights conferred on the Company by their Concession which have already been exercised.

* Confidential 13403, p. 12.

Claim of the Imperial Ottoman Baghdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government in respect of Concession granted to the Company by the Turkish Government in 1903.

TURKEY.

The point which the High Commissioner has in mind is, it is understood, as follows:—

The Concession (details of which are given in the Case previously submitted) may be said for present purposes to have conferred two rights on the Company—(a) the right to build a railway and (b) the right to run it when built. The Company, in fact, constructed a railway for some 70 odd miles north of Baghdad, and, having regard to the opinion already expressed by the Law Officers, it is clear that they are entitled to have returned to them any physical property which came into being as a result of this construction. It appears, however, that the Company also exercised their right to run that portion of the railway, and the question raised by the High Commissioner is whether it is to be inferred from the last part of the sentence quoted from the Law Officers' Opinion that the Company are entitled to have returned to them this right as well. The matter is of importance, because, in fact, it is unlikely that any property will be returned in specie; the claim will be settled by the payment of compensation, and the question, therefore, is whether such compensation should be assessed on the basis that the railway is a going concern or on the scrap value of the physical property.

It is submitted that Article 65 is limited in its application to rights of property strictly so called, such as land, buildings, mortgages, &c., and that it has no application to rights arising under a contract, whether of a concessionary nature or otherwise. The phrase "property rights and interests situate in territory detached . . . which . . . are now in the hands of the contracting Power" seem quite inapt to describe a concessionary right to run a railway in future. Contracts other than concessionary contracts are dealt with in Articles 73 and 75 of the Treaty. Concessionary contracts are the subject of a special Protocol, which is referred to at some length in the case originally submitted. This Protocol provided that Concessions which fulfilled certain specified conditions should be maintained subject to readaptation to meet the new economic conditions. If rights arising under concessionary contracts are within Article 65, it would seem to follow that every concessionaire would be entitled to have his concession maintained, since that would in effect be the only way in which rights arising thereunder could be "returned" to him. This would in effect override the provisions of the Protocol, and can scarcely, therefore, have been the intention of the framers of the Treaty, nor, it is submitted, is it the natural interpretation of the language used. In so far as a concessionaire, acting under his Concession, has created physical property of any kind, he is no doubt entitled to the return of that property, but it is submitted that Article 65 has no application to future rights, which the concessionaire would but for the war have been entitled to exercise by virtue of his concession, such as, in the present case, the right to run traffic over a section of a railway already constructed, although that right had, in fact, been exercised by the concessionaires.

The Law Officers are accordingly requested to advise:—

1. Generally, whether in any case where rights conferred on a concessionaire have been exercised in whole or in part, the concessionaire has, under Article 65 of the Treaty, any greater right than the right to the return of the physical property involved.
2. In particular, whether in the present case that Article gives the Company any rights with regard to the future running of traffic over that part of the railway which has, in fact, been constructed.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown

1. In our opinion, where rights conferred upon a concessionaire have been exercised in whole or in part, the concessionaire has, under Article 65, rights which are not limited to the return of the physical property involved divorced from the right of user.

2. In our opinion Article 65 does give to the Baghdad Railway Company rights with regard to the future running of traffic over that part of the railway which it has constructed and worked as a railway.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

*Law Officers' Department,
December 10, 1928.*

1929

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(13761)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1929.

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

GENERAL.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1 ^A	Law Officers .. [Privy Council Office]	Feb. 4, 1929	Interpretation of Part II of Medical Act, 1886, and of expression "registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom"	1
GERMANY.
1	Law Officers ..	Feb. 14, 1929	Evacuation of Rhineland and interpretation of article 431 of Treaty of Versailles	5
PALESTINE.
1 ^B	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Feb. 7, 1929	Extension of Imperial preference to Palestine ..	8
1 ^C	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Feb. 16, 1929	Western or Wailing Wall in Jerusalem and rights of Jewish worshippers	12
PORTUGAL.
2	Law Officers ..	June 21, 1929	Grievances of "Companhia do Nyassa" and right of His Majesty's Government to intervene ..	15
TURKEY.
2 ^A	Law Officers .. [Treasury Solicitor]	Aug. 10, 1929	Claim of Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government	20

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1929.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—HOL.

A.

Act. See Medical Act, 1886.
Antiquities: Palestine Ordinance, 1920; inconsistency with article 13 of Palestine mandate, 14.
Armes automatiques Lewis, 18.
Army: occupying forces in Rhineland; treaty position as to withdrawal, 5-7.

B.

Bagdad Railway Company: claim against His Majesty's Government, 20-22.

C.

Claim: of Bagdad Railway Company against His Majesty's Government, 20-22.
Commission: Holy Places. See Holy Places.
"Companhia do Nyassa," 15-19.
Company: British shareholders in foreign, diplomatic intervention on behalf of, 17-19.
Concession: of Bagdad Railway Company in Iraq, 20-22.
" ditto: inadmissibility of claim for restoration of rights, 22.
" concessionary rights not covered by article 65 of Treaty of Lausanne, 21.
" of "Companhia do Nyassa," 15.

D.

Delagou Bay Railway Company, 17, 18, 19.
Diplomatic intervention: on behalf of British shareholders in a foreign company, 17-19.

G.

Germany: withdrawal of allied occupying forces, 5-8.
" reparation obligations. See Reparation.

H.

Heirs of Mrs. T. B. Rees and H. J. Whittall (Smyrna International Ferry) v. Turkish Government, 22.
Holy Places: status of Western Wall, Jerusalem, 14.
" Palestine, Commission, 12, 13.
" Order in Council, 13, 15.

5525 [21571]

IMP—MOS.

I.

Imperial Ottoman Bagdad Railway Company: claim against His Majesty's Government, 20-22.
Imperial Preference: extension to Palestine, 8-11.
" ditto; extension would infringe most-favoured-nation clauses of British commercial treaties, 11.
" extended to territories under British mandate in Central Africa, 8.
" cannot be extended to Trans-jordan, 10.
Intervention: diplomatic. See Diplomatic Intervention.
Iraq: Bagdad Railway Company's concession, 20-22.

J.

Jerusalem: Western or Wailing Wall, 12-15.
Jews: rights of worshippers at Western Wall, Jerusalem, 12-15.

L.

League of Nations: article 22 of Covenant; interpretation of, as regards status of mandated territories, 8-11.

M.

Mandates: difference between mandated territories of former Turkish Empire and those of Central Africa, 8, 9.
" Palestine, articles 13 and 14, 12-14.
" Palestine, position under, 9, 10.
" difference between Palestine and Syria and Iraq, 9, 10.
" consideration of mandated territory as foreign or third state within meaning of British commercial treaties, 9-11.
Mavrommatis, 21.
Medical Act, 1886: construction and import of Part II, 1-4.
Medical practitioners: registered, of the United Kingdom; meaning of phrase in Part II of Medical Act, 1886, 4.
" colonial and foreign; right to practise in United Kingdom under Part II of Medical Act, 1886, 4.
" rights of foreign and colonial, in New Zealand, 2-4.
Most-favoured-nation clauses. See Treaties.

(iv)

NEW—REP.

N.

New Zealand: opinion on reciprocity of medical practice under Part II of Medical Act, 1886, 2-4.
 " rights of foreign and colonial medical practitioners in, 2-4.
 Nyassa Consolidated Company, 16.

O.

Order in Council: Palestine; terms of, as affecting status of Palestine, 10.
 " Holy Places. See Holy Places.
 Ordinance: Palestine antiquities. See Antiquities.

P.

Palestine: status, 9-11.
 " Order in Council, 1922, as affecting status, 9, 10.
 " constitutional position different from Syria and Iraq, 9.
 " whether a foreign or third State vis-à-vis Great Britain, 10, 11.
 " extension of Imperial Preference to, 8-11.
 " ditto; infringement of most-favoured-nation clauses of British commercial treaties, 11.
 " rights of Jewish worshippers at Western Wall in Jerusalem, 12-15.
 " Holy Places. See Holy Places.
 " Antiquities Ordinance. See Antiquities.
 " mandate. See Mandates.

R.

Railway: Bagdad Railway Company's rights in Iraq, 20-22.
 Religion: rights of Jewish worshippers at Western Wall, Jerusalem, 12-15.
 Reparation: fulfilment of Germany's obligations and question of evacuation of Rhineland, 5-8.

RHI—WHI.

R.—(cont.)

Rhineland: occupying forces, treaty and legal position as to withdrawal, 5-8.
Romano-Americana Company, 18.

S.

Salvador Commercial Company, 19.

T.

Transjordan: cannot be granted Imperial Preference, 10.
 Treaties: British commercial; extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine would infringe most-favoured nation-clauses in, 11.
 " British commercial; consideration of mandated territory as a foreign or third State within meaning of, 9, 10.
 Treaty of Lausanne. See Treaty of Peace (Turkey).
 Treaty of Peace (Germany): interpretation of Part XIV, section 1, 5-8.
 " interpretation of article 431, 6-8.
 " (Turkey): whether article 65 covers concessionary or contractual rights, 21, 22.
 " Concessions Protocol (No. XII) annexed to Treaty, 20, 21.
 Treaty of Versailles. See Treaty of Peace (Germany).

U.

Union Castle Mail Steamship Company (Limited), 16.

W.

Wailing Wall. See Jerusalem.
 Western (Wailing) Wall. See Jerusalem.
R. F. Whittall v. Turkish Government and Others, 22.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN. &c.: 1929.

GENERAL.

[C 3583/598/22/1929]

No. 1^A.

[Privy Council Office.]

[February 4, 1929.]

Privy Council Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Sir,

December 14, 1928.

I AM directed by the Lord President of the Council to transmit to you the accompanying Statement by the Legal Advisers of the General Medical Council, and to request that it may be laid before the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General, and that His Lordship may be favoured with their Opinion as to—

- (1) What is the true construction and import of Part II of the Medical Act, 1886;
- (2) What is the precise meaning of the expression "registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom."

I am, &c.

M. P. A. HANKEY.

Interpretation of Part II of Medical Act, 1886, and of expression "registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom."

Statement by the Legal Advisers of the General Medical Council.

From the passing of the Medical Act, 1858, which created the General Medical Council and the Medical Register, until the passing of the Medical Act, 1886, there were no means for the holders of colonial and foreign diplomas only to be admitted to the British Register except after obtaining one of the qualifications mentioned in Schedule A of the Medical Act of 1858. But the Medical Act of 1886 provided in Part II for the registration under certain conditions of colonial and foreign practitioners. It was enacted that His Majesty might, on being satisfied that a British possession or foreign country afforded to the registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom such privileges of practising there as His Majesty might seem just, by Order in Council declare that the Act should apply to such possession or country, and thereupon any practitioner in such British possession or foreign country who complied with the provisions laid down in sections 11 and 12 respectively of the Act was entitled to registration in the British Register. A separate list of colonial practitioners and a separate list of foreign practitioners were to be kept in the Register, and the provisions of the Medical Act, 1858, relating to persons registered under that Act and relating to the Medical Register and to offences in respect thereof were to apply in the case of colonial and foreign practitioners registered under the Act of 1886 in the same way as such provisions applied in the case of persons registered under the Medical Act, 1858.

For many years after the passing of the Act of 1886 the operation of Part II was confined to British possessions, which, led by New Zealand, gradually came into the scheme, until the whole of the Dominions, with the solitary exception of the Canadian province of British Columbia, had come in.

Later Orders in Council were made in respect of Italy (1901) and Japan (1906), and for a short time towards the end of and after the Great War, of Belgium also. From one cause or another, Belgium, New Brunswick, Ontario, Quebec, and Saskatchewan, have withdrawn their privileges from British practitioners, and the Orders in Council have accordingly been rescinded in their cases.

The mutual recognition made possible by the Act of 1886 has gone by the name of Reciprocity, but this word does not occur in the Act, and is only used as a convenient label to describe the relations of Great Britain and the other countries concerned.

As already stated, the application of the Act at first only affected the British Empire, but in 1899 the question of reciprocity with Italy became a practical one, and the opinion of the late Mr. Muir Mackenzie, then Legal Assessor of the Council, was taken on the question of whether, under section 17 of the Act of 1886, the privileges to foreign practitioners could be restricted to the recognition of practice by them among their fellow-countrymen only who might be resident in this country. Mr. Muir Mackenzie was unable to find any express provision in the Act empowering His Majesty by Order in Council so to limit the rights of foreign practitioners, and advised that in the absence of such expressed power no such restriction could be imposed by Order in Council, and consequently that foreign practitioners, if otherwise eligible under the Act, were not confined to practising in this country among their own compatriots. It will be seen presently that the opinion of Mr. Muir Mackenzie does not touch upon the question recently raised by New Zealand, but it is mentioned here as being the only legal opinion recorded at the time regarding Part II of the Act of 1886.

Going back for a few years the Minutes of the Council record that in 1893 a report by the Executive Committee on the reciprocity of medical practice in relation to foreign countries was received and entered on the Minutes. This report is printed in full in Appendix II, and the effect of Part II of the Medical Act is therein stated (page 7) as follows:—

5. The second part of the Medical Act of 1886 provides for the recognition by the General Medical Council of equivalent qualifications granted in countries which treat this country with reciprocity. Her Majesty's Privy Council have the power to bring such countries within the scope of the Act by an Order in Council, whereupon the General Medical Council can admit the foreign practitioner who has obtained equivalent qualifications abroad to the Foreign and Colonial Register. Persons on that Register have all the rights of persons on the English Medical Register.

In 1906, when reciprocity with Japan was being negotiated, the Japanese Government expressly intimated that its desire was to enable Japanese medical practitioners to practise medicine in the Straits Settlements, and in a communication from the Japanese Legation in London to our Foreign Office of the 23rd June, 1905, the Japanese Minister referred to this and expressed the earnest hope of his Government—

"That the British Government will see their way to cause some measures to be taken by which Japan shall be recognised as one of the countries to which the Medical Act applies, thus enabling the Japanese medical practitioners to practise medicine in general in the Straits Settlements as well as in other parts of the British Empire."

The term "reciprocity" has always been interpreted by the Council and in other quarters as meaning that a medical practitioner registered by virtue of Part II of the Act of 1886 is entitled to practise not only in Great Britain, but in every other part of the world which has reciprocity with this country, so that, for instance, a Japanese on the Foreign List is entitled to practise not only in the Straits Settlements but in any other part of the Empire which has come in and in Italy, and a New Zealander on the Colonial List is likewise entitled to practise in any other part of the Empire which has come in and in Japan and Italy.

This view has now been challenged by New Zealand.

In New Zealand the law as to medical practice was, from 1914 to 1924, regulated by the Medical Practitioners Act of 1914, the provisions of which were entirely consistent with reciprocity as understood by the General Medical Council.

In 1924, however, an amending Act was passed which modified the Act of 1914. The relevant portions of these Acts are section 8 of the Act of 1914 and section 4 of the Act of 1924, and they are as follows:—

ACT OF 1914: SECTION 8.

Registration.

8.—(1) Every person shall be entitled to be registered under this Act who satisfies the Board that he is—

- (a) A graduate in medicine and surgery of the University of New Zealand; or
- (b) registered on the Register kept in accordance with the provisions of the Acts regulating the registration of medical practitioners in the United Kingdom; or
- (c) eligible for registration on such last-mentioned Register; or
- (d) the holder of a diploma (hereinafter referred to as a foreign diploma) approved by the Board, and granted by any University or institution other than the University of New Zealand or than a University or institution situated in the United Kingdom, after a course of not less than five years' study of the subjects pertaining to a medical and surgical degree or licence:

Provided that the Board may refuse to approve any diploma for the purposes of this Act, unless it appears to the Board that the graduates in medicine and surgery of the University of New Zealand are by virtue of such graduation, and without further examination, entitled to be registered as medical practitioners and to practise medicine and surgery in the country in which is situated the University or other institution by which that diploma has been granted.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in the last preceding subsection, no persons shall be entitled as of right to be registered under this Act if he is not a fit person to be so registered by reason of the fact that—

- (a) He has been at any time convicted of any offence punishable by imprisonment with hard labour for a term of two years or upwards; or
- (b) He is otherwise not of good fame or character.

ACT OF 1924: SECTION 4.

4.—(1) Section 8 of the Principal Act is hereby amended by adding to paragraph (d) the following proviso:—

"Provided further that the Council may in any case, if it thinks fit, require that the holder of a foreign diploma, before being entitled to registration, shall pass to the satisfaction of the Council an examination in medicine and surgery to be prescribed and conducted by the Senate of the University of New Zealand."

(2) Notwithstanding anything in paragraph (b) or paragraph (c) of the said section 8, a person registered or eligible for registration in the United Kingdom by virtue of a diploma or other qualification granted otherwise than by a University or institution in the United Kingdom shall not be entitled as of right to registration in New Zealand, but the Council shall have the same power to refuse approval of any diploma or to require further examination as it has in the case of the holders of foreign diplomas applying for registration on the grounds mentioned in paragraph (d) of the said section.

The amended section 4 of the Act of 1924 effects such a change in the privileges of practising in New Zealand accorded to practitioners registered in the British Register as to raise the serious question whether reciprocity can any longer be continued. It is, moreover, clear from the opinion of the New Zealand Crown Office* that New Zealand takes a different and more limited view of the mutuality created by Part II of the Act of 1886 than the General Medical Council, and that much depends on the meaning of the expression "registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom." This expression is not defined in the Act, but "registered medical practitioner" is defined as meaning any person for the time being registered under the Medical Acts. As already indicated, the expression "registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom" has been interpreted by the General Medical Council and by others as meaning the same as "registered medical practitioner" or as "medical practitioner registered in the United Kingdom." The Council has always regarded the Register of the United Kingdom, including the Foreign and Colonial Lists, as one and indivisible in respect of the privileges conferred by registration, and whoever is on the Register, whether in the Foreign or Colonial Lists, or otherwise, as actually or potentially a registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom and entitled to the full to all the advantages of reciprocity.

* A copy of this document is contained in [C 3583/598/22 1929].

GENERAL.

New Zealand is, in fact, aiming at a different and more limited reciprocity than that which has hitherto obtained. She desires reciprocity with Great Britain only, certainly not with any foreign country, and apparently not with any other Dominion, and argues that what she claims is in accordance with Part II of the Act of 1886. The limited reciprocity claimed by New Zealand may or may not be a desirable thing (and it is to be allowed the effect is likely to be far-reaching), but it is materially different from that which has hitherto obtained, and would, it is submitted, involve a change in the law as hitherto understood. Accordingly, the first requirement is to determine what is the true construction and import of Part II of the Act of 1886, and particularly what is the precise meaning of the expression "registered medical practitioner of the United Kingdom."

Opinion.

1. The scheme of Part II of the Medical Act, 1886, is to enable persons holding certain colonial or foreign medical diplomas to have their names entered in the Medical Register (Sections 11 and 12). Those who hold such colonial diplomas and are so registered are called "colonial practitioners," and those who hold such foreign diplomas and are similarly registered are called "foreign practitioners" (see Section 14). The effect of these provisions coupled with Section 6 and the definition of "registered medical practitioners" in Section 27 is to entitle both colonial and foreign practitioners to practise in the United Kingdom and (subject to any local law) in any other part of His Majesty's Dominions. In order to ascertain the diplomas which entitle the holders thereof to be registered in the Medical Register it is necessary to refer to Sections 13 and 17. Section 13 merely deals with and defines the expression "recognised medical diploma." Section 17, when read with Sections 11 and 12, provides in effect that only diplomas granted in those British possessions or foreign countries which afford certain privileges of practising within their respective jurisdictions to "the registered medical practitioners of the United Kingdom" shall entitle the holders thereof to be registered in pursuance of Sections 11 and 12 in the Medical Register.

In our opinion the phrase "registered medical practitioners of the United Kingdom" is used to denote persons on the register who are neither "colonial practitioners" nor "foreign practitioners." So far as British possessions are concerned, the right to practise there which is conferred by Section 6 on all three classes of practitioners is "subject to any local law." So far as foreign countries are concerned the rights of all three classes depend entirely on the laws of the several foreign countries. The extent to which any local law in the case of British possessions or foreign law limits or forbids the right of registered medical practitioners of the United Kingdom to practise in the British possession or foreign country concerned is matter for consideration by His Majesty in deciding whether the privileges of practising afforded by such British possession or foreign country are or are not just.

2. We have already answered this question. It follows from our answer that we do not agree with the interpretation hitherto given by the General Medical Council to the expression in question.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

*Law Officers' Department,
February 4, 1929.*

GERMANY.

[C 1211/45/18]

No. 1.

[February 14, 1929.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.Foreign Office, December 7, 1928.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by instruction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to submit to you the accompanying papers relating to the interpretation of article 431 of the Treaty of Versailles, and to request you to furnish him with your opinion as to whether Germany is now entitled to claim under that article the unconditional evacuation of districts occupied in virtue of article 428 by the Allies as a guarantee for the execution of that treaty by Germany.

2. The articles governing the occupation are to be found in Part XIV, section 1, of the treaty (Paper (A)). Article 428 provides, as a guarantee for the execution of the treaty, for the occupation of the German territory to the west of the Rhine for fifteen years from the coming into force of the treaty (the 10th January, 1920). Article 429 provides that, if the conditions of the treaty are faithfully carried out by Germany, the area under occupation is to be successively restricted as there specified at intervals of five years. Article 430 provides that, if the Reparation Commission during or after the fifteen years finds that Germany refuses to observe the whole or part of her reparation obligations under the treaty, the whole or part of the areas specified in article 429 will be reoccupied. Article 431 provides that if, "before the expiration of the fifteen years Germany complies with all the undertakings resulting from the present treaty, the occupying forces will be withdrawn immediately."

3. Since the conclusion of the agreement negotiated in 1924 for bringing into force the Dawes plan, and since the Locarno treaties of 1925, German statesmen have in public speeches and in conversation with Allied statesmen been disposed to maintain the view that Germany is now entitled to the evacuation of the Rhineland upon the ground that she has complied with all her reparation obligations, and that no other treaty obligations are outstanding. No formal specific demand has, however, been addressed to the Allied Governments by Germany to this effect.

4. In the course of the last few weeks, speeches by political leaders in this country to the effect that, as Germany had complied with all her obligations, the Allied Governments are not acting up to their treaty engagements in failing to withdraw the occupying forces, have attracted attention, and on the 3rd December, in answer to a parliamentary question, the Secretary of State was obliged to explain the policy which he has hitherto been advised to follow in this matter (Paper (B)).

5. For the purposes of the present discussion, Germany's obligations in connexion with reparation need alone be taken into account. These obligations are defined in general terms in articles 231 and 232 of the treaty. Under article 233 the amount of the damage for which compensation was to be made by Germany in accordance with the preceding articles was to be determined by the Reparation Commission and notified to the German Government on or before the 1st May, 1921, "as representing the extent of that Government's obligations," and "the entire obligation" was to be discharged under a Schedule of Payments to be drawn up by the commission within a period of thirty years from the 1st May, 1921, but the commission had power to postpone any part of the obligations not discharged within that period.

On the 5th May, 1921, the Reparation Commission established a Schedule of Payments (Paper (C)), prescribing the time and manner for securing (by means of a system of bonds) and discharging Germany's reparation obligations, which had been fixed at the amount of 132 milliard gold marks (£6,600 million), subject to certain minor adjustments.

6. Under the experts' plan of the 9th April, 1924 (Paper (D)), which was adopted by the Governments concerned in the London Agreement of the 30th August, 1924 (Paper (E)), the system and amounts of the annual payments to be made by Germany were, in fact, modified, though there was no formal revocation of the Schedule of Payments laid down in May 1921. Germany's financial obligations

Evacuation of Rhineland.
Interpretation of
article 431
of Treaty of Versailles.

resulting from the Treaty of Versailles were to be met by the payment of a series of annuities, of which the amounts were laid down, but no mention was made therein of the actual number of such annuities which Germany was to pay in order to discharge her obligations completely. That question was outside the competence of the experts, and was left untouched in the London Agreement. The duration of Germany's obligation to pay the annuities was therefore left unsettled, though there might be a question as to whether the amount of the annuities was to be reduced to the contributions from the budget of the Reich when the bonds provided for by the experts' plan, to the amount of 16 milliards of gold marks, secured partly on the German railways and partly on German industrial concerns, had been amortised.

7. It is to be observed that under both the London Agreement and the Schedule of Payments, established in pursuance of the Treaty of Versailles, it is contemplated that the payment of reparation by Germany is to extend beyond the period of fifteen years fixed by article 428 of the treaty, and it is not considered that the adoption of the experts' plan has any effect upon the legal question of the interpretation to be put upon article 431.

8. There are two possible interpretations of article 431. The first is that, in order to claim the withdrawal of the occupying forces at any time before the expiry of the fifteen-year period, Germany must show that she has completely and finally discharged her reparation obligations to the Allied Powers. This is the view on which His Majesty's Government have hitherto acted. The other interpretation, which is that suggested by the German Government, is that it is only necessary for this purpose for Germany to show that she has complied with such of her reparation obligations as have matured up to date. According to this interpretation, the words in article 431: "If . . . Germany complies with all the undertakings resulting from the present treaty," have precisely the same meaning as "If the conditions of the present treaty are faithfully carried out by Germany," in article 429.

9. The view upon which His Majesty's Government have hitherto acted is that articles 429 and 431, which contain different provisions as to the date of the evacuation of the Rhineland, are framed to meet two different, though possible, sets of circumstances. According to this view, the words in article 429: "If the conditions of the present treaty are faithfully carried out by Germany," contemplate, so far as reparation is concerned, the punctual performance by Germany of her reparation obligations as they mature (i.e., the regular payment each year of the sums due from time to time by Germany under the prescriptions in force, that is to say, at present the Dawes annuities), and the article provides that, if this is done, the occupied territory is to be evacuated in three successive stages, the final evacuation taking place at the end of the fifteen years prescribed by article 429, although at that time Germany's reparation obligations would not have been completely discharged, since, even if the period of thirty years laid down in article 233 had remained unaltered, and no postponement had been granted, such payments as were to be made during the last fifteen of the thirty years would still remain to be paid. Article 431, on the other hand, which provides for the complete evacuation of the occupied territory before the expiration of the period of fifteen years, cannot be regarded as referring to the punctual performance of Germany's reparation obligations as they mature contemplated by article 429. If it did, it would constitute a second provision relating to the evacuation of the occupied territory, inconsistent with article 429, but applicable to the same set of circumstances. The phrase employed in article 431: "If . . . Germany complies with all the undertakings resulting from the present treaty," must, therefore, mean more than the performance by Germany of her current obligations under the treaty, and was intended to indicate the complete execution and discharge of those obligations before the termination of the fifteen-year period.

10. In this connexion it is material to observe that the possibility of the discharge of Germany's reparation obligations by the payment of a lump sum was mentioned in the reply of the Allies of the 16th June, 1919, to the observations of the German delegation on the conditions of peace (Paper (F), p. 202). According to this statement, Germany might, within four months of the signature of the treaty, offer (inter alia) "a lump sum in settlement of her whole liability as defined in article 233." If such an offer had been made and accepted, and payment had been made at any time during the period fixed for the occupation, article 431 would therefore have come into operation, provided that Germany's other obligations under the treaty had been then fulfilled. It is also relevant to refer to paragraph 12 (d) of Annex II to the Reparation Section, Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles, which deals with the possibility of the commercialisation of the reparation debt. These annexes follow article 244 of the treaty. The effect of paragraph 12 (d) is that, if the debt is commercialised, the nominal amount of Germany's liability on the bonds pro tanto takes the place of, and extinguishes, Germany's reparation debt towards the Governments. Consequently, if the whole reparation debt were commercialised, article 431 would certainly come into operation.

11. The legal advice which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs received on this point is to be found set out in a despatch which was sent to Paris in 1926 (Paper (G), p. 18) at a time when it was thought that Germany would, as soon as she had taken a seat in the Council of the League of Nations, formally demand the evacuation of the Rhineland under article 431.

12. On the 16th June, 1919, President Wilson, Mr. Lloyd George and M. Clemenceau signed a declaration relating to the costs of the Rhineland occupation, in which (inter alia) it was provided that, "if Germany at an earlier date has given proof of her goodwill and satisfactory guarantees to assure the fulfilment of her obligations, the Allied Powers concerned will be ready to come to an agreement between themselves for the earlier termination of the period of occupation." A copy of this declaration is enclosed (Paper (H)).

13. The legal effect of this document and the extent to which it can be regarded as throwing light on the interpretation of article 431 are discussed in paragraphs 12-14 of the 1926 despatch (Paper (G), p. 20). It has always been regarded by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as confirming the interpretation which he had placed on article 431, or at any rate as showing that the interpretation in question must have been adopted by the signatories of the declaration. For, if the interpretation which the German Government now seek to place on article 431 were correct, Germany would, in the circumstances contemplated in paragraph 3 of the declaration, be entitled to the immediate evacuation of the whole of the occupied territory (since Germany could not have "given proofs of her goodwill and satisfactory guarantees to assure the fulfilment of her obligations" if she had not complied with such obligations as had matured up to date), and the provision that the Allied and Associated Powers concerned would "be ready to come to an agreement between themselves for the earlier termination of the period of occupation" would not merely be superfluous, but would amount to less than Germany would be entitled to under the treaty which she had signed.

14. In view of the answer which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs felt obliged to give to the parliamentary question referred to above (Paper (B)), I am to say that he is anxious to know whether you concur in the advice upon which he has previously acted, and whether, in your opinion, Germany is now entitled to claim under article 431 of the Treaty of Versailles that the occupying forces in the Rhineland should be withdrawn immediately.

15. Sir Austen Chamberlain would also be grateful for any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I am, &c.

R. C. LINDSAY.

List of Papers.

- (A.) The Treaty of Versailles. [Treaty 1557.]
- (B.) Extract from Hansard, December 3, 1928: Question by Mr. Rennie Smith and Answer given thereto by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.
- (C.) Schedule of Payments of May 5, 1921. [Parliamentary 5231, pp. 4-9.]
- (D.) Reports of the Expert Committees appointed by the Reparation Commission, April 9, 1924. [Parliamentary 5214.]
- (E.) London Agreements of August 30, 1924. [Treaty 1740.]
- (F.) Correspondence with the German Peace Delegation respecting the Treaty of Peace (Confidential 11556).
- (G.) Foreign Office Memorandum of August 18, 1928. [C 6400/969/18.]
- (H.) Declaration by the Governments of the United States of America, Great Britain and France in regard to the occupation of the Rhine Provinces, June 16, 1919. [Parliamentary 4977.]

GERMANY—PALESTINE.

Report.

As a matter of the strict legal construction of article 431 of the Treaty of Versailles, read together with the other articles forming Part XIV, section 1, of the treaty, we are of opinion that during the period of fifteen years, so long as the reparation indebtedness of Germany is not wholly extinguished, Germany is not entitled to claim under article 431 the immediate withdrawal of the occupying forces.

The documents placed before us other than the treaty, so far as they may be regarded as throwing any light upon the interpretation of article 431, confirm us in our opinion.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
February 14, 1929.

PALESTINE.

[E 1312/1312/65/1929]

No. 1ⁿ.

[Colonial Office.]

[February 7, 1929.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, January 25, 1929.

Extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to refer to the report of your predecessors in office of the 18th February, 1921,* addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and to your reports of the 3rd January, 1923,† and the 19th June, 1925,‡ addressed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on the question of the extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine, and to request you, in the light of the considerations hereafter appearing, to be so good as to consider the question anew.

2. In their report of the 21st September, 1921,§ your predecessors in office advised that goods, the produce of or manufactured in territories administered under B and C Mandates, might benefit by the grant of Imperial Preference. In accordance with that advice, the benefits of Imperial Preference have been extended to Tanganyika Territory and the Cameroons and Togoland under British mandate. No foreign Power has, in consequence of that grant, asked that its commerce should receive similar benefits, nor has the grant been challenged by the League of Nations. From this position the deduction is drawn that the question whether or not a mandated territory must be regarded as a foreign or third State within the meaning of British commercial treaties depends upon the closeness of the link between the mandatory and the mandated territory—that is to say, upon the degree of authority, control or administration exercised by the mandatory Power. In the following paragraphs of this letter the question of the extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine will be examined anew in the light of this consideration.

3. In the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant of the League it is provided that "certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognised subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone." This paragraph defines the characteristics which distinguish the communities in Asia Minor from the territories dealt with in the two following paragraphs of article 22 of the Covenant; its effect is to recognise that the communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire are communities which may reasonably be expected so to progress and develop in future that they will in time be able to become independent nations capable of standing alone. There is nothing in the fifth paragraph of article 22 showing any recognition by the framers of the Treaty of Versailles that the peoples of the mandated territories in Central Africa will ever develop into communities capable of standing alone as independent nations. It would seem to

* Confidential 11933, p. 35.
† Confidential 13004, p. 30.

‡ Confidential 12470, p. 17.
§ Confidential 11933, p. 30.

PALESTINE.

follow that the difference between the two groups of communities is that the first consists of territories where progress in this direction can be expected, while the second does not; but, it is submitted, there is nothing in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant which would support the view that, because a community may be expected some day to be capable of standing alone as an independent nation, it is, during the interval when it is being trained to that end, to be necessarily regarded as a foreign State.

4. It will be observed, moreover, that the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant does not lay it down that the communities therein referred to "are hereby" or "must be" recognised as independent nations, but that they "can be" so recognised. Owing to the obligations placed upon His Majesty's Government by the Balfour Declaration, and to the general political situation in Palestine, it was not, in fact, found possible to recognise Palestine, however provisionally, as an independent nation; and when, following the allocation of the mandates for the territories detached from Turkey, the time came for the Council of the League to define (as is provided for by the eighth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant) the degree of authority, control or administration to be exercised in those territories by the mandatories to whom they were entrusted, the difference in the terms of the mandate issued shows that a distinction was already present in the mind of the Council between Palestine on the one hand and Syria and Iraq on the other.

5. His Majesty has recognised Iraq as an independent Sovereign State; therefore, no written mandate has been issued for that territory, but, in its stead, the Council of the League have accepted the undertakings of His Majesty's Government—as embodied in the Treaty of Alliance with Iraq and in a communication made to the Council by His Majesty's Government on the 27th September, 1924—as giving effect in respect of Iraq to the provisions of article 22 of the Covenant.

The mandate for Syria, issued on the 24th July, 1922, defined the degree of authority to be exercised by the mandatory Power in terms which make it clear that the duties of that Power are to render administrative advice and assistance to the population, and not, as in the case of Palestine, itself to administer the territory.

In regard to Palestine, on the other hand, the mandatory is entrusted, by article 1 of the Palestine mandate, with full powers of administration and legislation in the territory, save as they are limited by the terms of the mandate. The corresponding article of the mandate for Syria requires the mandatory to frame an organic law in agreement with the native authorities and to encourage measures to facilitate the progressive development of Syria and the Lebanon as independent States. No such obligation is placed on His Majesty by the terms of the mandate for Palestine. On the contrary, the effect of the Palestine Order in Council, 1922, which was made pursuant to the mandate, has been to set up a Government under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, as is recognised in your report of the 7th April, 1925,* where you stated that the position of Palestine in relation to His Majesty is the same as that of other Governments established by Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. The provisions of the Palestine mandate and the Palestine Order in Council, it is submitted, make it clear that the constitutional position of that territory is totally different from that of either Syria or Iraq. They show that in Palestine, as in Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland under British mandate, His Majesty as mandatory has himself assumed the government of the territory.

6. Looking at the question from the point of view of a foreign Power attempting to establish that Palestine is a foreign or third State within the meaning of British commercial treaties, there are, it seems, three passages in the Palestine mandate and the Palestine Order in Council, 1922, which might be quoted in support of such a contention. These are:—

- (1.) The provision in article 7 of the mandate requiring the Palestine Government to enact a nationality law.
- (2.) The last paragraph of the preamble to the Order in Council, by which it may be said to have been issued under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890.
- (3.) The provision in article 59 of the Order in Council which defines the expression "foreigner" in terms which include British subjects in Palestine.

7. As regards the first of these three points, it will be within your recollection that in your report of the 24th May, 1928,† to the Secretary of State for the Home

* Confidential 13004, p. 28.

† Confidential 13565, p. 16.

Department you advised that Palestine is not a "foreign State" within the meaning of Section 13 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act of 1914, and that a British subject who acquires Palestinian citizenship by naturalisation does not thereby lose his British status. It follows, then, that the status of a British subject is not separate and distinct from that of a Palestinian citizen. Moreover, if the question is regarded from the point of view of international as opposed to municipal law, it must be remembered that Palestinian citizens are British-protected persons, and that, in accordance with the second sentence of article 12 of the Palestine mandate, they are accorded British protection while resident outside Palestine. The creation of the status of Palestinian citizenship, therefore, only creates a division in the classes of individuals who look to His Majesty as the authority under whose diplomatic protection they live when in foreign countries. As both classes look to His Majesty for protection, they do not, by the mere creation of a division between them, become classes of individuals which are foreign to each other.

8. Should the fact that the Palestine Order in Council refers in the preamble to the Foreign Jurisdiction Act be advanced as an argument that Palestine is a foreign or third State within the meaning of British commercial treaties, it could be pointed out that British Protectorates are administered under Orders in Council issued under that Act. No foreign State has questioned the right of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain to accord Imperial Preference to goods emanating from Protectorates so administered.

9. Turning now to article 59 of the Palestine Order in Council, which defines the expression "foreigner" in terms which include a British subject in Palestine, it may be pointed out that the definition in that article is for the limited purposes of Part V of the Order in Council. The intention of articles 59-67 of the Order in Council is to ensure that the judicial system established in Palestine shall, in the words of article 9 of the Palestine mandate, "assure to foreigners . . . a complete guarantee of their rights." Had the guarantee for which the Order in Council provides not been extended to British subjects, those subjects would, in this matter, have been placed in a less favourable position than nationals of other States members of the League of Nations. Should it be felt that the inclusion of British subjects within the definition of the term "foreigners" in article 59 of the Order in Council would provide a foreign Power with a substantial argument in favour of the view that Palestine is a foreign or third State within the meaning of British commercial treaties, the matter could, of course, be remedied by a change in the phraseology of that article not affecting the substance.

10. If the question is regarded from the point of view enunciated in the second paragraph of this letter—that is to say, in the light of the degree of authority, control or administration exercised by the mandatory—the position in Palestine, so long as the mandate in its present terms remains in force, is, it is submitted, in all respects similar to that obtaining in the territories administered under B Mandates by His Majesty's Government in Great Britain. If and when the Palestine mandate ceases to be in force, or is modified on the ground that the territory has reached a stage at which it can be recognised as an independent nation, then Palestine would no doubt become an entity which would be a foreign or third State within the meaning of British commercial treaties. In that case, any privilege in the nature of Imperial Preference would have to be withdrawn. For that reason, should any grant of Imperial Preference be given to Palestine, it could not be extended to Transjordan, where an independent Government has been set up and is about to be formally recognised by His Majesty.

11. In these circumstances, Mr. Amery would invite you to give further consideration to the question of the extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine. In your report of the 19th June, 1925,* you pointed out that this question depended upon whether or not Palestine must be regarded as a foreign or third State within the meaning of most-favoured-nation clauses of British commercial treaties, and the view that you there expressed that internationally Palestine is an independent nation was said to follow from the fact that Palestine falls within the category of territories included in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant. In the light of the full facts, as now placed before you, it is submitted that the mere circumstance that Palestine is one of the communities referred to in the fourth paragraph of article 22 does not in itself constitute that territory a foreign or third State vis-à-vis Great Britain. It is further submitted that neither the Palestine

* Confidential 13004, p. 30.

Order in Council nor the mandate supports the view that Palestine is for any purpose a foreign State vis-à-vis His Majesty, and that, in consequence, there is not in international law any ground on which it could be contended that those documents constitute Palestine a foreign or third State within the meaning of British commercial treaties. Indeed, since it would appear that the mandatory is also the Government of Palestine, the result of holding that the Government of Palestine is a foreign State for any purpose would be somewhat of a reductio ad absurdum, seeing that it would place His Majesty in the position of being a foreign State vis-à-vis himself.

12. I am, therefore, to request you to be good enough to advise Mr. Amery whether, in view of the full facts now placed before you, you are still of the opinion that the extension to Palestine of Imperial Preference would infringe the obligations arising from the most-favoured-nation clauses of commercial treaties. Mr. Amery is all the more anxious to be assured on the point since the matter might, under an article embodied in certain recent treaties, be taken to international arbitration.

13. The draft of this letter has been referred to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and he has concurred therein.

14. Copies of the reports referred to, the Palestine Order in Council and the mandates for Syria and for Palestine are enclosed for convenience of reference.

I am, &c.

O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

List of Enclosures.

Law Officers to Foreign Office, February 18, 1921. [Confidential 11933, p. 35.]
Law Officers to Colonial Office, September 21, 1921. [Confidential 11933, p. 30.]
Law Officers to Colonial Office, January 3, 1923. [Confidential 12470, p. 17.]
Law Officers to Colonial Office, June 19, 1925. [Confidential 13004, p. 30.]
Palestine Order in Council, 1922. [Confidential 11940.*]
Mandate for Palestine. [Parliamentary 5152.]
Mandate for Syria. [Confidential 12074.*]

Report.

WE are of the opinion that the extension to Palestine of Imperial Preference would infringe the most-favoured-nation clauses of British commercial treaties, notwithstanding the arguments in favour of the contrary view set out in the Colonial Office letter of the 25th January, 1929, to which we have given careful consideration.

The declaration contained in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant is the foundation of the status of Palestine, and questions which depend upon the interpretation of the municipal laws of this country are unsafe tests of that status. The position of His Majesty in relation to Palestine, and, indeed, the whole conception of a mandated territory coming under paragraph 4 of article 22, are admittedly novel and to some extent anomalous; but a fresh consideration of the terms of the mandate, and particularly of articles 5, 7, 12 and 18 thereof, as well as of article 22 of the Covenant, confirms us in adhering to the opinions expressed in the Law Officers' Reports of the 3rd January, 1923, and the 19th June, 1925.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
February 7, 1929.

1929

12

PALESTINE.

[E 1805/204/65/1929]

No. 1^c.

[Colonial Office.]

[February 16, 1929.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, January 9, 1929.

Western or Wailing
Wall in Jerusalem, and rights of Jewish worshippers.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Amery to invite your attention to an extract from "Hansard" of the 12th November last (Enclosure A), from which it will be seen that he has stated in the House of Commons that he proposes to take the highest legal advice open to him before coming to a decision as to the action to be taken in regard to a construction erected by the Moslem authorities in Jerusalem on the top of the Western or Wailing Wall in that city.

2. A paper was recently presented to Parliament (Enclosure B) on the subject of incidents which occurred at the Western Wall on the Jewish Day of Atonement in September last. Following on those incidents, demands were made in the local Jewish press for the compulsory expropriation of the pavement in front of the wall. The Moslem, on the other hand, represented that this demand and the claims put forward by the Jews for additional and new privileges at the Western Wall are a cloak for Jewish designs on the Haram-al-Sharif. The responsible Jewish authorities, in a petition to the League of Nations, have repudiated in unmistakable terms the report that they wish "to menace the inviolability of the Moslem Holy Places." Nevertheless, the mutual recriminations in which Jews and Arabs have indulged have had the effect of removing the matter from the purely religious orbit and have made of it a political and racial question. In the atmosphere thus engendered, the Moslem authorities have asserted what they regard as their rights by continuing the construction of a building on the top of the Wailing Wall, by converting into a hospice certain houses (which are Waqf property) in the neighbourhood of the Wall, and by calling to prayer from a roof adjacent to the pavement, thereby disturbing Jewish worshippers.

3. As might be expected, the result is that either party is constantly appealing to the Government of Palestine to prevent actions taken or about to be taken by the other party, the complaint made invariably being that these actions constitute an infringement of the status quo; that is to say, that the Palestine Government are failing to carry out the obligations imposed by article 13 of the mandate to preserve existing rights.

4. In this difficult position, the Officer Administering the Government of Palestine, in paragraph 6 of his despatch of the 26th October (Enclosure C), has asked for the advice of His Majesty's Government. While the matter is not one governed entirely by legal considerations, the Palestine Government, in arriving at their decision on complaints such as those indicated above, must, in a large measure, be guided by the position as determined by the Palestine Mandate. Articles 13 and 14 of that instrument read as follows:—

"Article 13. All responsibility in connexion with the Holy Places and religious buildings or sites in Palestine, including that of preserving existing rights and of securing free access to the Holy Places, religious buildings and sites and the free exercise of worship, while ensuring the requirements of public order and decorum, is assumed by the mandatory, who shall be responsible solely to the League of Nations in all matters connected herewith, provided that nothing in this article shall prevent the mandatory from entering into such arrangements as he may deem reasonable with the Administration for the purposes of carrying the provisions of this article into effect; and provided also that nothing in this mandate shall be construed as conferring upon the mandatory authority to interfere with the fabric or the management of purely Moslem sacred shrines, the immunities of which are guaranteed."

Article 14. "A special commission shall be appointed by the mandatory to study, define and determine the rights and claims in connexion with the Holy Places and the rights and claims relating to the different religious communities in Palestine. The method of nomination, the composition and the functions of this commission shall be submitted to the Council of the League for its approval, and the commission shall not be appointed or enter upon its functions without the approval of the Council."

PALESTINE.

13

It should here be explained that, owing to the difficulty of obtaining agreement as to the composition of the commission for which article 14 of the mandate provides, effect has not yet been given to that article. The responsibility for the delay does not rest with the mandatory Power. Proposals for constitution of the commission were submitted by His Majesty's Government to the Council of the League of Nations in 1922, but they met with so much criticism, especially from the representatives of the Roman Catholic Powers (France, Italy and Spain), that it was considered desirable to withdraw them. The objecting Powers undertook to frame alternative proposals for the consideration of the Council, but they have never done so, and the question remains in statu quo.

In order to ensure that the matters to be determined by the commission should not be prejudiced by prior legal decisions, His Majesty in Council by the Palestine (Holy Places) Order in Council, 1924 (Enclosure D), ordered that: "No cause or matter in connexion with the Holy Places or religious buildings or sites in Palestine, or the rights or claims relating to the different religious communities in Palestine, shall be heard or determined by any Court in Palestine." It would appear, therefore, that, even were it considered that such an act as the construction of a building on the top of the Western Wall (which is within a Holy Place) is an infringement of Jewish rights in connexion with the Wall, the Palestine Government would not be able to apply to the courts in Palestine for an injunction restraining the Moslem authorities from continuing the construction of the building, or for any other appropriate relief.

5. Reverting now to article 13 of the mandate, it will be seen that the mandatory thereby assumes responsibility for "preserving existing rights and securing free access to the Holy Places, religious buildings and sites and the free exercise of worship, while ensuring the requirements of public order and decorum" provided that nothing in the mandate "shall be construed as conferring upon the mandatory authority to interfere with the fabric or the management of purely Moslem sacred shrines, the immunities of which are guaranteed."

6. It is common ground that—

- (1.) The Haram-al-Sharif, which is bounded on one side by the Western Wall and the surface of which is at a much higher level than the level of the pavement in front of the Wall, is a Moslem holy place;
- (2.) Legally, the Western Wall is a portion of the Haram-al-Sharif; as such, it is holy to Moslems; moreover, it is legally the absolute property of the Moslem community;
- (3.) The pavement facing the Wall is Waqf property (i.e., the subject of a Moslem charitable bequest);
- (4.) The Jews have unrestricted right of access to the pavement in front of the Wall. That they have certain rights of worship also is admitted by the Government, but contested by the Moslem authorities.

7. Copies are enclosed of a memorandum (Enclosure E) compiled in 1925 by the District Commissioner in Jerusalem, which gives the historical background of the disputes in connexion with the Western Wall, and of a memorandum (Enclosure F) prepared by the Attorney-General in Palestine setting out various facts and considerations bearing on the points at issue.

8. Mr. Amery would be glad to be favoured with your advice on the following questions:—

- (1.) Having regard to the Jewish practice of prayer, as described in Part 2 of Enclosure F, is the Western Wall to be deemed a purely Moslem shrine within the meaning of the second proviso to article 13 of the mandate for Palestine, which is quoted in this letter?
- (2.) Is the proviso to Section 23 of the Palestine Antiquities Ordinance, 1920, quoted on p. 8 of Enclosure F, inconsistent with the second proviso to article 13 of the Palestine mandate? If so, is the proviso to Section 23 of the ordinance ultra vires in view of the last paragraph of article 18 of the Palestine Order in Council, which reads: "No ordinance shall be passed which shall be in any way repugnant to or inconsistent with the provisions of the mandate"?
- (3.) Whether it will be an infringement of Jewish rights, as safeguarded by article 13 of the mandate, for the Moslem authorities to construct, either with or without the consent of the Director of Antiquities, a building which (a) altered the appearance of a part of the Western Wall but did not impede or limit in any way the Jewish practice of worship at the Wall, or (b) which is calculated to impede Jewish worship or to make access to the Wall by the Jews more difficult?

- (4.) If the answer to either part of question (3) is in the affirmative, what steps can the Palestine Government take to prevent or to put a stop to the construction of a building if its nature or position is such as to bring it within the provisions of the Holy Places Order in Council?

9. On the 26th November (see extract from "Hansard," Enclosure G) it was alleged in the House of Commons that certain acts of the Moslem authorities, including the establishment of a hospice near the Western Wall and a calling to prayer by a muezzin, constituted "infringements of the status quo at the Western Wall." Mr. Amery realises that the matters raised in the question asked in the House are not entirely governed by legal considerations. Nevertheless, he would be grateful to receive any advice which you may feel able to give him as to the test which the Palestine Government should apply in determining whether or not such acts as a calling to prayer, which disturb Jewish worshippers at the Wall, are an infringement of Jewish rights in connexion with the Wall. It will be appreciated that, even if it should be held that actions of this character infringe Jewish rights, it may be difficult for the Palestine Government to intervene effectively in the matter, since it is probable that under the terms of the Holy Places Order in Council it will not be open to that Government to apply to any court for a remedy.

In addition to an answer to the questions set out in paragraphs 8 and 9, Mr. Amery would be glad of any advice generally upon the whole matter which you may feel able to offer.

I am, &c.
O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

Schedule of Enclosures.

- (A.) Extract from "Hansard" of November 12, 1928.
(B.) White Paper on the Western or Wailing Wall (Cmd. 3229). [Parliamentary 5494.]
(C.) Despatch Confidential "A" of October 26, 1928, from the Officer Administering the Government of Palestine, without enclosures.
(D.) The Palestine (Holy Places) Order in Council, 1924. [Confidential 12137*.]
(E.) Memorandum by Sir Ronald Storrs.
(F.) Memorandum by Mr. Bentwich.
(G.) Extract from "Hansard" of November 26, 1928.

Report.

1. The Western Wall is not, in our opinion, "a purely Moslem sacred shrine" within the meaning of article 13 of the Palestine Mandate. The phrase must be read as descriptive of a place or building which is a shrine sacred exclusively to Moslems. The long-established Jewish practice of praying at the Wall and the sanctity due to the history of the lowest stratum of the fabric prevent the Wall from being exclusively sacred to Moslems.

2. We are clearly of opinion that the first and second paragraphs of the proviso to Section 23 of the Antiquities Ordinance, 1920, are inconsistent with the second proviso to article 13 of the mandate. The third paragraph may possibly be supported as a necessary provision to secure the public safety, but, on the whole, having regard to the inclusion of cases where reparation only is required, we are of opinion that this paragraph also is inconsistent with the second proviso to article 13.

3. The answer to the first part of this question depends to some extent on the nature of the erection, inasmuch as we can conceive a building of such a character as to be offensive to Jewish religious sentiment and to intrude upon the traditional right of Jews to pray at the Wall. Subject to this reservation, we answer (a) in the negative and (b) in the affirmative.

4. The Palestine Government may, in our opinion, take such police measures or executive action as may be necessary to prevent the erection of a structure which would by its nature or position interfere with the customary Jewish worship at, or right of access to, the Wall. The action taken in September last on the Day of Atonement to prevent an encroachment by Jewish worshippers on the rights of the legal owners of the Wall and pavement is an example of action which we think would be permissible in view of the responsibility cast upon the mandatory by article 13 of the mandate. Apart from such action as we have suggested above, the only step that can be taken is to amend the Holy Places Order in Council in such a way as to restore the jurisdiction of the courts to the extent which is required. Whether this step is feasible it is not within our province to consider.

5. The establishment of a hospice near the Wall and the call to prayer by a muezzin may be so provocative or challenging as to be infringements of Jewish rights at the Western Wall. It must be a question of degree in each case. If the erection of the hospice results in the observance of Moslem rites in the presence of Jewish worshippers or in an invasion by Moslems during the customary times of Jewish worship so as to cause genuine annoyance or disturbance, we should regard this as an interference with existing rights. Similarly, the nearness and the loudness of the call to prayer must be taken into consideration in estimating its effect. The Jews are entitled, in our opinion, to conduct their worship without any greater disturbance than has occurred in the past, or may be inevitable by reason of changes in the habits of the population of Jerusalem, or otherwise.

We desire to add that the general position has clearly become more difficult owing to the failure to carry into effect article 14 of the mandate. In our judgment, every possible step should be taken without further delay to secure the appointment of the special commission.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

*Law Officers' Department,
February 16, 1929.*

PORTUGAL.

[W 5328/307/36/1929]

No. 2.

[June 21, 1929.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 3, 1929.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to bring the following facts to your notice and to request that you will furnish him with your opinion on the following matter:—

2. On the 16th March, 1893, the "Companhia do Nyassa" was incorporated as a Portuguese company to take over a concession granted by the Portuguese Government by a decree of the 28th September, 1891, "to a Portuguese company to be formed in accordance with existing laws." In this connexion attention is invited to Paper (A). Article 2 of the articles of association of the "Companhia do Nyassa" stated that the company should be considered Portuguese for all purposes and should have its registered and head offices at Lisbon. It was contemplated at the time that some of the capital of the company should be obtained outside Portugal and article 32 provides for the formation of subsidiary boards of directors in foreign countries. In this connexion attention is invited to Paper (B). These articles of association were duly approved by the Portuguese Government by a decree of the 9th March, 1893. The "Companhia do Nyassa" has an authorised capital of £1,000,000 and an issued capital of £436,530 in £1 shares.

3. In virtue of the decree of September 1891 the "Companhia do Nyassa" acquired in an area of some 100,000 square miles in the northern part of Portuguese East Africa various sovereign or administrative rights; the exclusive right to construct railways, roads, &c.; the exclusive right of navigation; the exclusive right of mining, &c.; the right of acquiring land and the right of carrying on all branches of trade and industry.

[21571]

E

Grievances of "Companhia do Nyassa" and right of His Majesty's Government to intervene.

4. Article 29 of the decree of September 1891 ran as follows:—

"The Government may at the end of 25 years (subsequently altered to 35 years) reckoned from the date of the definitive contract entered into with the company in virtue of this decree and after that at the end of each period of ten years, add to, modify or revoke one or more of the dispositions of that same contract, or decree new clauses in substitution of, or to amplify the first ones, provided that the faculty thus reserved to the Government shall only be used with regard to the dispositions and clauses relative to the concession of exclusive rights, to the dominion of lands, and to the attributes of the State delegated by the Government."

5. No contract of the nature referred to in this article was in fact ever concluded between the Portuguese Government and the "Companhia do Nyassa," but the latter nevertheless entered into the possession of its concession.

6. In 1908 a British company known as "The Nyassa Consolidated Company" was registered with an issued capital of £368,844. The Nyassa Consolidated Company acquired and still holds 219,615 shares, and thereby a controlling interest, in the Companhia do Nyassa. Further, of the total debts of the Companhia do Nyassa, some £600,000 are owed directly or indirectly to the Nyassa Consolidated Company.

7. Shortly before the war a syndicate of German banks, acting at the instigation or with the assistance of the German Government, acquired a controlling interest in the Nyassa Consolidated Company. The shares in this company held by these German banks were sequestrated during the war by the British authorities. It was considered undesirable that these shares should again fall into German hands, and His Majesty's Government therefore arranged in 1918 that they should be sold by the Custodian of Enemy Property to the Union Castle Mail Steamship Company, Limited. That this arrangement was made primarily to serve British Imperial interests in East Africa and not for the benefit of the Union Castle Company is clear from the following passage in a letter written by the Colonial Office to Lord Kysant, the chairman of the Union Castle Company, on the 4th October, 1918:—

"One of the principal motives which have induced His Majesty's Government to agree to these arrangements is a desire to ensure that the control of the company in question (Nyassa Consolidated), and through that company the control of the Companhia do Nyassa, should remain permanently in British hands and in the hands of a person or company enjoying the full confidence of His Majesty's Government."

8. The Portuguese Government have for some time past made no secret of their desire to rescind the Companhia do Nyassa's concession, and on the 20th April last they published a decree announcing that as from the 27th October, 1929, all the administrative rights granted to the Companhia by the decree of 1891 would revert to the State, that all the "exclusive" commercial rights enjoyed by the Companhia under the decree of 1891 would be cancelled and that, in fact, the Companhia was to be deprived of everything except its right to carry on trade. In this connexion attention is invited to Paper (C). Lord Kysant at once complained that this action of the Portuguese Government was illegal and requested that His Majesty's Government should make representations to the Portuguese Government on his behalf, and should urge that the Companhia do Nyassa should be left in undisturbed possession of its rights. At the same time he intimated that the Union Castle Company had received an offer from a German source for the shares held by them in the Nyassa Consolidated Company, and he indicated that he would have no hesitation in accepting this offer should the Portuguese Government decline to withdraw their decree of the 20th April, 1929. This possibility of the controlling interest in the Nyassa Consolidated Company falling into the hands of a German syndicate was received with considerable apprehension by the Colonial Office, who feared lest such an eventuality might react unfavourably on British interests in East Africa. The Colonial Office, therefore, also urged that representations should be made to the Portuguese Government in the sense desired by Lord Kysant. In view of the attitude of the Colonial Office, and of the fact that His Majesty's Government were under a distinct obligation to assist Lord Kysant as far as possible, since it was at their request that he originally acquired his holding in the Nyassa Consolidated Company, the Secretary of State felt that it would be very difficult to refuse Lord Kysant's request if it could be shown that the Portuguese Government's action was in fact illegal. Steps were therefore taken in this Department fully to examine the various legal issues involved with a view to establishing to what extent Lord Kysant's contentions were justified. As a result of this examination, Sir Austen Chamberlain was advised that the Portuguese Government were acting illegally in issuing the decree of the 20th April and in announcing their intention of depriving the Companhia do Nyassa of its administrative and "exclusive" commercial rights. In the first place the Portuguese Government had no right to exercise in October next whatever powers it might possess under article 29 of the decree of 1891, since in virtue of this same article such powers could only be employed thirty-five years after the signature of the contract between the Government and the Companhia, which had not yet taken place. Furthermore, quite apart from this question of date, the power of revocation and cancellation which the Portuguese Government by the decree of the 20th April announced their intention to exercise, seemed considerably to exceed the rights conferred upon the Portuguese Government by the decree of 1891. In these circumstances, and in view of the necessity, as explained above, of assisting Lord Kysant as far as possible, Sir Austen Chamberlain has felt justified in instructing His Majesty's representative in Lisbon to inform the Portuguese Government that His Majesty's Government consider their action illegal and must request them to withdraw the decree of the 20th April and to refrain from taking any further action which might prejudice the legal rights of the Companhia do Nyassa. The Portuguese Government have been informed that should they decline to meet this request, His Majesty's Government will have no alternative but to insist on the question being referred to arbitration by the Permanent Court of International Justice, in accordance with the terms of the Anglo-Portuguese Arbitration Treaty.

9. No reply has yet been received to these representations, but it is possible that the Portuguese Government may argue that His Majesty's Government have no right to intervene on behalf of the Companhia do Nyassa, since the latter is a Portuguese company. The Secretary of State is anxious to obtain your advice as to the best method of meeting such an argument, which has indeed already been advanced unofficially by the Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs.

10. The rule hitherto adopted in such cases by His Majesty's Government is that a State can only offer diplomatic support to its own nationals, and in the case of companies, to companies created by its own law. In a report addressed by the Law Officers to this Department on the 4th November, 1925,* with regard to the claim on behalf of the Standard Oil Company in respect of the destruction of certain oil wells in Roumania, it is stated that this rule is a recognised maxim of international law. The only exception to this rule, hitherto admitted by His Majesty's Government, and supported by some international authority, occurs when it can be shown that the interests of the shareholders, as distinct from those of the company, are directly affected. In such cases a State may intervene on behalf of shareholders who are its own nationals, even if the company in question is a foreign company. The most usual instance of this exception is when a company has by reason of certain actions ceased to be a going concern and has gone into liquidation, so that the company's assets really belong to its creditors and shareholders. An example of such an instance is afforded by the Delagoa Bay Railway Company case, when as you will be aware His Majesty's Government successfully intervened with the Portuguese Government in respect of the infringement by the latter of a concession granted to a Portuguese company in which a British company held the majority of the shares.

11. It may be possible to argue on the facts of the present case that the "Companhia do Nyassa" is covered by this exception and that the Portuguese Government have deprived the Companhia of its privileges and rights to such an extent that it is unable to carry on as a going concern, in which case His Majesty's Government would be justified in making representations to the Portuguese Government on behalf of the British shareholders. It is not, however, certain that this contention could be established.

12. The Secretary of State, however, is anxious to learn whether it would not be possible to argue, as an alternative contention, that an exception to the general rule that a State cannot properly intervene on behalf of a company, which although some or all of its capital is held by its nationals, is not of its own nationality, can be made when the action of which such a company complains has been taken by the State to which the company does in fact belong. Such an argument appears reasonable since if this exception were not allowed, then there would be no body properly capable of supporting the rights of such a company and therefore of the shareholders against the offending State, the injury being done by that State in which in international law the right of protection is vested.

* Confidential 13004, p. 33.

13. This exception is consistent with the action taken in the Delagoa Bay Railway Company case, where His Majesty's Government intervened with the Portuguese Government on behalf of a Portuguese company. Nor is it inconsistent with the attitude adopted by His Majesty's Government in two recent cases of importance—the "Romano-Americana Company" case, and the "Armes automatiques Lewis" case. In these cases His Majesty's Government resisted intervention by the United States Government against them on behalf of Roumanian and Belgian companies respectively. In the memorandum of the Assistant Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office, which was one of the papers laid before the Law Officers in connexion with the case of the Standard Oil Company, the following passage occurs:—

"An examination of the cases where States have in the past achieved recognition of a right to intervene on behalf of such companies leads to the conclusion that the right is limited to two classes of cases:—

"(a.) Where the company is being unjustly treated by its own national State and has no remedy in its national courts (the cases are nearly all instances of the exercise of sovereign rights by the company's national State resulting in the actual or virtual destruction of the company and consequent loss to the shareholders of their capital invested in it).

"(b.) Where the company is being actually (or is in a condition where it must be) wound up and its assets distributed proportionately amongst the shareholders (on the ground that in these circumstances the shareholders have an equitable right to their share of the corporate property, a right which does not come into existence so long as the company is continuing to carry on business).

"In all the cases I have been able to find, where the right to intervene has been successfully asserted, both these sets of circumstances have existed simultaneously and both have been relied upon in support of the right."

For convenience of reference a copy of the reference to the Law Officers in the case of Standard Oil Company and their report thereon and of the memorandum above referred to are submitted in paper D.

14. The Secretary of State realises that there is no direct authority for this argument, but he feels that such an argument would stand a chance of success before an arbitral tribunal because it seems to meet the real requirements of international intercourse. He would, therefore, be glad if you would take this matter into consideration and if you would inform him whether there is any reason why, in the present case of the "Companhia do Nyassa," His Majesty's Government should not contend that under the rules of international law they have the right to intervene with the Portuguese Government in connexion with the alleged grievances of a Portuguese company, in which the capital is mainly British owned, when the State, whose action is complained of, is Portugal.

15. In considering this matter the effect of the principle involved, if this contention should be admitted, must not be lost sight of.

While it is true that in this case His Majesty's Government will be contending that they have a right to intervene in connexion with the wrongs done to a Portuguese company, in which the participation of foreign capital in the company was clearly contemplated as being necessary for the object for which the company was created and where the capital was in fact mainly British owned, it may be said that if the principle of intervention in such cases is admitted, it is not easy to see any clear limit to its operation based on the amount of capital owned by nationals of the State claiming to intervene. On the other hand, if the principle is not admitted, British capital in foreign companies may be without means of redress in cases where it is the State in which the company is incorporated, which is responsible for the action complained of and where that action, though very injurious to the interests of the British shareholders, just falls short of reducing the company to liquidation.

16. The following papers are enclosed herein:—

- (A.) A translation of the Portuguese Government's decree of the 28th September, 1891.
- (B.) A translation of the Articles of Association of the Companhia do Nyassa. [W 5328/307/36/1929.]
- (C.) A translation of the Portuguese Government's decree of the 20th April, 1929. [W 4047/307/36/1929.]

- (D.) A copy of a letter from this Department to the Law Officers of the Crown of the 20th July, 1925, and a copy of the Law Officers' report of the 4th November, 1925, together with a copy of a memorandum dated the 6th March, 1925, by the Assistant Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office. [Confidential 13004, pp. 33-37.]

I have, &c.

A. W. A. LEEPER.

Report.

We observe that it may be possible to argue on the facts of the present case that the Companhia do Nyassa is unable to carry on as a going concern, and we agree that, if this could be established, His Majesty's Government would be justified in making representation to the Portuguese Government on behalf of the British shareholders. The Delagoa Bay case and the Salvador Commercial Company case would be precedents for such action.

2. With regard to the proposed alternative contention, we are of opinion that it would be difficult, but not impossible to argue. We assume that the Portuguese Government by its Decree of the 20th April, 1929, has infringed the legal rights of the Companhia, and that the Decree was an act of sovereign power against which the Companhia has no redress by Portuguese law, so that, unless diplomatic protection can be afforded, there will be a denial of justice. The protection would have to be afforded to the Companhia and not to the British shareholders, since no interests of the British shareholders distinguishable from those of the Companhia or opposed to those of the other shareholders have emerged. From this point of view it seems to us that neither of the two cases mentioned in paragraph 1 of this Opinion would afford a satisfactory precedent.

A claim which could have been framed on the lines suggested was put forward by the American Government against the Austro-Hungarian Government arising out of the alleged injustice done to an Austro-Hungarian Company involving losses to American shareholders in such company. We are not aware of the grounds on which such claim was formulated.

A similar claim was made by the French Government. (A reference to these cases is to be found in the 27th Report of the International Law Association at page 379.)

In both cases the Austro-Hungarian Government objected to the validity of the intervention, and both cases were settled amicably so that no decision was ever given.

So far as we are aware there is no authority establishing the right of intervention on behalf of a foreign corporation, so long as the corporation remains a going concern and the interests of the group of shareholders seeking protection remain identified with the general interests of the corporation. On the other hand, we do not think that the limits of the right of intervention in such cases have been so clearly laid down or defined as to render it impossible to argue that a State has a right to afford diplomatic protection to a foreign corporation where—

- (i) nationals of the State are very substantially interested in the corporation;
- (ii) grave injury has been inflicted on the corporation by a wrongful act of its own State;
- (iii) the corporation has no other means of redress.

3. With regard to the consideration referred to in paragraph 15 of Mr. Leeper's letter, we would point out that questions of policy are concerned upon which we are not competent to express a useful opinion.

If the suggested exception (viz., that intervention on behalf of a Portuguese corporation can be allowed because the wrong complained of has been committed by the Portuguese Government) were admitted, it is obvious that the effects might be far reaching.

If His Majesty's Government were to interfere with the rights of a British company, without bringing it to an end, the principle contended for would apparently justify the right of foreign Governments to intervene.

This might produce serious results.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
J. B. MELVILLE.

Law Officers' Department,
June 21, 1929.

TURKEY.

[E 4767/28/44/1929]

No. 2^d.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[August 10, 1929.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Claim of the Imperial Ottoman
Bagdad
Railway Company against His Majesty's Government in respect of Concession granted to the Company by Turkey in 1903.

ARTICLE 65 of the Treaty of Lausanne (with Turkey) provides inter alia that all "identifiable property, rights and interests," situate in territory detached from the Ottoman Empire under the Treaty, which, after being subjected by the Ottoman Government to an "exceptional war measure," were at the date of the Treaty in the hands of a contracting Power exercising authority over the said territory, shall be restored to their legitimate owners in their existing State.

A Protocol (No. XII), which was annexed to the Treaty, provides that the contracting Powers "being desirous of settling by agreement questions relating to certain concessions granted in the Ottoman Empire" agree that concessionary contracts entered into between the Ottoman Government and nationals (including companies) of the Allied Powers shall be maintained (Article 1).

Article 4 provides that these concessionary contracts are to be "put into conformity with the new economic conditions" (this provision is described in the Protocol, as a provision for "readaptation").

Article 6 provides that beneficiaries who at the date of the Protocol have not begun to put their concessions into operation cannot claim readaptation: they may claim cancellation of their concessions with compensation for survey and investigation work.

Article 9 subrogates the State acquiring any territory detached from Turkey under the Treaty to the rights and obligations of the Ottoman Government under concessionary contracts granted before the 29th October, 1914, to nationals of Allied Powers and companies in which the capital of Allied nationals is preponderant.

Article 10 applies to such concessions inter alia the provisions of Articles 1, 4 and 6 already mentioned.

The general effect of these provisions is that under Article 65 of the Treaty the legitimate owners of any property, rights and interests situate in detached territory are entitled to have it returned in its existing state, provided—

- (a.) That it has been subjected to an exceptional war measure by the Ottoman Government,
- (b.) That it is in the hands of a contracting Power,
- (c.) That it can be identified,

And, under the Protocol, concessions in detached territories granted to Turkish Companies in which Allied capital was at the material date preponderant, if they have been begun to be put into operation, are maintained and have to be readapted to meet the new economic conditions.

The Bagdad Railway Company possessed a concession granted to them before the war, and questions arose as to the extent of their rights under the Treaty.

The Law Officers (the present Lord Chancellor and the present Attorney-General) advised on the 17th October, 1927,* that the material date for the purposes of the Protocol was the 30th October, 1918, and as at that date the greater part of the capital of the Bagdad Railway Company was held by enemy subjects, the Company were not entitled to have their concession maintained. They further advised, that under Article 65 of the Treaty the Company were entitled to the restoration of any immovable property physically situate in Iraq, "but that the provisions of Article 65 do not apply to rights which were conferred on the Company by the concession but have not been exercised."

The High Commissioner of Iraq asked whether the concluding words of this Opinion were to be taken as meaning that the Law Officers considered that rights conferred by the concession which had been exercised by the Company ought to be restored. Certain railway services had in fact been operated by the Company on a small portion of railway in Iraq constructed before the war, and the question raised by the High Commissioner was whether the Company were entitled to claim the right to continue to operate a service over that portion of line.

* Confidential 13403, p. 17.

TURKEY.

A further Case was accordingly submitted to the present Law Officers, who advised on the 10th December, 1928,* that where rights conferred on a concessionaire have been exercised in whole or in part the concessionaire has rights which are not limited to the return of the physical property involved divorced from the right of user, and that the Bagdad Railway Company were entitled under Article 65 of the Treaty to rights with regard to the future running of traffic over the part of railway worked by them before the war.

This opinion of the Law Officers gives rise to extremely difficult and serious questions touching a number of concessions in the detached territories. The view had hitherto been held and acted upon that concessionary rights fell exclusively under the Protocol and that Article 65 of the Treaty dealt merely with tangible property as opposed to contractual rights. This view was considered to be justified both by the construction of the Treaty and the other instruments annexed to or forming part of it and by dicta in the judgments of the International Court in relation to the Mavrommatis Concessions. One sentence from the judgment of Mr. J. B. Moore, the American representative on the Tribunal, may be cited by way of illustration, at p. 72 of the Recueil des Arrêts, "There can be no doubt that the Protocol was understood by the contracting parties to cover the entire subject of concessions." Moreover, although there is no case expressly dealing with concessionary contracts, the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal at Constantinople have shown a marked tendency to restrict the provisions of Article 65 to tangible property and to exclude anything in the nature of abstract rights.

If the view hitherto held be wrong, it would seem that any concessionaire who had before the war exercised in whole or in part the rights conferred on him by his concession is entitled to demand restoration of at any rate some part of those rights, even though, by reason of the fact that he is an enemy subject, his concession is not maintained by the Protocol. In some cases indeed his position may well be more advantageous than that of a concessionaire falling under the Protocol, since under the Treaty there are no provisions for readaptation. In many cases it would be practically impossible to disentangle the rights in fact exercised by the concessionaire from the general rights conferred by the concession. For example, the concessionaire under a mining concession may have surveyed his area, is he for that reason only to have the right to exploit the area, or is his right merely to continue his survey? The accompanying letter from the Colonial Office explains in detail the practical difficulties which ensue.

There is also, it is respectfully urged, a consideration which, apart from any general question of the construction of the Treaty documents, precludes this construction of Article 65, namely, the fact that one condition precedent to the right to demand restoration under Article 65 is that the property or right must be "in the hands of a contracting Power." It seems difficult to maintain that where a concessionaire had before the War a concession which gave him the right, e.g., to operate a railway, that concessionary right can ever be said to be "in the hands of" the Power which now exercises authority over the territory in question, since its right to operate railways arises by title paramount and is not dependent on any concession; nor, it is submitted, is it material that it has itself prevented the concessionaire from operating the railway. To prevent the carrying out of a contract is not to step into the shoes of the original contractor and is essentially different from the taking of his rights into one's own hands.

List of Papers.

- (a.) Law Officers' Opinion, October 17, 1927. [Confidential 13403, p. 17.]
- (b.) Law Officers' Opinion, December 10, 1928. [Confidential 13565, p. 23.]
- (c.) Mr. J. H. Hall (Colonial Office) to Mr. C. Stuart King (Treasury Solicitor's Department), January 14, 1929 (Extract). [E 253/28/44/1929.]
- (d.) Treaty of Peace with Turkey and other instruments. [Cmd. 1929. (Treaty 1681.)]
- (e.) British Agent, Anglo-Turkish Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, Constantinople, to Treasury Solicitor, July 25, 1929 (with enclosures). [E 4802/28/44/1929.]

* Confidential 13565, p. 23.

TURKEY.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

We have had under our consideration further arguments and information with regard to this matter which were not before our predecessors when they advised in December 1928, and more particularly two decisions of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal given in the cases of the Heirs of Mrs. T. B. Rees and H. J. Whittall (Smyrna International Ferry) v. Turkish Government, and R. F. Whittall v. Turkish Government and Others. It appears to us that these two decisions are very material and justify us in reconsidering the whole matter ab initio, as indeed we understand our predecessors were not unwilling to do; and without expressing any opinion on the advice given by our predecessors on the 10th December, 1928, on the information then before them, we think that in view of the adoption by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal of the principles laid down in these decisions a claim by the Bagdad Railway Company to have restored to them under Article 65 of the Treaty of Lausanne any rights conferred by their concession in Iraq, whether in part exercised or not, ought not to be entertained.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
J. B. MELVILLE.

Law Officers' Department,
August 10, 1929.

1930

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(13925)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1930.

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

FRANCE.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	Dec. 22, 1930	Repayment in paper francs, instead of gold, of investments of British holders of French Rentes..	1

GENERAL.

1 ^A	Law Officers and Mr. E. J. MacGillivray [Board of Trade]	Aug. 2, 1930	Musical Copyright Bill: conflict with international treaty obligations	4
----------------	---	--------------	--	---

GERMANY.

2	Law Officers ..	Jan. 6, 1930	German reparation obligations: effect of Young Plan on question of sanctions.. ..	11
---	-----------------	--------------	---	----

IRAQ.

2 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	June 16, 1930	Exemption from taxation in Iraq of date gardens of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah	15
----------------	--------------------------------------	---------------	---	----

PALESTINE.

2 ^B	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	May 28, 1930	Dead Sea salts concession and question of arbitration	21
2 ^C	Attorney-General .. [Colonial Office]	Aug. 5, 1930	Application by Palestine for loan under Colonial Development Act	24

RUSSIA.

2 ^D	Attorney-General and Mr. H. V. Willink [Board of Trade]	Oct. 22, 1930	Form of guarantee by Soviet trade representative in London of contracts of Russian State economic organisations	26
----------------	--	---------------	---	----

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1930.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ABB—CON.

A.

Abbiati, 22.
Agreement. See Treaties.
Arbitration: claim for payment of British holders of French Rentes in gold francs instead of paper, 1-3.
" ditto; as to arbitration on basis of equity and justice, and not of strict law, 2, 3.
" immunity from taxation of date gardens in Iraq of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah, 15-19.
" ditto; bearing of provisions of Anglo-Iraq Treaty of 1922 on reference to arbitration, 15-19.
" liability for costs on losing party, 22, 23.
" Dead Sea salts concession, 21-23.
" claims arising out of disorders in Syria, 22, 23.

B.

Bills of exchange: for exports from United Kingdom to Russia: form of guarantee, 26-30.

C.

Claims: State may not claim pecuniary indemnity for damage suffered by private person on territory of foreign State unless he is a national of claimant State, 21, 22.
" arising out of disorders in Syria; as to arbitration, 22, 23.
Colonial Development Act: loan to Palestine Government under, 24, 25.
Compensation: pecuniary, for damage suffered by private person on territory of foreign State, 21, 22.
" ditto; a State may not put forward claim unless injured person is its national, 21-23.
Concessions: granted by Government of ceded or conquered territory; practice in regard to, not yet part of system of international law, 23.
" ditto; reasonable principles for dealing with, 23.
" Dead Sea salts, 21-23.
Conventions. See Treaties.

5951 [5699]

COP—GUA.

C—(contd.).

Copyright: Act, 1911; whether section 4 is contrary to treaty obligations, 7.
" Musical Copyright Bill a breach of treaty obligations, 10.
" scope of "protection" accorded by international conventions, 9, 10.
" British legislation providing for grant of compulsory licences; whether conflicting with treaty obligations, 4-10.
" national treatment under Copyright Convention of 1908, 7-10.
" convention. See Treaties.
Costs: liability of losing party in arbitration case, 22, 23.
Courts: submission by U.S.S.R. to jurisdiction of, in regard to matters covered by Commercial Agreement, 1930, 26-29.
" submission of foreign sovereign or sovereign State to jurisdiction of, 29.
" ditto; submission has not effect of rendering liable to execution any property belonging to the foreign Government within the jurisdiction, 29.
cy: payment to British holders of French Rentes in paper, and not gold, francs, 1-3.

D.

Dawes Plan. See Reparation.
Dead Sea: salts concession, 21-23.
Duff Development Company v. Kelantan Government, 27, 29.

E.

Exports: to Russia from United Kingdom; guaranteeing of bills of exchange, 26-30.

G.

Germany: default in reparation obligations. See Reparation.
" sanctions. See Reparation.
Guarantee: Soviet, in respect of payments for exports from United Kingdom to Russia, 26-30.

1930

(iv)

IND—REP.

I.

Indemnity. See Compensation.
Iraq: responsibility of Government for obligations incurred by its predecessor, 17.
" taxation of date gardens of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah, 15-19.
" See also Arbitration.
Treaties.

J.

Jurisdiction. See Courts.

K.

Koweit (Sheikh of): exemption from taxation of date gardens in Iraq, 15-19.
" " immunity from taxation as consequence of his independent sovereignty, 18, 19.

L.

Licences: for public performance of copyright works. See Copyright.
Lloyd's Banking Company v. Ogle, 27.
Loans: French Rentes; repayment of investments of British holders in paper francs instead of gold, 1-3.
" ditto, ditto; question of arbitration on basis of equity and justice, 2, 3.
" British, to Palestine Government, 24, 25.
" ditto; whether the condition that materials bought out of loan should be purchased in Great Britain is permissible under article 18 of Palestine Mandate, 24, 25.

M.

Mandate: Palestine, whether article 18 allows British loan to Palestine on condition that materials purchased should be purchased in Great Britain, 24, 25.
Mohammerah (Sheikh of): exemption from taxation of date gardens in Iraq, 15-19.
Musical Copyright Bill. See Copyright.

P.

Palestine: loan to, under Colonial Development Act, 24, 24.
" See also Mandate.
Palestine Potash (Limited), 22, 23.

R.

Rentes. See Loans.
Reparation: German obligations; sanctions in event of default, 11-15.
" ditto; provisions as to sanctions in Treaty of Versailles, 11, 13-15.

REP—YOU.

R—(contd.).

Reparation: German obligations; whether Versailles Treaty sanctions can be applied to Young Plan default, 14, 15.

S.

Salts. See Dead Sea.
Sanctions. See Reparation.
Sovereign: submission to jurisdiction of foreign courts, 29.
Soviet Union: submission to jurisdiction of British courts in regard to matters covered by Commercial Agreement of 1950, 26-29.
" " form of guarantee for payment of bills of exchange in respect of exports to Russia, 26-29.
" " extent of responsibility for transactions of Russian State economic organisations, 26, 28, 30.
State: acknowledgment of contractual rights and obligations of its predecessor, 17.
" damages suffered by private person on territory of foreign State. See Claims.
" submission to jurisdiction of foreign courts, 29.

T.

Taxation: of date gardens in Iraq of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah, 15-19.
Trade: Soviet delegation in London; guaranteeing of export transactions, 26-30.
Treaties: Anglo-Iraq, 1922; reference to arbitration under provisions of articles 4, 10 and 17, 17-19.
" Anglo-Soviet Commercial Agreement, 1930, 26.
" ditto; bearing of, on submission by U.S.S.R. to jurisdiction of British courts, 26-29.
" international copyright conventions; scope of protection accorded by, 4-10.
Treaty of Lausanne. See Treaty of Peace (Turkey).
Treaty of Peace (Germany): provisions regarding sanctions in event of default in German reparation obligations, 11, 13-15.
" " ditto, whether applicable to Young (Reparation) Plan, 14, 15.
" " (Turkey): Treaty and Concessions Protocol do not cover Dead Sea salts concession, 23.
Treaty of Versailles. See Treaty of Peace (Germany).

U.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. See Soviet Union.

Y.

Young Plan. See Reparation.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN. &c.: 1930.

FRANCE.

[W 13751/37/17/1930]

No. 1.

[December 22, 1930.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

(Immediate.)

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 17, 1930.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Henderson, to request your advice in the following matter:—

2. On four occasions during the war the French Government, with the approval and consent of His Majesty's Government, issued prospectuses in this country inviting subscriptions to French loans. Copies of the prospectus of the issue made in November 1915 are sent herewith (Paper (A)), and it may be assumed that, so far as is material, the other prospectuses are in similar terms. It will be observed that the prospectus is an invitation for applications for 5 per cent. Rentes, capital and interest to be exempt from all French taxes, present and future, the price of issue being expressed as £3 4s. per 100 fr. nominal capital (being the equivalent at the exchange of 27·50 of 88 fr., the price at which the loan is "being issued in Paris"). The prospectus requires applications to be accompanied by a deposit of 7s. per 100 fr. applied for and to be sent to the Bank of England. The amount payable in respect of each 100 fr. was required to be paid in four instalments, each of which was expressed in terms of shillings. Provision was made for the whole amount to be paid up in full at the time of application if desired by a single payment of £3 3s. 6d. in respect of each 100 fr. applied for; in the case of some of the later issues there was no provision for payment by instalments. The issues were in the form of bonds which might, at the option of the holder, be inscribed in the "Grand livre de la dette publique" of France.

3. Some £60½ million worth of these Rentes were taken up by British investors. The French Government have been, and are, paying the interest upon them in paper francs, and the question has arisen whether under the terms of issue the French Government are entitled to pay the British investors, both as regards capital and interest, in paper francs at the current rate of exchange.

4. Continued representations on the subject have been made to His Majesty's Government by a committee of British holders of French war bonds, of which the Right Honourable Edward Shortt, K.C., is chairman, and in July last His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris was instructed to address a note to the French Government urging that "an equitable measure of compensation" should be granted to the British holders of these Rentes. Copies of the note and of the French Government's reply (with translation) will be found annexed (Papers (B) and (C)).

5951 [5699]

B

Repayment in paper francs of investments of British holders of French
Rentes, and
question of arbitration.

5. It will be seen that the French contention as to the legal position is that no distinction can be drawn between the French Rentes issued in London and those issued in Paris, and that, as the bonds issued in London are denominated solely in francs without any stipulation being included as to payment in gold francs or as to the adoption of a basis of gold value, the obligations of the French Government are discharged by a payment in paper francs. It has always been recognised, and the contrary is not contended by the representatives of the bondholders, that there is no case to be made in strict law for holding the French Government bound to pay on a gold basis, and it is not necessary to trouble the Law Officers with this point. On the other hand, it is felt that, if the case be regarded from the broader point of view of equity and justice, strong arguments can be brought against the French contention. These arguments are set out in a note prepared for the use of the British delegation at The Hague Reparation Conference in 1929, copies of which are enclosed (Paper (D)).

6. In view of the pressure which is being exercised by the representatives of the bondholders, and to implement the promise given to Mr. Shortt by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is accordingly thought desirable to make an attempt to have the question settled by means of an arbitration on the basis, not of strict law, but of equity and justice. It is realised that the consent of the French Government is, in the circumstances, necessary, both for the reference of the matter to arbitration at all and for the arbitration taking place on the suggested basis. These points are fully dealt with in a minute by the Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office, copies of which are sent herewith (Paper (E)).

7. The draft of a note, which it is proposed should be addressed to the French Government, is sent herewith for your consideration (Paper (F)). Your attention is particularly directed to the passage in paragraph 3 of the note which sets out the proposed terms of reference. It will be observed that it is proposed that the arbitrator should be asked to decide—

"The basis on which, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, it would be just and equitable that the interest on and the principal of the French Rentes issued in the United Kingdom in the years 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918 should have been and should be paid."

8. The object of the proposed terms of reference is, of course, to enable the matter to be dealt with on a wide basis of equity, and, in particular, to enable His Majesty's Government to rely upon the arguments set out in Paper (D) and on any similar arguments which can be adduced.

9. In these circumstances, I am to request you to take the enclosed papers into your consideration and to favour Mr. Henderson with your opinion upon the following points:—

- (i) Whether the terms of reference proposed in paragraph 3 of the draft note to the French Government are sufficiently wide to ensure that the arbitration would be conducted on a broad basis of equity and justice, and not on one of strict law, and, in particular, whether under such terms of reference it would be open to His Majesty's Government to employ the arguments suggested in Paper (D) and any other arguments of this nature which may be available to them?
- (ii) If your answer to question (i) is in the negative, what form of words would be sufficient and appropriate for the purpose indicated above?
- (iii) Generally, whether the terms of the draft note are suitable for the purpose in view? and
- (iv) Whether, assuming that the consent of the French Government can be obtained to suitable terms of reference, the case of His Majesty's Government is one which can reasonably be put forward?

Mr. Henderson would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer.

10. The matter is one of considerable urgency, since the first of the loans in question is repayable next month, and it is therefore desired to address the proposed communication to the French Government at the earliest possible date. Mr. Henderson would therefore be grateful to receive your opinion at your early convenience.

I have, &c.
C. HOWARD SMITH.

List of Papers.

- (A) Prospectus of London Issue of National Defence Loan of the Government of the French Republic, issue of 5 per cent. Rentes, dated November 29, 1915. [W 13498/37/17/1930.]
- (B) Note addressed to the French Government by His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris on July 24, 1930. [W 7650/37/17/1930.]
- (C) Reply (with translation) of the French Government to the above note, dated October 28, 1930. [W 11357/37/17/1930.]
- (D) Note prepared for the use of the British Delegation at The Hague Reparation Conference in 1929. [W 13498/37/17/1930.]
- (E) Minute by the Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office, dated July 21, 1930. [W 7566/37/17/1930.]
- (F) Draft of note which it is proposed should be addressed to the French Government. [W 13498/37/17/1930.]

Report.

1. In our opinion the terms of reference contained in paragraph 3 of the draft note might with advantage be widened in two respects:—

- (a) In order to ensure admittance of the argument set out in paragraph 5 (b) of Paper (D), which, not having any direct relation to the issue or redemption of the bonds, might be held not to be one of "the circumstances of the case."
- (b) In order that the powers of the arbitrator should not appear to be limited to deciding only a basis of payment as distinct from a basis of compensation.

2. In our opinion the following form of words would be sufficiently wide to ensure that the arbitration would be conducted on a broad basis of equity and justice, and not on one of strict law, and to permit of the employment by His Majesty's Government of the arguments suggested in Paper (D): "Who should be asked to decide the equitable and just basis upon which, having regard to all circumstances affecting the case and to international custom in such cases, the payment of interest on and repayment of capital of the French Rentes issued in the United Kingdom in the years 1915, 1916, 1917 and 1918 should have been and should be made."

3. The general terms of the draft note are suitable for the purpose in view.

4. Upon the terms of reference set out in paragraph 2 of this letter the case of His Majesty's Government is one which can reasonably be put forward.

We would also desire to draw your attention to the fact that the draft note, no doubt designedly, does not refer to the arbitrator anything more than the correspondence which has passed on the subject. You have no doubt assured yourself that the arguments available on behalf of His Majesty's Government are set out in the correspondence with sufficient fullness and cogency.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
R. STAFFORD CRIPPS.

Law Officers' Department,
December 22, 1930.

GENERAL.

[W 10283/929/43/1930]

No. 1^A.

[Board of Trade.]

[August 2, 1930.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.

THE following papers are sent herewith:—

Musical
Copyright
Bill: conflict with international treaty
obligations

- (1) Report of Select Committee.
- (2) Musical Copyright Bill.
- (3) Cd. paper 4467 containing—
 - (a) Original Berne Convention 1886.
 - (b) Revised Berne (Berlin) Convention 1908.
- (4) Convention of Rome 1928.

The Law Officers will no doubt remember that the Musical Copyright Bill was referred to a Select Committee and that the Committee made a special report reporting the Bill without amendment.

This report contains the following paragraphs:—

"18. Your committee consider that such a monopoly" (i.e., a super-monopoly of the monopolies in regard to the public performance of musical works conferred upon composers by the Copyright Act, 1911) "can abuse its powers by refusing to grant licences upon reasonable terms so as to prejudice the trade or industry of persons carrying on business in this country and to be contrary to the public interest and that it should be open to those persons to obtain relief in respect of such abuse by appeal to arbitration or to some other tribunal. This should apply only in those cases where the ownership or control of copyright has been transferred to an association.

"19. It has been suggested to your committee that any legislation to give effect to this proposal would be contrary to the terms of the revised Berne Copyright Convention of 1908. There appears, however, to be considerable difference of opinion upon the matter and your committee recommend that His Majesty's Government should consider whether such legislation would conflict with the treaty obligations of this country, and if so, should make a reservation or declaration which would permit of such legislation before ratifying the Rome Copyright Convention of 1928."

For the purpose of further consideration of this matter the Board of Trade now desire to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the question whether the legislation suggested by the Select Committee would conflict with the existing obligations of His Majesty's Government under the revised Berne (Berlin) Convention of 1908 and the obligations to be assumed upon ratification of the Rome Copyright Convention of 1928.

By article 2 of the Revised Berne (Berlin) Convention, 1908, the expression "literary and artistic works" is defined to include:—

"any production in the literary, scientific or artistic domain, whatever may be the mode or form of its reproduction such as (inter alia) musical compositions with or without words"; and by the same article it is provided that:—

"The contracting countries shall be bound to make provision for the protection of the above-mentioned works (i.e., as defined above)."

By article 11 it is provided (inter alia) that:—

"The stipulations of the present convention shall apply to the public representations of dramatic or dramatico-musical works, and to the public performance of musical works, whether such works be published or not";

GENERAL.

and by article 13 that authors of musical works shall have the "exclusive right" of authorising the adaptation thereof to instruments which can reproduce them mechanically.

The attention of the Law Officers is called to the difference in the language of articles 2 and 13.

By the former it is provided that:—

"The contracting countries shall be bound to make provision for the protection of the above-mentioned works (i.e., as defined above).

"Works of art applied to industrial purposes shall be protected so far as the domestic legislation of each country allows."

By the latter it is provided that:—

"The authors of musical works shall have the exclusive right of authorising—

- "(1) The adaptation of those works to instruments which can reproduce them mechanically;
- "(2) The public performance of the said works by means of these instruments.

"Reservations and conditions relating to the application of this article may be determined by the domestic legislation of each country in so far as it is concerned; but the effect of any such reservations and conditions will be strictly limited to the country which has put them in force."

It is, amongst other things, provided by article 4 of the convention as follows:—

"Authors who are subjects or citizens of any of the countries of the Union shall enjoy in countries other than the country of origin of the work, for their works, whether unpublished or first published in a country of the Union, the rights which the respective laws do now or may hereafter grant to natives as well as the rights specially granted by the present convention.

"The enjoyment and the exercise of these rights shall not be subject to the performance of any formality; such enjoyment and such exercise are independent of the existence of protection in the country of origin of the work. Consequently, apart from the express stipulations of the present convention, the extent of protection, as well as the means of redress secured to the author to safeguard his rights, shall be governed exclusively by the laws of the country where protection is claimed."

Under the Copyright Act, 1911, the composer, or his assignee, enjoys the sole right to authorise the performance of his copyright work in public (sections 1 (2) and 5 (2)) and both civil and summary remedies against any unauthorised performance are provided (sections 2, 6 and 11). Consequently, the copyright owner has an unrestricted right to fix the terms upon which he will authorise public performance of a work. The Rome Convention of 1928 contains similar provisions to those of the revised Berne (Berlin) Convention of 1908 quoted above.

The suggestion of the committee that in certain circumstances an appeal to arbitration against the terms demanded by the copyright owner is in reality a suggestion for statutory provision for the grant of compulsory licences in respect of the rights of public performance in musical works at a price and on the terms fixed by the arbitrator.

The Musical Copyright Bill, which the Select Committee was considering, contained in clauses 2 (c) and 3 provisions which in effect resulted in the grant of a compulsory licence at a fixed charge of two pence. As will be seen, the committee report against this proposal, but when the Bill was being considered a statement was put in by the Board of Trade on the question (inter alia) whether the principle of a compulsory licence is a contravention of the stipulations of the revised Berne (Berlin) Convention of 1908. This statement was as follows:—

"15. The main principle underlying clauses 2 (c) and 3 of the Bill is that of a compulsory licence in respect of performing rights, in so far as they are retained, with a compulsory limitation of the royalties which the copyright owner may demand. The only limitation placed upon such rights in the 1911 Act is that contained in section 4, which provides that if at any time after the death of the author of a literary, dramatic or musical work which has been performed in public complaint is made to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the copyright owner has refused to allow the performance in public of the work, and that by reason of such refusal the work is withheld from the public, the owners of the copyright may be ordered to grant a licence to perform the work in public, on such terms and subject to such conditions as the Judicial Committee may think fit. So far as is known, no case under this section has arisen. This section as originally drafted provided that application for a compulsory licence should be made to the Comptroller of Patents, but the proposal aroused strong opposition in the House of Commons, and in committee the section was altered to its present form, which substantially reproduces section 5 of the Literary Copyright Act of 1842. It is difficult, however, to see how this section can apply to a foreign copyright owner, since the necessary petition could not be served upon a person outside the jurisdiction.

"16. The first question which arises on this clause is whether in principle it is a contravention of the stipulations of the revised Berne Copyright Convention of 1908.

"17. The relevant stipulations of that convention are to be found in article 11, paragraphs 1 and 2, which read: 'The stipulations of the present convention shall apply to the public representation of dramatic or dramatico-musical works and to the public performance of musical works, whether such works be published or not. Authors of dramatic or dramatico-musical works shall be protected during the existence of their right over the original work against the unauthorised public representation of translations of their works.'

"18. Article 4 of the convention stipulates that authors of one country of the Union shall enjoy in the other countries of the Union the same rights as native authors as well as the rights specially granted by the convention. Apart from the express stipulations of the convention, the extent of protection, as well as the means of redress secured to the author to safeguard his rights, are to be governed exclusively by the laws of the country where protection is claimed.

"19. This question, which depends mainly upon the interpretation to be given to the word 'protection,' was discussed at considerable length at the Conference of the International Union held at Rome in 1928, without any decision being reached.

"20. On the one hand, the view was expressed that the convention merely stipulated for national treatment as regards performing rights, and that, as long as no distinction was made between nationals and foreigners, the protection to be given under article 11 might be limited by a compulsory licence, since the extent of protection was to be determined by the law of the country where protection was claimed.

"21. On the other hand, it was argued that, although the extent of the author's rights in respect of public performance might vary according to the law of the country where protection was claimed, the convention required that the rights so given must be the author's sole rights, and must not be exercised without his consent. For instance, the extent of performing rights might be limited by not giving protection against the performance in public where admission was free, or when the receipts were for a charitable object and the performers were not paid, but to whatever extent protection was given against unauthorised public performance it must not be further limited by imposing a compulsory licence.

"22. A third theory was that nothing in the convention could interfere with the right of any State to take measures to prevent abuse of monopoly rights, and delegates supporting this view objected to any amendment of the convention which might cast doubt upon such theory.

"23. Delegations of British countries had, in fact, submitted to the conference amendments of article 11 intended to reserve in general terms the rights of the countries of the Union to prevent possible abuse arising from the exercise of performing rights, but they did not receive the unanimous approval of the conference, which is essential to any amendment of the convention.

"24. It is clear from the discussions at Rome that some, at any rate, of the parties to the convention would regard a compulsory licence as inconsistent with British obligations under the convention. If any of these countries had signed the optional clause of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, it would be able, after the signature of this country has been completed by ratification, and in the event of the Bill becoming law, to bring the question before the Permanent Court, in which case a definite decision on the question would be given. Pending such a decision, it could not be assumed that the Permanent Court would hold that the grant of compulsory licences which is the effect of clause 3 would not contravene the terms of the convention in so far as the Bill applies to the performance in public of works originating in the countries of the Copyright Union other than the United Kingdom. If the grant of compulsory licences is so limited as to place foreign composers in a better position than British composers, this may be thought to be unfair, and may in practice leave the position of the music user substantially unchanged."

Oral evidence was also given by representatives of the Board of Trade before the Select Committee and an explanation was asked for as to what actually took place at Rome, and the following statement was made elaborating paragraph 23 quoted above:—

"Before we went to Rome, we were aware of circumstances similar to those which exist at present and we felt that it might be advisable, before the Government ratified a new convention, that we should be able to place in the hands of the Government power to deal with such a situation, with the least damage to composers' rights. We were quite aware that there were two views of the convention; one being that the national treatment is the basis of the convention, and that there should be no limit in respect of national treatment; so long as national treatment is given to foreigners there can be no complaint; the other being that, national treatment or not, the Government under the convention undertakes to protect the rights of the authors and composers; and protection limited by a compulsory licence is no protection. Those were the two views of which we were aware. So we tabled an amendment of article 11. The only amendment of article 11 tabulated prior to the conference was that submitted by His Majesty's Government, which read as follows: article 11 deals with performing rights, and this was an addition to article 11: 'Nevertheless, the right to regulate the exercise of the right of authorisation of public performance so as to prevent such abuse of monopoly rights, arising from the refusal of the author to grant permission for the public performance of his work upon reasonable terms, as would prejudice the trade or industry of any person or class of persons carrying on business in any country to which the convention applies, and would be contrary to the public interest, is reserved for the domestic legislation of each country.' That amendment was put forward by His Majesty's Government because it was felt that if such an abuse of monopoly as that defined in the proposed amendment did arise in this or any other convention country, the public sense of grievance and the demand for a remedy would be such that action might be taken which would be detrimental to the interests of British authors generally. It was therefore considered prudent, in accepting afresh the obligation to grant foreign authors the very valuable rights mentioned in this article, to retain if possible the liberty to take measures for the prevention of the abuse, but in such a way as to reduce the prejudice to authors' rights to the minimum.

"141. Was that supported by any countries? Yes.

"142. Which countries? It was attacked from both sides. Norway attacked it from the point of view that, so long as national treatment was given, it did not matter what the national treatment was, France objected to it on the other side, from the other point of view. It was supported by, I believe, most of our Dominions."

As stated above in paragraph 23, the amendment proposed was not accepted.

Apart from the provisions of section 3 of the Act relating to reproductions for sale after the expiration of the first twenty-five years of the period of protection, the only limitation on the right of a copyright owner at present imposed under our municipal law is that contained in section 4 of the Act of 1911, whereby provision is made for the grant by the Judicial Committee of a compulsory licence in cases where, after the death of an author, the copyright owner has refused to allow performance in public.

As stated above in paragraph 15, no case, so far as is known, has arisen under this section. In the circumstances, the question has never arisen as to whether this statutory provision is contrary to our treaty obligation.

The Law Officers will see that the question is one as to the interpretation to be given to the word "protection" in article 2 of the convention, that is to say, whether it means protection which must be in no way restricted or controlled by the municipal law of a contracting State, or only such protection as such law provides for native authors.

If the true view is that, in the absence of any express stipulation in the convention that the authors of musical works are to have the "exclusive right" of authorising the public performance of their works, similar to that appearing in article 13 of the Revised Berne (Berlin) Convention and in articles 8, 11 bis (1), 13 (1) and 14 of the Rome Convention of 1928 in respect of other rights, obligations to give more than national treatment are not imposed, then legislation of the kind suggested by the Select Committee would probably not be inconsistent with the conventions.

The history of the matter may be important and is as follows:—

In the original Berne Convention of 1886, article 9, paragraph 3, read as follows:—

"The stipulations of article 2 shall apply equally to the public performance of unpublished musical works, and of published works as to which the author has expressly declared upon the title-page or at the commencement of the work that he forbids their public performance."

Since article 2 of the convention of 1886 stipulated only for the rights granted by the national laws to natives, it is clear there was no other obligation under the convention of 1886 than to give national treatment (putting aside the questions of formalities and of term of protection—see paragraph 2 of the article) and even that was made subject to the condition of a printed notice on the work. There was, in fact, no obligation to give any protection to performing rights if the national law made no provision therefor.

At the Conference of the International Copyright Union in 1896 Germany proposed to insert in the convention a provision which would have made it illegal to impose a compulsory licence upon the performing rights in musical works, but this proposal was lost owing to the opposition of Switzerland, whose national law at that date imposed a compulsory licence upon such rights.

The 1908 conference abolished the requirement of the printed notice, and by the insertion of the third paragraph of article 2, it became essential that some protection should be given to performing rights by every country of the Union.

The provision for a compulsory licence in the Swiss Law continued in operation after Switzerland had ratified the convention of 1908, and was not repealed until 1922.

In support of the view that there was no intention to grant an "exclusive right," the following extract from the Report of the Drafting Committee, in regard to the new article 11, may be quoted:—

"Toutefois, il ne faut pas que les compositeurs de musique, dont le droit se trouve ainsi mieux affirmé, croient que, désormais, leurs œuvres ne pourront plus être exécutées publiquement dans le territoire de l'Union sans leur autorisation. Ils ont à compter avec les législations nationales, qui peuvent, dans des conditions déterminées, autoriser cette exécution, et auxquelles, sur ce point, se contente de renvoyer la convention de 1886 ainsi que notre projet." Cd. 4467 of 1909, page 137.

On the other hand, no agreement to amend article 11 could be obtained at the conference in Rome in 1928, and certain countries are strongly opposed to any interpretation of the convention which would permit of the application of a compulsory licence to authors' rights (unless, of course, specifically permitted by the convention, as in paragraph 2 of article 11 bis and paragraph 2 of article 13). In fact, the French delegation at Rome threatened to refuse protection to British works during the last twenty-five years of copyright, on the ground that during that period French works are subject to the compulsory licence in respect of reproduction for sale which is contained in Section 3 of the Copyright Act, 1911.

It being clear from the discussions at Rome that some, at any rate, of the parties to the convention would regard a compulsory licence as inconsistent with British obligations under the convention, any of these countries who have signed the optional clause of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice might, in the event of the Bill becoming law, bring the question before the Permanent Court.

In the circumstances, the Board of Trade feel unable to accept the responsibility of advising His Majesty's Government to introduce the suggested legislation so long as this country is bound by article 11 of the Convention of 1908 or 1928, unless the Law Officers of the Crown are able to advise His Majesty's Government that they could defend the consistency of such legislation with the Conventions of 1908 or 1928 before the Permanent Court.

The Law Officers of the Crown are accordingly asked to advise—

- (1) Whether the stipulations of the Revised Berne (Berlin) Convention of 1908, in respect of the public performance of musical works, impose an obligation to give more than national treatment, provided that the national law gives reasonable protection.
- (2) If so, whether legislation, providing that where an association owning or controlling performing rights in musical works creates an abuse of monopoly by refusing to grant licences upon reasonable terms so as to prejudice the trade or industry of persons carrying on business in this country, contrary to the public interest, those persons should be entitled to apply for the grant of a compulsory licence on appeal to arbitration or to some other tribunal, would be inconsistent with the provisions of that convention.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. E. J. MacGillivray.

WE are of the opinion that the obligation imposed by article 2 of the convention "to make provision for the protection of the above-mentioned works," requires the grant of an exclusive right in respect of the reproduction of the work in its original form.

The protection demanded is "protection of the rights of authors over their literary and artistic works." The rights are to be those which are granted to natives by the law of the country where protection is claimed, and the extent of protection and means of redress are to be regulated by the same law. If the question turned on the construction of the first four articles of the Berlin Convention standing alone, we should be of opinion that no exclusive right was demanded, and that the convention would be satisfied if the author had no more than the right to receive compensation for the use of his work under a compulsory royalty system.

We are of opinion, however, that many provisions in the remaining articles of the convention and in the Rome Convention are inconsistent with that conclusion, and point definitely to the exclusive right of the author to reproduce his work in its original form as a basic principle of the conventions.

There are a number of provisions which expressly sanction the qualification of the exclusive right, and thereby compel the inference that primâ facie that right exists.

Article 9, paragraph 2, of the Convention of Berlin provides that, with the exception of serial stories and tales, any newspaper article may be reproduced by another newspaper, unless the reproduction is forbidden. Paragraph 1 of the same article provides in terms that serial stories, tales and all other works, whether literary, scientific or artistic, whatever their object, published in the newspapers and periodicals of one of the countries of the Union may not be reproduced in the other countries without the consent of the authors. It is clear that it cannot have been intended by this article to give a greater measure of protection to any work published in a newspaper than the same work would have had published separately. We read this paragraph as meaning that publication in a newspaper is not to deprive a work of that full measure of protection to which it is primâ facie entitled, that is to say, that it may not be reproduced in other countries without the author's consent.

Article 10 of the Convention of Berlin provides that the convention does not affect the liberty of extracting portions from literary or artistic works for use in educational works, &c., which is permitted by domestic legislation. This special provision seems to assume that, primâ facie, absolute protection against any unauthorised reproduction of a work or any substantial part thereof is demanded.

Article 2 bis, paragraph (1), of the Convention of Rome provides that the right of partially or wholly excluding political speeches and speeches delivered in legal proceedings from the protection provided by the preceding article is reserved for domestic legislation. This also points to absolute protection against any unauthorised reproduction as the basic principle upon which these exceptions are grafted. Paragraph (2) of the same article gives further clarity to the matter in the concluding words "nevertheless the author shall have the sole right of making a collection of the said works."

It will be observed that the right, protection for which is demanded by article 2, does not prima facie extend beyond the right of reproducing the work in its original form. Further rights are specifically demanded by subsequent articles. Article 8 of the Berlin Convention demands in respect of translations that the authors shall enjoy during the whole term of the right in the original work the exclusive right of making or authorising a translation of the work. It would be unreasonable to suppose that a foreign author was to have an exclusive right to produce an English translation, but that the original work in a foreign tongue might be reproduced without his authority on payment of a royalty under a compulsory licensing system. Article 14 of the Berlin Convention provides that an author shall have the exclusive right of authorising the reproduction of his work by cinematography. The right is unqualified by any provision permitting reservation and conditions to be imposed by domestic legislation, and, again, it seems unreasonable to suppose that this unqualified monopoly would be demanded in respect of reproduction by cinematography if the same unqualified monopoly was not assumed in respect of reproduction of the work in its original form.

In some cases where protection is demanded in respect of reproduction of the work in some form other than its original there is a special provision permitting the qualification of the exclusive right by reservations and conditions imposed by the domestic legislature. This is to be found in article 13 of the Berlin Convention (reproduction in mechanical contrivances) and article 11 bis of the Convention of Rome (communications by radio). The inference is that, where there is no provision permitting such reservations and conditions, an absolute monopoly is demanded, and we cannot think that the convention can be construed as demanding an absolute monopoly in respect of the reproduction of the work in certain forms other than the original and yet permitting by inference reservations and conditions qualifying the right in respect of the reproduction of the work in its original form.

In our opinion, some assistance may also be derived from article 16 of the Convention of Berlin, which provides that "pirated works may be seized by the competent authorities of any country of the Union where the original work enjoys legal publication." It is not conclusive, but it seems more consistent with a demand for an absolute monopoly than a demand for no more than a qualified right which permitted unauthorised reproduction on payment of a royalty.

It may be worth while in this connexion drawing attention to the legislation in Canada. The Canadian Copyright Act, 1921, contains provisions for the granting of compulsory licences if the owner of the copyright has not printed the book in Canada (sections 13, 14, 15 and 27). Objections were made that these sections contravened the provision of the convention in depriving a foreign author belonging to a Union country of the unconditional and unqualified protection to which he was entitled. These objections prevailed, and an amending Act was passed in 1923 providing that these sections shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject (other than a Canadian citizen) or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the Convention of Berlin and the Additional Protocol of the 20th March, 1914.

In our opinion, article 2 of the Berlin Convention demands an exclusive right in respect of the reproduction of a musical work in its original form, and article 11 demands the same exclusive right in respect of the public performance of the work. The protection demanded is against any unauthorised public performance. No qualification of that protection is permitted to the domestic legislature, and in our opinion an Act containing any provisions similar to those contained in the Musical Copyright Bill would constitute a breach of our treaty obligations.

WM. A. JOWITT.
J. B. MELVILLE.
E. J. MacGILLIVRAY.

Law Officers' Department.
August 2, 1930.

GERMANY.

[C 408/56/18/1930]

No. 2.

[January 6, 1930.]

Foreign Office Memorandum for the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE advice of the Law Officers is requested on the question whether the sanctions which the Treaty of Versailles provides for in the case of a default by Germany upon her Reparation obligations will continue to be applicable in the event of a default by Germany on her obligations under the Young Plan.

German
reparation obligations:
effect of Young Plan on question of sanctions.

2. The Treaty of Versailles provided for the appointment of the Reparation Commission which was constituted as the exclusive agency of the Creditor Governments for receiving and distributing the Reparation payments to be made by Germany. The Commission had to determine the amount of damage for which Germany was responsible and to draw up a schedule of payments for discharging the entire obligation. Under the Treaty of Versailles, therefore, Germany's Reparation obligation consisted of a schedule of payments laid down by the Reparation Commission. As regards sanctions, the Treaty provided that the Reparation Commission should forthwith give notice to each of the interested Powers of any German default and make such recommendations as it thought necessary; and the Commission could decide that a default had occurred by a majority. (Part VIII, Annex II, paragraph 17.) The Treaty continues (paragraph 18) :—

"The measures which the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to take in case of voluntary default by Germany, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances."

Article 430 further provides that

"in case . . . the Reparation Commission finds that Germany refused to observe the whole or part of her obligations under the present Treaty with regard to reparation, the whole or part of the areas specified in Article 429" (i.e., the Rhineland) "will be reoccupied immediately by the Allied and Associated forces."

3. The French Government interpreted the Treaty provisions as permitting the Allied Powers to act individually, and to take measures going beyond "economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals" or anything of the same character. On this interpretation they occupied the Ruhr in January 1923 without the consent of the British Government.

4. The London Agreements of the 30th August, 1924, putting into effect the Dawes Plan, did not abrogate the Treaty provisions which had given rise to the Ruhr occupation, but contained provisions intended to prevent any repetition of isolated action on the part of individual Powers. They provided that if the Reparation Commission declared (or refused to declare) a German default by a majority, any member of the Commission could appeal to an independent Arbitral Commission of three whose decision would be final. It was further provided that for the purposes of the Dawes Plan an American citizen (not representing the United States Government) should be appointed as an additional member of the Reparation Commission. Finally, if a default* was declared under the above conditions, the Allied Governments were to confer at once on the nature of the sanctions to be applied and would safeguard any specific securities pledged for the Dawes Loan. Further, the London Agreement contained the following clause (Annex IV, Article 5): "Unless otherwise expressly stipulated in the preceding Articles of this Agreement, all the existing rights of the Signatory Governments under the Treaty of Versailles read with the Report of the (Dawes) Experts are reserved."

* Such a default was defined by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald (House of Commons, the 5th August, 1924) as being a "default which is a serious one and which comes before the Reparation Commission as a large German default, a flagrant default, a default which cannot be judged to be a mechanical default, a default about which it can be alleged (and about which evidence can be presented) 'This could not have taken place unless there were a conspiracy in high places to throw off obligations undertaken in August 1924 by the German Government to put this Report into operation.' " This definition was accepted by the Heads of the Allied Delegations at the London Conference and by Herr Marx on behalf of Germany on the 7th August, 1924.

5. The Dawes Plan did not purport to be a final settlement of Germany's obligations. It laid down annuities which would be accepted in full satisfaction of Germany's obligations for reparation and other Treaty charges so long as the Dawes Plan was in force, but did not fix the number of years for which the annuities should be paid. The Young Plan, on the contrary, is intended as a complete and final settlement of Germany's obligations.

6. A copy of the Young Plan is attached (Paper (A)), but for the purposes of the present reference it is thought that the following summary of the relevant provisions of the Plan will be sufficient. The Plan fixes 59 annuities to be paid by Germany in full discharge of her obligations for reparation and other Treaty costs. It provides that the relations between Germany and the Reparation Commission shall come to an end, and that the annuities shall be paid to the new Bank for International Settlements, to which will be transferred such of the functions of the Reparation Commission as continue to exist under the Young Plan.

7. The Young Plan deals in a number of passages with the commercial character of Germany's obligations under it, and the nature of the security for the payments, but it is completely silent on the question of the application of sanctions in the event of a default by Germany on her obligations under the Plan. These two questions appear to be quite distinct; for example, a mortgage on a house constitutes security for an ordinary commercial debt in private life, while imprisonment for failure to pay debts constitutes a sanction.

As regards security, the Experts record their view (paragraphs 101 and 102 of the Report) "that the basis of security for the payment of the annuities is the solemn undertaking of the German Government to which no further guarantee can add anything whatsoever."

"The Committee accordingly recommends that the Creditor Governments should take steps to release all controls, special securities, pledges or charges which may remain in their hands other than those specifically referred to above, and should recognise that their acceptance of the solemn undertaking of the German Government replaces any securities, pledges, charges or controls as may in fact exist." Thus the Young Plan abolishes the Industrial Bonds and the Railway Bonds provided for by the Dawes Plan; the payment of the assigned revenues to the Allied Commissioner will cease and all that will be required is that these revenues should be kept free of any prior charge or from any second charge not approved by the International Bank. The Agent-General for Reparation Payments will cease to exist and there will no longer be foreign members of the German Railway Company and of the Industrial Bank. Most important of all, the Commission and foreign Directors of the Reichsbank, whose duty was to ensure that the currency and credit policy of Germany should be so directed as to facilitate the transference of Reparations, are to be withdrawn. These changes are described in paragraph 161 of the Plan as the "attainment of financial autonomy" by Germany.

The Plan contains numerous references to the assimilation of the Reparation Debt to a commercial obligation, freedom from interference and supervision, and the liquidation of all political controls. The following passages illustrate this.

Paragraph 21, in referring to the International Bank, says that "its members shall engage themselves to banish the atmosphere of war, to obliterate its animosities, its partisanships, its tendentious phrases, and to work together for a common end in a spirit of mutual interest and goodwill."

In paragraph 31, the Young Committee state that they are recommending a scheme of annuities that are "closely assimilated to commercial and financial obligations; it carries with it welcome freedom from interference and supervision."

In paragraph 32, they refer to "machinery of a non-political character in the realm of general finance," and to "a system of handling the annuities in a way which, so far as it leads to their commercialisation, would remove them from the sphere of inter-Governmental relations."

In paragraph 38, they refer to "the problem of substituting authority of an external financial and non-political character for the present machinery and controls of the Dawes Plan."

In paragraph 52, they refer to the need for a banking institution which "makes logical the liquidation of all political controls and provides instead machinery essentially commercial and financial in character, which carries with it all the support and at the same time all the responsibilities that economic engagements imply."

In paragraph 76, they refer to Germany as "undertaking a responsibility identical in its nature with the solemn covenants of a debtor on a commercial and financial basis."

In paragraph 148, they refer to the "creation of the Bank for International Settlements in order to provide machinery for the removal of the Reparation obligation from the political to the financial sphere" and to the procedure "necessary in order to assimilate this obligation as closely as possible to an ordinary commercial obligation."

In paragraph 166, the Experts say "the organisation and machinery of the Dawes Plan were based on the conviction that it must find its proper guarantee in the interest of all parties to carry it out in good faith. In aiming as it did at the transference of the Reparation payments from the political to the economic and business sphere, it presumed constant co-operation between debtor and creditor alike. The new system goes further along the same road, replacing the collaboration of separate administrative and Governmental organisation by common work in a wholly financial institution, in the management of which Germany is to take an appropriate part."

In paragraph 137 of the Annexes, the Experts said that "the financial service of these mobilisable or mobilised portions of the annuities shall constitute a final, absolute, and unconditional international obligation in the ordinary financial sense of the word."

8. A further point of importance is that Germany's obligation under the Plan replaces her previous obligations.

Paragraph 96 of the Plan states that, "as from the date of the putting into force of this Plan, Germany's previous obligation shall be entirely replaced by the obligation laid down in this Plan."

9. These passages show that the effect of the Young Plan is to replace Germany's obligations under the Treaty, which were of a political character, by her obligations under the Young Plan, which are of a commercial and financial character. It will be seen that, in the view of the Young Committee, the commercial character to be given to the German obligation would improve the security of the debt. The Treasury, however, for the reasons explained in a memorandum, of which an extract is attached (Paper (B)), consider that, despite the language of the Plan, the Reparation debt must to a large extent remain a political debt, and that accordingly the view that the security would be improved by the quasi-commercial character given to it is open to serious doubt.

10. There is no reference whatsoever in the Plan to what would happen if Germany were to default on these commercial obligations or whether it was intended that the sanctions applicable in the event of default under the Treaty of Versailles should continue to be applicable in the event of default under the Young Plan. On this latter point divergent views have been expressed by the French and English lawyers who have so far had to consider the question.

11. The view of the English lawyers is that the putting into force of the Young Plan will put an end to the possibility of the application in accordance with the Treaty of Versailles of the sanctions provided for in paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII and Article 430, unless special provision is made for the application in given circumstances of the sanctions in question. Their view is that since under paragraph 96 of the Plan (see paragraph 8 above) Germany's previous obligation is to be "entirely replaced by the obligation laid down in this Plan," it will no longer be possible for Germany to default "in the performance of any obligation under this part of the present Treaty" (see paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II), or to refuse "to observe the whole or part of her obligations under the present Treaty with regard to Reparation" (Article 430). This view may be supported by the consideration that since the Young Plan provides for the discharge of the whole of Germany's financial obligations resulting from the Treaty of Versailles, whether under the head of Reparation or under the other provisions of the Treaty, it will no longer be possible to say that any particular default by Germany in the performance of her obligations under the Young Plan is a default in respect of Reparation. Moreover, since an essential condition of the application of the sanctions provided by the Treaty of Versailles is a finding of Germany's default by the Reparation Commission, it would not be possible for the sanctions in question to be applied unless either the Reparation Commission were continued in existence for this particular purpose, or its functions in this respect were transferred to some other body, such as the Bank for International Settlements. No such provision exists in the Young Plan. This view is developed in the note dated the 5th December (Paper (C)) by Sir John Fischer Williams, the British member of the Legal Service of the Reparation Commission, who will be the Legal Adviser of the British Delegation at The Hague, and in a letter (Paper (D)), dated the 12th December, from the Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office to Mr. Leith-Ross, of the Treasury.

12. The only statement of the French view which is at present in the possession of His Majesty's Government is contained in a note (Paper (E)), dated the 28th December, by M. Lyon, the French member of the Legal Service of the Reparation Commission, who will be the Legal Adviser of the French Delegation at The Hague. Generally speaking, the French view appears to be that the experts who prepared the Young Plan had no authority to deal with the question of the application of the Versailles sanctions, and that it is inconceivable that the acceptance of their Report can have the effect of terminating the possibility of such sanctions. The effect of the adoption of the Young Plan will not be to replace the existing obligation of Germany by a new one, but to substitute new machinery for its discharge for that already existing, and, therefore, the sanctions provided by the Treaty in the case of a default by Germany will remain applicable in the event of a default by her in the payments contemplated by the Young Plan. The French view is understood to be that even though no specific provision were made for the continuance of the functions of the Reparation Commission in relation to a default by Germany, the Commission would still theoretically remain in existence and could be called upon to act in the event of such default.

13. In these circumstances the Law Officers are requested to advise whether, in the event of no reference being made to sanctions in the instruments by which the Young Plan is put into force, it will still be open to the Creditor Powers to avail themselves of the provisions of paragraph 18 of Annex II to Part VIII and of Article 430 of the Treaty of Versailles. In view of the fact that The Hague Conference reassembles to-morrow and that the question is almost certain to come up at an early stage, the Secretary of State would be most grateful if he could receive the Law Officers' opinion at the earliest possible date.

Foreign Office, January 2, 1930.

List of Papers.

- (A.) Copy of the Young Plan [Cmd. 3343].
- (B.) Extract from a Treasury Memorandum, dated December 10, 1929. [C 9521/1/18]
- (C.) Note by Sir John Fischer Williams, dated December 5, 1929. [C 9521/1/18]
- (D.) Letter from Mr. Malkin, Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office, to Mr. Leith-Ross, of the Treasury, dated December 12, 1929. [C 9521/1/18]
- (E.) Note by M. Lyon, dated December 28, 1929. [C 57/56/18/1930]

Report.

As a matter of strict legal interpretation, we do not consider that the provisions of the Article referred to will be available to the Creditor Powers in the event specified. In arriving at this opinion we are guided by the following considerations:—

- (a.) The Young Plan, herein differing fundamentally from the Dawes Plan, is designed to replace entirely the previous obligations undertaken by Germany.
- (b.) The omission of any statement regarding sanctions in the instruments by which the Young Plan is put into force would be doubly significant in view of the presence of such a statement in the Dawes Plan.
- (c.) The sanctions provided for under paragraphs 17 and 18 of Annex II to Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles arise only in the event of failure to perform an obligation "under this Part of the present Treaty."

Any failure there may be to carry out the obligations of the Young Plan will not be a failure to perform an obligation under Part VIII of the Treaty of Versailles, and will therefore not be a failure "under this Part of the present Treaty."

- (d.) The sanctions provided for by Article 430 can be taken advantage of only in the event of a finding by the Reparation Commission as provided in the Article. In view of the Young Plan, no such finding will in future be possible, as the Reparation Commission is to cease to exist, and this notwithstanding that some of its functions are to be transferred to the proposed International Bank.

For the above reasons we express the opinion that, if it is still desired to retain such sanctions as those provided for by the Treaty of Versailles, an express statement to this effect must be incorporated in the Young Plan.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
JAS. B. MELVILLE.

Law Officers' Department,
January 6, 1930

[E 3301/1192/93/1930]

No. 2^d.

[Colonial Office.]

[June 16, 1930.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, May 17, 1930.

I AM directed by Lord Passfield to state that he desires to refer to you certain questions regarding the exemption from taxation of certain date gardens the property of the Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah in Iraq.

Exemption from taxation of date gardens of Sheikhs of Koweit and Moham-merah in Iraq.

1. In November 1914, in order to ensure the assistance of the Sheikh of Koweit in connexion with the military operations then proceeding against the Turks in the Persian Gulf, a letter dated the 3rd November, 1914, was addressed by the Resident and His Britannic Majesty's consul-general in the Persian Gulf to the Sheikh of Koweit in which he was promised inter alia that the date gardens then in his possession situate between Fao and Qurnah should remain in his possession and in possession of his descendants without being subject to payment of revenue or taxes. A copy of the letter is enclosed—(Paper A). On the 21st November, 1914, a letter (copy enclosed herewith—Paper B) was addressed by the British Resident in the Persian Gulf and His Majesty's consul-general for Fars to the Sheikh of Mohammerah in which he was also promised that in consideration for the assistance he had rendered to the British Government the date garden he then possessed on the Turkish side of the Shatt-el-Arab should remain in full possession of himself and his heirs and immune from taxation. The date gardens referred to in these letters are situated in territory which has now become part of Iraq.

2. On the 10th October, 1922, a Treaty of Alliance between Great Britain and Iraq was signed at Bagdad, a copy of which is enclosed—(Paper C). Ratifications were exchanged at Bagdad on the 19th December, 1924. Article 1 of the treaty provides that His Britannic Majesty shall be represented in Iraq by a High Commissioner. By article 4 of the treaty the King of Iraq without prejudice to the provisions of articles 17 and 18 of the treaty agrees to be guided by the advice of His Britannic Majesty tendered through the High Commissioner on all important matters affecting the international and financial obligations and interests of His Britannic Majesty for the whole period of the treaty. His Majesty the King of Iraq also agrees that he will fully consult the High Commissioner on what is conducive to a sound financial and fiscal policy and that he will assure the stability and good organisation of the finances of the Iraq Government so long as that Government is under financial obligations to the Government of His Britannic Majesty.

By article 10 of the treaty the high contracting parties agree to conclude separate agreements to secure the execution of any treaties, agreements or undertakings which His Britannic Majesty is under obligation to see carried out in respect of Iraq. His Majesty the King of Iraq undertakes to bring in any legislation necessary to ensure the execution of these agreements.

This article also provides that such agreements shall be communicated to the Council of the League of Nations.

By article 17 of the treaty any difference which may arise between the high contracting parties as to the interpretation of the provisions of the treaty is to be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

3. On the 26th March, 1924, Sir H. Dobbs, the High Commissioner for Iraq, communicated to the Prime Minister of Iraq by letter a list of the treaties, agreements and undertakings which His Majesty's Government considered were referred to in article 10 of the treaty and requested that he might receive an official reply notifying the concurrence of the Government of Iraq. A copy of this letter is enclosed—(Paper D). It will be observed that in this letter no reference is made to the agreements with the Sheikh of Koweit or the Sheikh of Mohammerah regarding the exemption from taxation of their date gardens.

On the 17th April, 1924, Mr. Davidson, the counsellor to the High Commissioner for Iraq, wrote to the Prime Minister of Iraq pointing out that in the letter of the 26th March no reference was made to the obligations to the Sheikh of Koweit and Mohammerah that their date gardens should always be exempt from taxation, on the ground that the matter was a minor obligation in respect of Iraq which the British Government contracted at the very commencement of the campaign for the liberation of Iraq in 1914. A copy of this letter is enclosed herewith—(Paper E). Mr. Davidson also pointed out that the High Commissioner felt sure that the Iraq Government would recognise the obligation as a debt of honour to those who helped in the campaign in its early and most doubtful stages and that in view of the difficulties of settling the matter at that juncture His Britannic Majesty's Government had decided not to include these obligations to the sheikhs concerned among the agreements covered by article 10 of the treaty, unless the Iraq Government desired to do so, and that the matter might be reserved for subsequent settlement between the two Governments. On the 10th July, 1924, the Prime Minister of Iraq replied (copy attached—Paper F) to the letter dated the 26th March, 1924, stating that the Iraq Government had accepted the agreements, treaties and obligations referred to in article 10 of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty and mentioned in the High Commissioner's letter of the 26th March, 1924. It will be observed that in this letter no reference is made to Mr. Davidson's letter of the 17th April, 1924, as to the obligation to exempt the date gardens of the two sheikhs from taxation.

The Iraq Government did, however, continue to accord exemption from taxation of the date gardens in question and the matter was not reopened by the Iraq Government until December, 1926, after the lapse of more than two years.

On the 10th August, 1927, the secretary to the Council of Ministers informed the secretary to the High Commissioner that the provisions of the organic law were clear as to the necessity of collecting the tax and that it was impossible to continue the exemption except by a special law and that it was doubtful whether the law would be passed having regard to the political and economic conditions of the country (a copy of the letter is enclosed herewith—Paper G).

4. On the 14th December, 1927, a new Anglo-Iraq Treaty was entered into, but such treaty has not been ratified and has not entered into force. At the time of the negotiation of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty of the 14th December, 1927, the Iraqi delegates asked for and were furnished with a memorandum containing a list of the British international obligations in respect of Iraq. The promises given to the two sheikhs of immunity from taxation in respect of their date gardens in Iraq were mentioned in the memorandum and no objection to the terms of that memorandum was raised by the Iraqi delegates during the course of the negotiations. His Majesty's Government had therefore reason to conclude that the Iraq Government were prepared to recognise the obligations to the two sheikhs, though they had not expressly stated that they were willing to do so or expressly accepted the memorandum as an accurate statement of British international obligations in respect of Iraq.

It was not until the middle of last year that it again became evident that the Iraq Government were unwilling to honour these obligations.

The matter had in the meanwhile been considered by the Financial Mission appointed by the Secretary of State in March 1925 to enquire into the financial position and prospects of the Government of Iraq, and such mission recommended that the Government of Iraq should withdraw any claim that the obligation to the two sheikhs should be made a charge upon Great Britain. (See Cmd. 2438, paragraph VIII of appendix at pp. 61 and 62, copy enclosed—Paper H.) It will be observed that the revenue involved is stated to have originally amounted to 87,000 rupees per annum, and that the amount has since been increased by a change in the rate of taxation to 1,20,000 rupees per annum.

The total amount of taxation remitted by the British Government between 1914 and 1920 was 6,12,048·8 rupees, namely, in respect of the properties of the Sheikh of Koweit 4,04,998·2 rupees and in respect of the properties of the Sheikh of Mohammerah at 2,07,050·6 rupees.

While the taxes not collected by the Iraq Government between 1921 and 1923 amount to 8,49,030·4 rupees, namely, 5,65,086·14 rupees on the Sheikh of Koweit's garden and 2,83,943·6 rupees on the Sheikh of Mohammerah's garden.

5. Apart from any definite treaty obligations on the part of the Iraq Government to honour these obligations it appears to Lord Passfield that there are other considerations which justify the contention of His Majesty's Government that the Iraq Government should continue to honour these obligations.

In the first place Iraq was captured from the Turks at great cost to the British nation and the territory so captured has been handed over to the new state of Iraq, and the obligations given by His Majesty's Government to the two sheikhs were only a very small part of the price paid by His Majesty's Government for victory in Iraq.

In the second place in the general financial settlement between His Majesty's Government and Iraq which was effected as from the 1st April, 1921, the Iraq Government took over all the assets of the civil administration (with the exception of certain assets derived from military expenditure, vote of credit, or army funds) and assumed responsibility for all civil charges in the future in return for the assumption by His Majesty's Government of responsibility for the net deficit of the civil administration on the 31st March, 1921. It is accordingly open to contention that the liability to continue to accord exemption from taxation to the two sheikhs in accordance with the promise made to them on behalf of His Majesty's Government was one of the liabilities for which the Iraq Government assumed responsibility in this general settlement.

Thirdly, although Lord Passfield understands that it cannot be said that there is any definite accepted rule of international law which automatically subrogates a succeeding State to the contractual rights and obligations of its predecessor, modern usage of nations has tended to the acknowledgment of such obligations, and his Lordship understands that it is the generally accepted practice that on the transfer from one State to another of responsibility for the administration of any area the State to which the responsibility is transferred should, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, at the same time take over the contractual assets and liabilities attaching to the area in question.

It would appear, therefore, that it could fairly be contended that, when the responsibility for the administration of Iraq passed from His Majesty's Government to the Iraq Government the latter Government ipso facto assumed responsibility for continuing the exemption from taxation promised to the two sheikhs.

6. Having regard to all the circumstances, it appears to Lord Passfield that there are good reasons from the point of view of equity, international practice and treaty obligations for contending that the undertakings given to the two sheikhs are obligations which the Iraq Government are bound to implement, and that if the Iraq Government are not prepared to honour these obligations the question should be referred to arbitration under article 17 of the treaty of 1922.

7. There are, however, certain difficulties in the way of arbitration. Article 17 of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty of 1922 provides that any difference that may arise between the contracting parties as to the interpretation of the provisions of the treaty shall be referred to arbitration and it would therefore appear that the only question which could be referred to arbitration is the question whether the obligations to the two sheikhs are covered by the provisions of the treaty. Having regard to the fact that the obligations to the sheikhs were not mentioned in the letter dated the 26th March, 1924, from the High Commissioner to the Prime Minister of Iraq, there would appear to be some difficulty in maintaining that such obligations are covered by article 10 of the treaty. On the other hand, it seems probable that reliance could be placed on article 4 of the treaty. The undertakings to the sheikhs could, Lord Passfield considers, reasonably be described as an important matter affecting the international and financial obligations of His Britannic Majesty, and thus a matter upon which the Iraqi Government are under an obligation to be guided by the advice of His Britannic Majesty tendered through the High Commissioner. It should be mentioned here that Lord Passfield is advised that if there is any possibility of the question of the obligations to the two sheikhs being submitted to arbitration or to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague care should be taken, in the meantime, to make no statement or admission which might prejudice the use of any argument before that court including an argument founded on article 10 of the treaty. Lord Passfield is also advised that if the matter is referred unilaterally to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague it could only be so referred under article 17 of the treaty and that under that article His Majesty's Government could only ask for the decision of the court on the matters in dispute in so far as such matters arise out of the interpretation or application of the treaty. In such circumstances it appears to be desirable that the Government of Iraq should be induced to submit the question to arbitration by special agreement and that the agreement should be drafted in the widest possible terms in order that the terms of reference may include not only the question whether the Iraqi Government are obliged to continue the exemption from taxation under the terms of the treaty but also whether they are so obliged under the rules of international law.

Should the Iraqi Government refuse to enter into a special agreement to refer the matter in dispute to The Hague and the matter has to be referred to The Hague by the unilateral application of His Majesty's Government, Lord Passfield is advised that the application should be framed in general terms with reference to the whole treaty and not with reference to any particular article or articles of the treaty.

8. A further point arises in that the Sheikh of Koweit is an independent sovereign and would presumably be recognised by King Feisal as such.

In that case neither the courts nor the authorities of Iraq would have any legal right to make any order for taxation against him, nor to enforce any such order, if made.

9. In these circumstances I am to request that you will be good enough to furnish Lord Passfield with your opinion generally and in particular on the following questions:—

- (1) Do you agree that it would be advisable, if possible, to induce the Iraqi Government to agree to a special reference to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague and that such reference should be framed in the widest possible terms in order to include not only the question whether the Iraqi Government are obliged to continue the exemption from taxation under the terms of the treaty, but also by reason of the financial settlement of 1921 and under the rules of international law?
- (2) In view of the fact that a definite pronouncement in confirmation of the view expressed in paragraph 8 above might strengthen the position of His Majesty's Government vis-à-vis the Iraq Government, do you consider that the reference to The Hague Court should be so framed as to cover the question whether, in view of the status of the Sheikh of Koweit as an independent sovereign, it would be in accordance with international law and usage that his properties in Iraq should be immune from taxation?
- (3) If it is impossible to induce the Iraqi Government to agree to submit a special reference to The Hague, do you agree that it would be open to His Majesty's Government to refer the matter to The Hague under the provisions of article 17 of the treaty?
- (4) If the answer to question (3) is in the affirmative, would such reference, in your opinion, by reason of the provisions of article 17 be confined to the interpretation of the provisions of the treaty and to the question whether the obligations to the two sheikhs are covered by article 4 or article 10 of the treaty?
- (5) If it is possible and becomes necessary to refer the matter to The Hague do you agree that the reference should be framed in general terms with reference to the whole treaty and not with reference to any particular article or articles of the treaty, and that in the meantime no admission should be made by or on behalf of His Majesty's Government which might be construed as an abandonment by His Majesty's Government of the right to rely on article 10 of the treaty?
- (6) Whether, in your opinion, there is a reasonable prospect of success if the matter is (a) referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague by His Majesty's Government pursuant to article 17 of the treaty; (b) referred to arbitration in virtue of a special reference framed upon the lines suggested in paragraph 9 (1) above.

I am, &c.
O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

List of Papers.

- (A.) From the Resident and His Britannic Majesty's Consul-General in the Persian Gulf to the Sheikh of Koweit, November 3, 1914. [E 4047/4047/65/1927.]
- (B.) From the British Resident in the Persian Gulf and His Majesty's Consul-General for Fars to the Sheikh of Mohammerah, November 21, 1914. [E 4047/4047/65/1927.]
- (C.) Treaty of Alliance between Great Britain and Iraq, signed at Baghdad, October 10, 1922. [Treaty 1760.]
- (D.) High Commissioner for Iraq to the Prime Minister of Iraq, March 26, 1924. [E 7443/232/65/1924.]
- (E.) Counsellor to the High Commissioner for Iraq to the Prime Minister of Iraq, April 17, 1924. [E 4047/4047/65/1927.]
- (F.) Prime Minister of Iraq to the High Commissioner for Iraq, July 10, 1924. [E 7443/232/65/1924.]
- (G.) Secretary to Council of Ministers, Iraq, to the Secretary to High Commissioner for Iraq, August 10, 1927. [E 4047/4047/65/1927.]
- (H.) Report of Financial Mission to Iraq, 1925. [Parliamentary 5303.]

Report.

(1) We think that the Iraq Government should, if possible, be induced to agree to a special reference being made to the Permanent Court of International Justice and that such reference should be framed in the widest possible terms.

(2) We think that the reference should be framed so as to cover the question whether it is in accordance with international law that the properties of the Sheikh of Koweit should be immune from taxation as a consequence of his independent sovereignty.

(3) We think it is open to His Majesty's Government to refer the matter to the court under article 17 of the treaty.

(4) We think that a reference under article 17 would be confined to an interpretation of the provisions of the treaty and to the question whether the obligations to the two sheikhs were covered by the treaty.

(5) We think that such reference under article 17 should be framed so as to cover the whole treaty, and that the right to rely on article 10 should not be abandoned.

(6) (a) If the reference is made by virtue of article 17, we think there is reasonable chance of success.

(b) Yes.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
JAMES B. MELVILLE.

Law Officers' Department,
June 16, 1930.

Annex A.

The Resident and His Britannic Majesty's Consul-General in the Persian Gulf to the Sheikh of Koweit.

Dated Dhilhijjah 14, 1332
(November 3, 1914).

(After compliments.)

In continuation of previous letter intimating the outbreak of war between the British Government and Turkey, I am ordered by the British Government to convey to your Excellency gratitude for your loyalty and your offer of assistance, and to request you to attack Umm Qasr Safwan and Bubiyan and to occupy them. You should endeavour, afterwards, in co-operation with Sheikh Sir Khazal Khan, Amir Abdul Aziz-bin-Saud and other reliable Sheikhs, to liberate Basra from Turkish possession. Should this prove to be beyond your ability, you should make arrangements, if possible, to prevent Turkish reinforcements from reaching Basra or even Qurnah, until the arrival of the British troops, whom we shall send, please God, as soon as possible. I also hope that two of our men-of-war will reach Basra before the arrival of your troops there. And though it should be your highest aim, in this connexion, to liberate Basra and its people from Turkish rule, still we request that you should use your utmost endeavour in preventing troops and others from plundering the merchandise belonging to British merchants in Basra and its dependencies, to protect the European residents of Basra, and to safeguard them from loss and oppression. In return for your valuable assistance in this important matter, I am ordered by the British Government to promise to your Excellency that if we succeed therein—and we shall succeed therein, please God—we will not return Basra to the Turkish Government and we will not surrender it back to them at all. Furthermore, I make to you, on behalf of the British Government, certain promises concerning your Excellency personally, viz. :—

- (1) That your gardens which are now in your possessions, viz., the date gardens situate between Fao and Qurnah, shall remain in your possession and in possession of your descendants without being subject to the payment of revenue or taxes.
- (2) That if you attack Safwan, Umm Qasr and Bubiyan and occupy them, the British Government will protect you from any consequences arising from that action.
- (3) That the British Government does recognise and admit that the Sheikdom of Koweit is an independent Government under British protection.

I request that you will be good enough to read the enclosed letter and transmit the same to the Amir of Nejd at the earliest convenience. I have addressed a letter to the Sheikh of Mohammerah similar to this I am writing you.

I am confident of your old-established friendship with the exalted Government, and I believe that your Excellency will use your endeavour, in these important matters, in every respect.

I avail myself of this opportunity to assure you of my high esteem, and may you continue to remain preserved, and salaams,

S. G. KNOX,
Resident and His Britannic Majesty's Consul-General in the Persian Gulf.

Annex B.

British Resident in the Persian Gulf to the Sheikh of Mohammerah.

(A.C.) November 21, 1914.

With reference to the assurances conveyed to your Excellency in my letter No. 307, dated the 15th October, 1910 (11th Shawwal, 1328), and having regard to the further valued services and co-operation which your Excellency has rendered to the British Government and to British interests in Arabistan and the Shatt-el-Arab, I am now authorised to assure your Excellency personally, and to do so by this writing, that, whatever change may take place in the form of the Government of Persia, and whether it be Royalist or Nationalist, His Majesty's Government will be prepared to afford you the support necessary for obtaining a solution satisfactory both to yourself and to us in the event of any encroachment by the Persian Government on your jurisdiction and recognised rights or on your property in Persia. In like manner, they will safeguard you to the best of their ability against any unprovoked attack by a foreign Power or against any encroachment by such Power on your jurisdiction and recognised rights or on your property in Persia. These assurances are given for yourself and for your successors from among your male descendants, and shall hold good so long as you and they do not fail to observe your and their obligations towards the Persian Government, provided that the nomination of your successors from among your male descendants shall be subject to confidential consultation with, and the approval of, His Majesty's Government, and so long as you and they shall continue to be guided by the advice of His Majesty's Government and to maintain an attitude satisfactory to that Government.

Vis-à-vis the Persian Government, we shall do our best to maintain your Excellency in your present state of local autonomy.

Further, the date gardens which you now possess on the Turkish side of the Shatt-el-Arab shall remain in full possession of you and your heirs and immune from taxation.

P. Z. COX, *Lieutenant-Colonel,
British Resident in the Persian Gulf, and His Majesty's Consul-General for Fars, &c.*

PALESTINE.

[E 2919/506/65/1930]

No. 2^B.

[Colonial Office.]

[May 28, 1930.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, April 10, 1930.

I AM directed by Lord Passfield to request you to favour him with your observations on the following matter :—

Dead Sea Salts
Concession :
Question of arbitration.

2. In 1913 the Imperial Ottoman Government granted a concession to certain Turkish nationals (Selah Djimdjoz Bey, Suad Bey, and Djenab Chehabeddin Bey) for the extraction of salts from the Dead Sea. In March 1923 the concessionnaires agreed to transfer their concession to a Colonel Maitland Edwards, and on the 19th April of that year, a Captain J. G. Bennett reported to His Majesty's Government that he had acquired the concession, and asked His Majesty's Government to recognise it. Captain Bennett was informed that the concession could not be recognised, on the ground that the Treaty of Lausanne and the Concessions Protocol signed at the same time did not provide for the maintenance of such a concession. Copies of the correspondence with Captain Bennett, including a copy of the Firman of Concession, are enclosed (Papers 10 and 11). Captain Bennett subsequently transferred the concession to a Major Burton Stewart. On the 31st July, 1925, a Major J. D. Henry, an Australian, endeavoured to induce the Commonwealth Government to secure the agreement of His Majesty's Government to the arbitration at The Hague of the question of the validity of this concession. The matter was then referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, and I am to invite your attention to a case and an opinion on it given by Sir Douglas Hogg and Sir Thomas Inskip on the 13th January, 1926.* Copies of this case and opinion are enclosed (Paper 2). As a result, the Commonwealth Government declined to support Major Henry.

3. On the 18th October, 1927, Messrs. Edwards and Henry's solicitors stated that their clients were completing arrangements to take their claim to The Hague. On the 29th October, the solicitors asked for an interview, and stated that certain non-English associates of their clients would be available. At an interview held on the 3rd November, it was stated that several groups of English, French and other nationals then had an interest in the concession. Copies of the relevant correspondence and of the record of the interview in question are enclosed for your information (Papers 6, 7 and 8).

4. On the 21st February, 1928, the French Government communicated a note calling the attention of His Majesty's Government to the fact that a French financial group had acquired certain rights in this concession (Paper 1). The French Government were informed on the 16th April, 1928 (Paper 3), that His Majesty's Government could not recognise the concession, and it was pointed out to the French Government that two successive groups of British nationals had preferred claims in respect of it in the past, and that it must be assumed that the French group, when they acquired their interests in the concession, were well aware of the previous attitude of His Majesty's Government.

5. No further communication was received until the 9th February, 1929, when the French Ambassador left a second note with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs containing a reasoned statement of the French case prepared by the French group (Paper 4). It is material to note that the French Government do not state definitely that they either adopt or accept the argument put forward by the French group in this document. A reply was sent to the French Ambassador on the 14th March, 1929, in which the refusal of His Majesty's Government to recognise the concession was supported by legal arguments.

6. On the 21st June, 1929, the French Ambassador informed the Foreign Office that the French Government wished the matter to be referred to arbitration. The matter received further consideration by the Departments concerned, who were advised that in international law it is well settled as a principle that a State may not claim a pecuniary indemnity in respect of damage suffered by a private person on the territory of a foreign State, unless the injured person was its national at the moment when the damage was caused, and retained its nationality until the claim was decided. This proposition forms Basis No. 28 of the Bases of Discussion at The Hague at the Conference for the Codification of International Law, and is at present being supported there by representatives of His Majesty's Government. The necessity of a continuous national character for a claim is based on a long line of decisions of international arbitral tribunals, and the principle is well emphasised in the Abbiati case (United States and Venezuelan Claims Commission 84—Moore 2347, cited by Ralston "Law and Procedure of International Tribunals" (1926 ed.) at page 162).

7. Subject to your concurrence in the suggestions contained in the next subsequent paragraph of this letter, Lord Passfield is disposed, having regard to the arguments contained in the letter from the Foreign Office to the Colonial Office of the 13th November, 1929 (Paper 5), to agree to the French Government's proposal to submit the question to arbitration to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague, in which event it is necessary to decide on the terms of the compromis.

8. It is suggested that an agreement to arbitrate on this matter should be made conditional on the acceptance by the French Government of the following four provisions:—

- (a) That the French Government must agree to adopt and accept responsibility for the claims.
- (b) That the French Government must agree that the point to be submitted for decision to the Court is whether any right possessed by the French Government in international law has been infringed.
- (c) That (subject to the consent of the Treasury) the French Government should agree to the insertion of a provision enabling the Court to make the losing party pay costs up to a maximum figure of, possibly, £1,000.
- (d) That the consent of His Majesty's Government to arbitrate the claim should be conditional upon the French Government agreeing to some form of arbitration of the Syrian claims.

As regards condition (d), I am to explain that for some time past His Majesty's Government have been pressing the French Government to agree to the arbitration of several claims arising out of disorders in Syria during the years 1925 and 1926. The French Government have persistently declined to refer this question to arbitration, and it is, therefore, thought convenient and suitable to insert this provision as a condition for agreeing to arbitration in the case of the Dead Sea Salts concession.

9. Lord Passfield would be glad of your opinion on the suitability of the four conditions suggested in the preceding paragraph, with particular reference, as regards suggestion (b), to the question whether the considerations set out in paragraph 6 of this letter constitute a good and valid defence in international law. In addition, Lord Passfield will be glad to receive any observations of a general character that you may care to offer.

10. A further point arises in connection with a concession which has actually been granted to a firm called Palestine Potash (Limited) to extract salts from the Dead Sea. This firm signed, on the 1st January, 1930, an indemnity, of which a copy is enclosed, binding themselves to do all such things as may be necessary to enable the Governments of Palestine and Transjordan to give effect to the decision of any tribunal which may hold that the claim of the French claimants is well founded. I am to explain that at the time that this agreement was negotiated it was only contemplated that reference to arbitration would become necessary in the event of the claimants so formulating their claim as to compel His Majesty's Government to agree to arbitration under Clause 26 of the Palestine mandate. Lord Passfield would be glad to be assured that, in your opinion, Palestine Potash (Limited) would not be released from their obligations under this indemnity by voluntary submission to arbitration of the French claims.

I am, &c.

O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

Schedule of Papers.

1. French Ambassador to Foreign Office, February 21, 1928. [E 925/275/65/1928.]
2. Law Officers' Opinion, January 13, 1926. [Confidential, 13206, p. 7.]
3. Foreign Office to French Ambassador, April 16, 1928. [E 1721/275/65/1928.]
4. French Ambassador, February 9, 1929. [E 773/80/65/1929.]
5. Foreign Office to Colonial Office, November 13, 1929. [E 5856/80/65/1929.]
6. Messrs. Montagu and Cox to Colonial Office, October 18, 1927.
7. Messrs. Montagu and Cox to Colonial Office, October 29, 1927.
8. Notes of an interview at the Colonial Office on the 3rd November, 1927. [E 5285/5146/65/1927.]
9. Colonial Office to Foreign Office, December 9, 1927. [E 5285/5146/65/1927.]
10. Captain J. G. Bennett to Colonial Office, June 7, 1923. [E 7131/3118/65/1925.]
11. Colonial Office to Captain Bennett, December 14, 1923. [E 7131/3118/65/1925.]
12. Treaty of Lausanne. [Treaty, 1681.]

Report.

1. We approve of the four conditions set out in paragraph 8 of that letter, subject to this reservation in regard to condition (c) that it would form a precedent for imposing a liability for costs on the losing party in international arbitrations, and the question whether it is desirable to establish such a precedent is a question of policy rather than of law.

2. We consider that the matters set out in paragraph 6 of the letter should constitute a good and valid defence in international law, in view of the authorities cited in that paragraph of the letter and also "Moore's International Law Digest," vol. 6, pp. 248, 638-9; "Wharton's International Law Digest," vol. 2, pp. 544-5. Borchard on "Diplomatic Protection of Citizens Abroad," pp. 660-1.

3. We think that Palestine Potash (Limited) will not have any legitimate ground of complaint and will not be released from their obligations by reason of a submission to arbitration in the manner proposed.

4. We are of opinion that the Treaty neither affirms nor denies the validity of the concession, which does not fall within the terms either of article 1 or of article 9 of the 12th Protocol. Accordingly, the validity or invalidity of the concession is to be determined by the rules, if any, of international law applicable to the subject. It appears to us to be doubtful whether the practice of nations in regard to concessions granted by the Government of a ceded or conquered territory is sufficiently settled to be regarded as forming part of the system of international law. Reasonable principles for the guidance of a Government in dealing with concessions in respect of conquered territory were laid down in the Report of the Transvaal Concession Commission, which is set out in Pitt-Cobbett's "Leading Cases," 4th ed., vol. 2, pp. 349-358. The commission did not put forward those principles as being legally binding, but only as suggestions as to the manner in which the discretion of the Government should be exercised. Westlake, on the other hand, expressed the view ("International Law," Part 1, pp. 74-83, and "L.Q.R.," vol. 17, pp. 392-401) that a conquering State had not an unfettered discretion in regard to such concessions, but was subject to obligations in international law, and, in the absence of special reasons, could not cancel such concessions without paying compensation.

In the present case, however, if we are right in our answer to the second question, the defence to the arbitration should succeed whatever view may be taken with regard to these difficult and unsettled problems.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
JAS. B. MELVILLE.

Law Officers' Department,
May 28, 1930.

1930

24

PALESTINE.

[E 4488/400/65/1930]

No. 2^c.

[Colonial Office.]

[August 5, 1930.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Application
by Palestine for loan
under Colonial Development Act,
1929.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, May 29, 1930.

I AM directed by Lord Passfield to inform you that he has under consideration an application by the Government of Palestine for a loan under the Colonial Development Act, 1929, and that certain questions, on which he would be glad to be favoured with your opinion, have arisen in connexion with this application.

2. It will be observed that under Section 1 (1) of the Act, a copy of which is enclosed for convenience of reference, the Treasury may make advances to the Government of any territory to which the Section applies for the purpose of aiding and developing industry in the territory and thereby promoting commerce with or industry in the United Kingdom, and that by Section 1 (2) of the Act such advances may be made on such terms, and subject to such conditions, as the Treasury may think fit. It has been suggested that the Treasury should, pursuant to their power under Section 1 (2), make it a condition of a loan to the Palestine Government that material, &c., to be bought with the money so advanced should be purchased in the United Kingdom, wherever possible.

3. The question on which Lord Passfield would be glad to receive your opinion is:—

Whether, if such a condition were made, there is anything in article 18 of the Palestine Mandate which would render it a breach of the obligations of His Majesty's Government as the Mandatory that a loan should be accepted by Palestine under these conditions?

A copy of the Palestine Mandate is also enclosed.

4. In this connexion I am to invite attention to the Law Officers' opinions of the 16th March, 1926, regarding the proposed British Guaranteed Loans for Palestine and East Africa. Your predecessors advised at that time that the attachment, to a guarantee by His Majesty's Government of a local loan, of a formal condition that any contracts for development to be paid for out of the loan should be given to British firms, was not inconsistent with article 18 of the Palestine Mandate, and, in view of this fact, it may be argued that a fortiori a similar term would not be inconsistent with the Palestine Mandate where it is imposed as a condition of the actual advance of the money by His Majesty's Government itself.

5. It is thought desirable to draw attention also to the opinions given by the Law Officers on the 24th May* and 12th November, 1928,† in connexion with the construction of the harbour works at Haifa, although it will be seen that the point dealt with in those opinions was of a different character from that under consideration in the present case. In both these opinions, however, stress is laid upon the principle that "the interests of the Mandated Territory afford the test of the propriety of the course proposed." If it should be held that this principle must also apply to the present case, it would appear to follow that His Majesty's Government ought to be in a position to show that the acceptance of a loan by Palestine under these conditions was in the real interests of Palestine itself; and to satisfy the test His Majesty's Government would have to show that capital was required by Palestine for its development and that the loan with the conditions attached constituted a grant of capital on terms on the whole more favourable than Palestine could secure elsewhere.

If such a test is to be applied to the application of the Government of Palestine at present under consideration, it is submitted that the following circumstances would amply fulfil the requirements of the test: A sum of about £150,000 is required by the Government of Palestine to enable a part of a drainage scheme to be carried out in Jerusalem upon which the extension of the water supply of that city is dependent. The provision of improved drainage and water supply is regarded by the Palestine Government as of great importance to the proper development of Jerusalem under present-day conditions. The financial position of Palestine makes it essential that money required for development purposes should be obtained at the most economical rates.

* Confidential, 13565, p. 14.

† Confidential, 13565, p. 19.

PALESTINE.

25

6. Failing the issue of a further guaranteed loan (which is contrary to the policy of His Majesty's Government and would require fresh statutory authority), the alternatives open in the present case are:—

- (a) Assistance under the Colonial Development Act;
- (b) The raising of the necessary money on the security of the revenues of Palestine.

The rate of interest which would be paid if assistance were obtained under the first alternative would not be based on the credit of Palestine, but would be nearly related to the rates at which the British Government could borrow. The comparison between the two alternatives is thus, broadly, a comparison between the respective credits of the British and Palestine Governments. At any time this comparison could not fail to be markedly in favour of the former alternative, while in present circumstances, having regard to recent events in Palestine, the difference in favour of the former would be appreciably increased. Indeed, it is open to doubt whether in present circumstances Palestine could raise an appreciable sum on her own credit on any reasonable terms.

Your opinion is especially desired, because recent proceedings in the Permanent Mandates Commission and elsewhere have shown that the action of His Majesty's Government in Palestine in connexion with commercial matters is likely to be subjected to searching scrutiny, and His Majesty's Government are liable to be called upon to defend any action they may take which is alleged to contravene the Mandate before the Permanent Court of International Justice under article 26 of the Mandate.

I am, &c.

O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

List of Enclosures.

Colonial Development Act, 1929 [20 Geo. V, Ch. 5].
Palestine Mandate [Cmd. 1785].

Opinion of the Attorney-General.

The proposal in effect appears to be that Great Britain should lend money to Palestine at a lower rate of interest than Palestine could otherwise obtain, upon the condition, which is necessary in order to justify the advance from the point of view of British interests, that the materials to be purchased by means of the sum lent should be purchased in Great Britain. If it is in the interests of Palestine to borrow money at such a rate of interest and subject to such a condition, we do not think the proposal falls within the prohibition of article 18 of the Mandate. We think it essential that the condition should be made one of the express terms upon which the loan is granted, and it should be made clear that it is entirely for the Palestine Government to make up their mind whether they desire to accept the loan on these terms.

WM. A. JOWITT.

Law Officers' Department,
August 5, 1930.

[5699]

E

RUSSIA.

[N 7538/423/38/1930]

No. 2^o.

[Board of Trade.]

[October 22, 1930.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Willink.

COPIES of the following documents accompany this case:—

1. Temporary Commercial Agreement, 1930, between His Majesty's Government and the Government of the U.S.S.R. [Cmd. 3552 (Treaty 1985)].
2. Letter dated the 10th October from the manager of the Export Credits Guarantee Department to the Solicitor's Department of the Board of Trade [N 7538/423/38/1930].
3. Record of interview between the Foreign Secretary and the Russian Ambassador [N 6921/423/38/1930].
4. Record of interview between M. Bogomoloff and Mr. Gillett [N 6921/423/38/1930].
5. Letter dated the 4th October, 1930, from Mr. Major to Mr. Caulcutt [N 7538/423/38/1930].
6. Form of contract in use by Export Credits Guarantee Department for guaranteeing accepted bills.

Questions have arisen in regard to safeguarding, as far as possible, the position of the British Government, acting through the Export Credits Guarantee Department of the Board of Trade, in guaranteeing bills which have been endorsed or guaranteed by the Russian Government, and Mr. Gillett, the secretary for the Department of Overseas Trade, is anxious that the Export Credits Guarantee Department and their Advisory Committee should be guided by the advice of counsel.

Counsel will remember that the Export Credits Guarantee Department (hereinafter referred to as the E.C.G.D.) is engaged in trying to help the export trade of this country by giving guarantees in connexion with export transactions. Until recently Russia was excluded from the scope of their operation, but now that the recent Commercial Agreement between the Government and the U.S.S.R. has been signed the E.C.G.D. has been guaranteeing bills drawn in respect of exports to Russia.

By article 2 of this Commercial Agreement the U.S.S.R. are authorised to establish a trade delegation in London consisting of the trade representative and his two deputies forming part of the Russian Embassy. By paragraph 4 of this article, the trade delegation acting in respect to trade for and on behalf of the U.S.S.R., the Government of the latter will assume responsibility for all transactions lawfully concluded in the United Kingdom by the trade representative or by persons duly authorised by him. The Government of the U.S.S.R. will not, however, accept any responsibility for the acts of State economic organisations which, under the laws of the U.S.S.R., are exclusively responsible for their own acts, except in cases where responsibility for such acts has been clearly accepted by the trade representative, acting for and on behalf of the Government of the U.S.S.R. By paragraph 6 any questions arising in respect of commercial transactions entered into by the trade delegation are to be determined by the courts of the United Kingdom in accordance with the laws thereof. By paragraph 7 the property of the U.S.S.R. in the United Kingdom is subjected to such measures as may lawfully be taken to give effect to the orders of courts of the United Kingdom with certain exceptions. By an additional protocol it is provided, with reference to paragraph 6 of article 2, that the privileges and immunities conferred on the head of the trade delegation and his two deputies by paragraph 2 of article 2 shall not be claimed in connexion with any proceedings before the courts of the United Kingdom arising out of commercial transactions entered into in the United Kingdom by the trade delegation of the U.S.S.R.

Before giving their guarantee, it is the practice of the E.C.G.D. to obtain the approval of their advisory committee, which consists of well-known bankers and

Form of guarantee by Soviet trade representative in London of contracts of Russian
State economic organisations.

other financial and commercial experts in the City of London. This committee, as business men, are very concerned with the risks involved in guaranteeing payments for exports to Russia, and they and the department are very anxious that every possible step should be taken to safeguard the position of His Majesty's Government in respect of such guarantees so far as is legally possible. They have accordingly decided that all transactions should be guaranteed by the endorsement of the trade representative of the U.S.S.R. upon the acceptances given for exports to Russia. It is thought likely that from time to time there may be substantial balances in this country belonging to the Government of the U.S.S.R.

As counsel will see from the record of the interview between the Russian Ambassador and the Foreign Secretary, the Russians are now raising objections (into which it is unnecessary to enter) to the endorsement of the acceptances by the trade representative, and they have made the suggestion that a letter of guarantee from the trade representative might be accepted in lieu of his endorsement of an acceptance. The Export Credits Advisory Committee naturally prefer the endorsement of an acceptance, since it is a commercial usage with which they are very familiar, and they think that, if it became necessary to resort to legal proceedings against the U.S.S.R. in the courts of this country, it would be easier and more expeditious to obtain judgment on an indorsement of an acceptance rather than on a letter of guarantee of an acceptance.

It seems to be well settled that a foreign Government cannot be impleaded in the municipal courts of this country, but is subject to the jurisdiction only when they submit to it.

The Commercial Agreement may in effect be regarded as a general undertaking by the U.S.S.R. to submit to the jurisdiction of our courts in regard to matters covered by the agreement, but the question arises whether the U.S.S.R. can be sued in our courts if, it may be in breach of their undertaking, they decline to enter an appearance to a writ. Counsel will remember that the House of Lords (Viscount Cave, Viscount Finlay, Lord Dunedin and Lord Sumner; Lord Carson dissenting) in the case of the Duff Development Company v. Kelantan Government (1924 Appeal Cases, 797) held in effect that where a Sovereign, having agreed to submit to jurisdiction, refuses to do so when the question arises, he may indeed be guilty of a breach of his agreement, but he does not thereby give actual jurisdiction to the court. Lord Sumner stressed the point that the submission to the jurisdiction must be taken towards the court itself. If these views are correct, therefore, it seems that it will be impossible ever to proceed against the U.S.S.R. in the courts of this country unless the U.S.S.R. submits to the jurisdiction in those particular proceedings by entering an appearance.

Assuming, however, for the moment that the U.S.S.R. will be prepared to enter an appearance in any proceedings taken against them in our courts, the question arises whether there is much practical advantage in an indorsement of an acceptance by the trade representative of the U.S.S.R. in preference to a letter of guarantee given by him. Under Order 3, Rule 6, a writ may be specially endorsed for a debt arising under a guarantee equally with a bill of exchange. It may be, however, that it would be easier for the U.S.S.R. to obtain leave to defend under Order 14 procedure where they had given a letter of guarantee than if they had given their indorsement (see per Bramwell, L.J., in Lloyds Banking Company v. Ogle, 1 Ex. D. 263), although it is a little difficult to see why in principle there should be any distinction between the two cases as an indorsement is in effect a guarantee of payment. Even in the case of an indorsement, there would seem to be ample opportunity of obtaining leave to defend by alleging, e.g., fraud, or want of authority of the trade representative or his deputy.

The Minister for Overseas Trade is very anxious that counsel should approve the form of a letter of guarantee for use if necessary, and in this connexion it has to be considered whether the letter of guarantee can properly be given so as to cover generally a number of intended bills of exchange, or whether it should be given in respect of each specific transaction.

A further question arises on the construction of paragraph 4 of article 2 of the Commercial Agreement and the view taken by some City solicitors will be found in the letter from Mr. Leonard Major to Mr. Caulcutt. The first sentence states that the Government of the U.S.S.R. assumes responsibility for all transactions lawfully concluded in the United Kingdom by the trade representative or by persons duly authorised by him. In the second sentence, however, the Government of the U.S.S.R. disclaims responsibility for the acts of State economic organisations except in cases where responsibility has been accepted by the trade representative. It will be observed that in the second sentence persons duly authorised by the trade representative are not included. It is submitted that this merely means that, apart from any express acceptance of responsibility, the U.S.S.R. are not liable for transactions entered into by such organisations as Arcos, Centrosojus or Selosojus. The question arises whether, in the case of exports to these or similar organisations, where it is desired to obtain the guarantee of their acceptances by the Government of the U.S.S.R., the acceptance of responsibility on behalf of the U.S.S.R. should be by the trade representative himself, or whether it could be delegated by him to persons duly authorised within the meaning of the first sentence. It is submitted that, if a bill is endorsed by a person duly authorised by the trade representative within the meaning of the agreement, that is a substantive transaction for which the Government of the U.S.S.R. is responsible in the terms of the first sentence. Unless this is so, the practical advantage of the first sentence is very greatly reduced by the second, since most of the commercial activities of the U.S.S.R. in this country are conducted through Arcos and similar organisations.

Counsel are requested to advise:—

- (1) Whether, notwithstanding the express undertakings of the U.S.S.R. contained in the Commercial Agreement of 1930 and the Additional Protocol, it would be open to the U.S.S.R. successfully to refuse to submit to the jurisdiction of our courts in an action brought by His Majesty's Government against the Government of the U.S.S.R. in respect of a guarantee properly given by the latter Government's trade representative for the due payment of an acceptance on account of goods exported to Russia, and so escape any legal liability under the guarantee.
- (2) Whether, if the Government of the U.S.S.R. were to submit to the jurisdiction in such an action and judgment were given against them, it would still be open to them successfully to decline to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts to levy execution on the judgment against any assets of the Government of the U.S.S.R. within the jurisdiction.
- (3) Whether there is any practical legal advantage in securing a guarantee of the Government of the U.S.S.R. by means of an endorsement of an acceptance by the trade representative rather than a letter of guarantee signed by him.
- (4) If the answer to (3) is in the negative, whether a letter of guarantee in the following form would be effectual:—

To the E.C.G.D.

For and on behalf of the Government of the U.S.S.R., I hereby guarantee the due payment of a bill of exchange dated the 1930, for £ , drawn by Messrs. of , and accepted by Messrs. of , payable (here state usance of the bill).
Dated , 1930.

(Signature)

Trade Representative of the U.S.S.R. in United Kingdom.

- (5) Whether a letter of guarantee in similar terms, but referring generally to bills to be accepted by a specified importer or specified importers, could be regarded as effectual and binding on the Government of the U.S.S.R.
- (6) Whether an endorsement of an acceptance or a letter of guarantee in respect of a transaction between a British exporter and Arcos, Centrosojus or Selosojus (or any other State economic organisation which under the laws of the U.S.S.R. is exclusively responsible for its own acts) signed by one of the "persons duly authorised by" the trade representative could be safely relied upon without the signature of the trade representative himself.

Opinion of the Attorney-General and Mr. H. U. Willink.

There are six questions submitted for our opinion. It will be convenient if the questions and our opinions are set out in order:—

Question 1.—Whether, notwithstanding the express undertakings of the U.S.S.R. contained in the Commercial Agreement of 1930 and the Additional Protocol, it would be open to the U.S.S.R. successfully to refuse to submit to the jurisdiction of our courts in an action brought by His Majesty's Government against the Government of the U.S.S.R. in respect of a guarantee properly given by the latter Government's trade representative for the due payment of an acceptance on account of goods exported to Russia, and so escape any legal liability under the guarantee.

In our opinion, the fundamental principles of international law compel the answer "Yes." The matter has been recently dealt with exhaustively by the House of Lords in Duff Development Company (Limited) v. Government of Kelantan (1924), A.C. 797, from which case the principle emerges clearly that an agreement by a foreign sovereign to submit to the jurisdiction of an English court is not equivalent to an actual submission and that nothing short of actual submission can confer jurisdiction over the property or person of a foreign sovereign or sovereign State. Lord Cave says (at p. 810): "If a sovereign having agreed to submit to jurisdiction refuses to do so when the time arises, he may indeed be guilty of a breach of his agreement, but he does not thereby give actual jurisdiction to the court." Lord Dunedin says (at p. 821): "He has broken his contract, but the court has no jurisdiction to enforce any performance of it. It seems to me to say that by agreeing to submit he did submit is to argue in a circle." Lord Sumner says (at p. 829): "There is no principle upon which such consent" (viz., to the jurisdiction) "can be deemed to have been given short of action taken towards the court itself."

The only distinction between the Kelantan case and the present lies in the fact that there the foreign sovereign had contracted with a subject of the Crown, whereas here the agreement is with the Crown itself. This distinction, however, does not affect the principle above set forth.

Question 2.—Whether, if the Government of the U.S.S.R. were to submit to the jurisdiction in such an action and judgment were given against them, it would still be open to them successfully to decline to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts to levy execution on the judgment against any assets of the Government of the U.S.S.R. within the jurisdiction.

This question is more open and is treated as not settled in the last edition of "Oppenheim's International Law." It is, however, open only in the House of Lords: for the Court of Appeal in Duff Development Company (Limited) v. Government of Kelantan and the Crown Agent for the Colonies (Garnishees), (1923, 1 Ch. 385) adjudicated upon an attempt to attach moneys due to the Kelantan Government in satisfaction of the costs of the arbitration proceedings, the motion to set aside the award and the Government's unsuccessful appeal to the Court of Appeal. The decision of the Court of Appeal was that, although the Government of Kelantan had by initiating proceedings to set aside the award of the arbitrator submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, that submission had not the effect of rendering liable to execution any property belonging to the Government within the jurisdiction. This decision was an affirmation of the decision of Mr. Justice Russell (as he then was) and though Lord Dunedin and Lord Carson expressed their disagreement with it in the case cited under Question 1, where the point did not arise for actual decision, we think it not improbable that the decision of the Court of Appeal would be upheld if the matter came before the House of Lords. As the law stands, the answer to this question is in the affirmative.

Question 3.—Whether there is any practical legal advantage in securing a guarantee of the Government of the U.S.S.R. by means of an endorsement of an acceptance by the trade representative rather than a letter of guarantee signed by him.

In our opinion, no.

RUSSIA.

Question 4.—If the answer to 3 is in the negative, whether a letter of guarantee in the following form would be effectual :—

To the Export Credits Guarantee Department,

To the Export Credits Guarantee Department,
For and on behalf of, the Government of the U.S.S.R., I hereby guarantee the due payment of a bill of exchange dated the _____, 1930, for £ _____ drawn by Messrs. _____ of _____ payable and accepted by Messrs. _____ of _____ (here state usance of the bill).

Dated _____, 1930.

(Signature)

Trade Representative of the
U.S.S.R. in United Kingdom.

Yes, subject to two minor alterations. (1) We think it desirable for certainty, that after the usage of the bill there should be added the words "and any interest due thereunder." (2) If the supplemental agreement suggested in the answer to Question 6 under (b) is concluded, the form should admit of signature by the trade representative or any of the empowered representatives referred to in article 2 (5).

Question 5.—Whether a letter of guarantee in similar terms, but referring generally to bills to be accepted by a specified importer or specified importers could be regarded as effectual and binding on the Government of the U.S.S.R.

A letter of guarantee covering more bills than one in respect of one contract if properly drawn would be no less effective than a letter of guarantee covering one bill only; but where a series of contracts is concerned we think the course indicated in our answer to Question 6 advisable.

Question 6.—Whether an endorsement of an acceptance or a letter of guarantee in respect of a transaction between a British exporter and Arcos, Centrosojus or Selojojus (or any other State economic organisation which, under the laws of the U.S.S.R., is exclusively responsible for its own acts) signed by one of the “persons duly authorised by” the trade representative, could be safely relied upon without the signature of the trade representative himself.

In our opinion there is room for doubt upon this question, and we think it desirable that all room for doubt should, so far as possible, be removed. If we were to be content with a mere general acceptance by the trade representative or with a particular acceptance in each case by one of the empowered representatives referred to in article 2 (5), it might be open to argument that this was not contemplated by the Commercial Agreement and that it was only in cases where a special ad hoc acceptance had been given by the trade representative himself that the U.S.S.R. would be responsible.

Without assenting to this argument, it occurs to us that it is advisable to prevent this position arising either (i) by insisting on an express ad hoc acceptance in each case by the trade representative himself, or (ii) by a supplemental agreement to the effect that, whether or not the State Economic Organisation concerned has acted within its powers, (a) ad hoc acceptances by the empowered representatives of the trade representative shall be binding upon the U.S.S.R. or alternatively (b) general acceptance of responsibility in respect of the contracts of a named State economic organisation by the trade representative himself shall be equivalent to ad hoc acceptances by the trade representative or responsibility for the individual contracts of such organisation.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
H. U. WILLINK.

*Law Officers' Department,
October 22, 1930.*

1931

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

(14105)

REPORTS

BY THE

LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1931.

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS.

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

AUSTRIA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Attorney-General ..	Mar. 31, 1931	Proposed Austro-German Customs Union: whether compatible with treaty obligations	1

GENERAL.

1 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Jan. 19, 1931	Loans or grants to mandated territories under Colonial Development Act: as to attaching conditions for purchase of materials, &c., in United Kingdom	6
1 ^B	Law Officers .. [Air Ministry]	May 20, 1931	Power under Air Navigation Act, 1920, to declare prohibited areas	28
2	Law Officers ..	June 3, 1931	Heading for confidential official documents ..	10
2 ^A	Attorney-General .. [Board of Trade]	Sept. , 1931	Prohibition of imports into United Kingdom: treaty position	11
2 ^B	Law Officers .. [Home Office]	Nov. 6, 1931	Nationality of posthumous legitimate child born out of His Majesty's dominions and of illegitimate child born in extra-territorial country, and as to when declaration by wife of desire to retain British nationality is exercisable ..	12

PORTUGAL.

3	Law Officers ..	May 13, 1931	Anglo-Portuguese commercial treaty of 1914: interpretation as regards discrimination in favour of Portuguese as against foreign shipping	18
---	-----------------	--------------	--	----

RUSSIA.

4	Attorney-General ..	July 2, 8, 1931	Immunity from process in English courts of U.S.S.R. trade delegation in United Kingdom	22
---	---------------------	-----------------	--	----

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS.)

1931.

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—CUS.

A.

Act. See Air Navigation Act.
Aerial Navigation Convention. See Treaty.
Agreement. See Treaty.
Aircraft: power to prohibit flight over Windsor Castle, 28-38.
" flight over Crown land; as to amending Air Navigation Convention to prevent, 28-38.
Air Navigation Act, 1920: power to declare Windsor Castle a prohibited area under, 28-38.
" " " whether binding on Crown, 28-38.
Austria: proposed customs union with Germany 1-6.
" ditto; compatibility with treaty obligations, 1-6.
" ditto; effect on "economic independence," 2-6.

C.

Cameroons. See Mandated Territories.
Colonial Development Act: loans or free grants to mandated territories under, 6-9.
Confidential documents. See Documents.
Courts: immunity from process of trade delegation of U.S.S.R. in United Kingdom, 22-27.
Crown: whether bound by Air Navigation Act, 1920, 28-38.
Crown land: whether subject to Air Navigation Convention, 28-38.
" " as to power to prohibit aircraft flying over, 28-38.
Customs: duties of prohibitive character on imports into United Kingdom not legally a breach of treaty obligations, 11.
" preferential treatment for imports into Portugal in Portuguese ships, 18-21.
" ditto; position under Anglo-Portuguese commercial treaty, 19-21.
Customs union: proposed Austro-German, 1-6.
" ditto; whether compatible with Austria's treaty undertakings, 1-6.
" " proposed Franco-Belgian in 1840: attitude of Powers, 3-4.

6442 [7190]

DIP—MAN.

D.

Diplomatic privilege: of Trade Delegation of U.S.S.R. in London, 22-27.
" " ditto: waiver of immunity from process in matters arising out of commercial transactions, 22-27.
Documents: heading to indicate confidential and official nature of, 10, 11.
Duties: import. See Customs.

E.

Economic independence: definition, 2, 5
" " effect on, of customs union, 1-6.
Engelke v. Musmann, 27.

G.

Germany: proposed customs union with Austria, 1-6.

I.

Imports: direct prohibition of, into United Kingdom would be breach of treaty rights, 11.
" duty on, amounting to prohibition of, not breach of treaties, 11.
Independence: effect on, of customs union, 2-6.

L

Loans: to mandated territories from Colonial Development Fund for public works, 6-9.

M.

Magdalena, 27.
Mandated Territories: Tanganyika, Togoland, Cameroons; loans or free grants to, for public works, 6-9.
Mandates: whether purchase of materials in United Kingdom as condition of loans or free grants from Colonial Development Fund is compatible with terms of, 6-9.

1931

(iv)

NAT—PUB.

SEC—WIN

N.

Nationality: of posthumous legitimate child born out of His Majesty's dominions if his father, at time of death, was British subject, 12, 17.
 " of posthumous legitimate child born out of His Majesty's dominions but in an extra-territorial country, 12-15, 17, 18.
 " of illegitimate child born in an extra-territorial country if the mother was at the child's birth a British subject, 12-18.
 " British declaration of wife to retain; when exercisable, 16-18.
 " interpretation of section 1 (1) (b), first proviso to section 1 (1), and first proviso to section 10 of British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 12-14, 17, 18.

O.

Official Secrets Acts: heading to be used on official documents to allow of proceedings under, 10-11.
 Order-in-Council: Power to declare Windsor Castle prohibited area for aircraft by, 28-38.

P.

Preferential treatment: for goods imported into Portugal in Portuguese ships, 18-21.
 Prohibited area: for aircraft, power to declare Windsor Castle, 28-38.
 Public safety: meaning of term in commercial treaty with Germany, 11.
 " meaning of term, in Air Navigation Convention, 31, 37.
 Public works: in mandated territories; principles for organisation of, 8.
 " ditto; attaching of conditions to moneys advanced for, 8-9.

S.

Secret and official: use of, for official documents, 11.
Shedden v. Patrick, 12.
 Shipping: discrimination by Portuguese Government in favour of Portuguese; whether violation of Anglo-Portuguese treaty of 1914, 18-21.
 Soviet Union: trade delegation in United Kingdom; immunity from process of courts, 22-27.

T.

Tanganyika Territory. See Mandated Territories.
 Togoland. See Mandated Territories.
 Treaty: use of "travaux préparatoires" in interpretation of, 20-21.
 " obligations of Austria; whether compatible with customs union with Germany, 1-6.
 " commercial, with Germany; direct prohibition of imports with United Kingdom would conflict with, 11.
 " ditto; meaning of term "public safety" in, 11.
 " Anglo-Portuguese, 1914; interpretation of articles 5 and 11, 21.
 " ditto; whether preferential treatment for goods imported into Portugal in Portuguese ships is violation of, 18-21.
 " temporary commercial agreement with U.S.S.R.; interpretation of provisions respecting diplomatic privilege of U.S.S.R. trade delegation in United Kingdom, 22-27.
 " Aerial Navigation Convention; whether it covers question of flying over Crown land, 28-38.

W.

Windsor Castle: power to declare it prohibited area for aircraft, 28-38.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1931.

AUSTRIA.

[C 2013/673/3]

No. 1.

[March 31, 1931.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Foreign Office, March 27, 1931.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to submit to you certain papers relating to a proposed customs union between Germany and Austria, and to request you to furnish him with your opinion as to whether the conclusion of a treaty between Germany and Austria, establishing a customs union in accordance with the proposals contained in these papers, would be contrary to the treaty obligations of Austria under article 88 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain or under the Protocol No. 1, signed at Geneva on the 4th October, 1922. The papers submitted for your consideration in furnishing an opinion on this question are the Peace Treaty between Austria and the Allied and Associated Powers, signed at Saint-Germain; a resolution of the Council of the League of Nations of the 4th October, 1922, and three protocols and their annexes, signed at Geneva on the 4th October, 1922, between the Government of the United Kingdom, the French Government, the Italian Government and the Czechoslovak Government on the one part, and the Austrian Government on the other part; and a translation of a document handed to the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs by the German Ambassador and the Austrian Minister setting out the results of negotiations between the Austrian and German Governments in the form of proposals upon which these two Governments have agreed to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty.

2. It would appear that the Protocol No. 1 of the 4th October, 1922, reiterates and affirms all the obligations contained in article 88 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain with certain amplifications and additions, and the question would appear to turn principally upon whether the régime between Germany and Austria contemplated in the proposals which have been communicated, is or is not within the meaning of Protocol No. 1 of October 1922, a special régime or exclusive advantage granted by Austria to Germany which either violates or is calculated to threaten the economic independence of Austria.

3. The principal features of the régime contemplated in these proposals would appear to be (a) free trade between Germany and Austria (subject possibly to certain exceptions for a provisional period); (b) a customs tariff drawn up by agreement between Germany and Austria and thereafter, while the treaty remains in force, incapable of alteration either by Germany or Austria without the consent of the other party; (c) the collection of customs duties at the frontier of a territorial unit comprising Germany and Austria by the German customs administration upon the German portion of this frontier and by the Austrian

6442 [7190]

B

Proposed
Austro-
German
Customs Union.

customs upon the Austrian portion of the frontier; (d) the division of the proceeds so collected between Germany and Austria in certain proportions calculated presumably upon some basis which is considered to represent in the aggregate the relative amount and value of imports into Austria and into Germany respectively. It would appear that the consent of the Committee of Control, created under article 6 of Protocol No. 2, of the 4th October, 1922, would be necessary (articles 3, 7 and 10 of Protocol No. 2) before the arrangements in the present Austro-German proposals could be carried out, but assuming that these proposals, if carried out, would not reduce the yield of the securities assigned to this loan below the amount required to meet its service it would appear that the Committee of Control would have no grounds for refusing their approval.

4. The words "economic independence" are words whose precise meaning it is perhaps difficult to define. It would appear that the word "indépendance" (the French text of the protocol is alone made authentic) has like the English word "independence" two significations, namely, non-subordination and separation. As the proposals seem to place Germany and Austria respectively in a position of complete legal equality it would appear that it is the second sense of the word "indépendance" which is most relevant in the present connexion, i.e., separation.

5. In favour of the view that the present Austro-German proposals are not inconsistent with the obligations of Austria under Protocol No. 1, the following arguments might perhaps be advanced: (a) In ascertaining the meaning of the words "economic independence" in Protocol No. 1 regard must be had to the circumstances and the occasion on which the protocol was concluded. This protocol was part of the arrangements made for the financial and economic reconstruction of Austria under the auspices of the League of Nations and one of the principal arrangements made for the purpose of this reconstruction was the guarantee by the other four Governments, parties to the protocol, of a loan to Austria, and it might, therefore, be argued that the principal object of these four Governments in securing this undertaking on the part of Austria to preserve her "economic independence" (article 88 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain having referred simply to the independence of Austria, meaning political independence in the ordinary sense), was to secure and safeguard the interests of the guarantor Governments in the loan which they had guaranteed, and these words must not, therefore, be given a wider meaning than is necessary to give effect to the main object of the instrument. (b) Under Protocol No. 1 it is expressly provided that the undertaking "shall not prevent Austria from maintaining her freedom in the matter of customs tariffs and commercial or financial agreements and in general in all matters relating to her economic régime or her commercial relations," subject to the proviso that Austria "shall not violate her economic independence by granting to any State a special régime or exclusive advantages calculated to threaten this independence." It is the common practice of many continental countries to conclude commercial treaties in which they undertake not to levy upon imports from the territories of the other party to the treaty duties higher than those specified in a schedule to the treaty, and the effect of such treaties is to render it impossible for the country giving such an undertaking to raise its customs tariffs on such imports during the term of the treaty without the consent of the other party. In practice, the effect of this limitation on the country's freedom to raise its import duties will not be confined to imports from the other party to the treaty, because a number of other countries will probably be entitled to claim most-favoured-nation treatment under treaties with them. The situation, therefore, that a country is, by reason of its treaty obligations, unable to raise its import duties on several classes of goods without the consent of the other party to the treaty, is, therefore, a common one, and the limitation of Austria's freedom to alter her customs duties, without the consent of Germany, under the proposal is the same in kind, though it may be different in degree. For this reason it might be argued that this feature of the proposal, i.e., the inability of Austria to alter her customs tariffs without the consent of Germany during the term of the treaty, is not inconsistent with economic independence, and is further reserved to Austria under the protocol which provides that Austria shall have freedom in the matter of customs tariffs and commercial agreements. (c) The proposals contemplate that the future treaty between Germany and Austria shall be capable of denunciation at comparatively short notice. Austria will be free to terminate the customs union and regain full freedom of action as regards customs tariffs if she finds that the arrangements are prejudicial to her economic position. (d) The proposals do not create any financial or budgetary union between Germany and Austria; the customs proceeds are to be divided and the customs administrations of the two countries are kept distinct, each undertaking the collection of a portion of the customs. (e) The proposed arrangements are not "exclusive advantages" granted by Austria to Germany within the meaning of Protocol No. 1, in view of the fact that the proposals provide that both parties shall agree to enter into negotiations with any other State which expresses a desire to do so, for the conclusion of an agreement on similar lines.

6. Against the view that these proposals are compatible with the undertaking of Austria under Protocol No. 1, it may be argued: (i) That the object of the undertaking by Austria in Protocol No. 1, not to compromise by arrangements with any other State her "economic independence," was not merely to secure the interests of the guarantor Governments in respect of the loan. The guarantor Governments took advantage of this opportunity to reinforce and strengthen the existing obligations of Austria under article 88 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain. The text of the protocol shows the conviction of the guarantor Governments that political independence was endangered by economic dependence, and the real character of Protocol No. 1 is shown by article 1 of Protocol No. 3, in which the Austrian Government undertakes "to ask its Parliament to ratify the political declaration, signed by it, which is the subject of Protocol No. 1." (ii) That countries united in a customs union can no longer be said to be economically independent (separate). (This is an argument which perhaps in part depends upon the extent to which the economy of Austria is dependent upon and governed by customs tariffs.) (iii) That countries united by a customs union tend increasingly to become economically dependent upon each other, and that this is particularly the case in respect of a relatively small and economically weak country like Austria united with a large and economically powerful State like Germany. In practice, in the fixing of the common customs tariffs by negotiations, the German interests would always be preponderant. The words of the protocol are "which are calculated to threaten this independence" ("qu'elle ne pourra porter atteinte à son indépendance économique"). In this respect, however, the English text is perhaps stronger than the French text, which is the only authentic one.

7. The events which took place in the early half of the last century in connexion with proposals for a customs union between France and Belgium appear to merit being taken into consideration in regard to the present question. Article 7 of the Treaty of London of the 17th April, 1839, between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia and Russia on the one hand and the Netherlands on the other, was in the following terms:—

"La Belgique, dans les limites indiquées aux articles I, II et IV, formera un Etat indépendant et perpétuellement neutre. Elle sera tenue d'observer cette même neutralité envers tous les autres Etats."

The second Treaty of London of the same date and between the same five Powers of the first part and Belgium of the second part confirms the treaty with the Netherlands. The text of these treaties will be found in "State Papers," vol. 27 (1838-39), at pp. 990 and 1000. Article 7 is upon p. 994. At various times proposals for a customs union between France and Belgium in various forms were made, the proposals emanating in general from the French Government. It appears that all these proposals were strongly opposed by Great Britain, and Prussia in particular, and also by Russia and Austria, on the ground that they were inconsistent with the independence and neutrality of Belgium; which was guaranteed under article 7. Time has not yet permitted the preparation of a full memorandum dealing with these events, but such a memorandum is being prepared and will be transmitted to you with the least possible delay. In connexion with a project submitted in the year 1840, Sir Hamilton Seymour, His Majesty's Minister at Brussels, presented a note dated the 25th December, of which the following is an extract from what may be a French translation of the note:—

"Votre Excellence apprendra sans surprise que le bruit d'un projet d'union commerciale entre la Belgique et la France, qui a été discuté publiquement dans ce pays et sur lequel j'ai eu l'honneur de vous faire quelques observations à différentes reprises, a attiré l'attention sérieuse du Gouvernement anglais.

AUSTRIA.

"Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté est en effet bien persuadé qu'un arrangement qu'il considère comme devant avoir les plus funestes conséquences pour le pays, et qui sera sans doute regardé de la même manière par trois des autres Puissances qui sont intervenues dans les traités qui ont séparé la Hollande de la Belgique, ne recevra jamais la sanction du Cabinet belge. Il regarde cependant cette affaire sous un point de vue tellement important qu'il croit nécessaire d'en exprimer sa pensée clairement. Je n'ai pas besoin de vous faire observer qu'un des principaux points que les cinq Puissances se sont efforcées d'atteindre par l'arrangement qu'elles ont conclu avec la Belgique en 1831 et 1839 a été d'assurer l'indépendance politique de la Belgique comme Etat, et que c'est dans cette vue que son indépendance a été garantie par les cinq Puissances.

"Mais il est évident qu'une union commerciale entre la Belgique et la France tendrait à affaiblir l'indépendance politique de la Belgique, parce qu'une semblable union, contractée entre un petit et un grand Etat qui se lient étroitement, doit nécessairement avoir pour résultat de donner au plus puissant des deux une influence prépondérante sur l'autre.

"Il est inutile d'entrer dans les détails de la manière dont les relations commerciales et politiques de la Belgique deviendraient, par suite d'une telle union avec la France, soumises à la politique et à l'action de la France. Mais le Gouvernement de la Reine croit de son devoir, envers lui-même et envers la Belgique, de déclarer franchement qu'il regarde une semblable union comme étant incompatible avec les stipulations des traités de 1831 et 1839.

"Il me reste à vous exprimer l'espoir que la déclaration franche que j'ai reçu ordre de vous faire sera considérée par vous comme une preuve, non seulement de l'importance qu'attache le Gouvernement de la Reine à l'indépendance de ce pays, mais aussi de la franchise, avec l'absence de toute réserve, qu'il met à exprimer son désir de voir ses relations avec la Belgique continuer sans entraves."

It would seem extremely probable that, in connexion with the present controversy over the Austro-German proposals, reference will be made to these negotiations for a Franco-Belgian customs union, and to the opposition to such union by this country and by Prussia.

8. As the Law Officers will be aware, the Austro-German proposals seem likely to provoke an acute controversy, the French Government having already taken up the position that they are incompatible with Austria's treaty obligations. The Secretary of State has already suggested to the German and Austrian Governments that the question is one which should be referred to the Council of the League of Nations. It will be necessary for him to state the views of His Majesty's Government in Parliament. For these reasons, while realising that the question is not purely a legal one and depends in a great measure upon information which only economic experts can supply, Mr. Henderson is anxious to obtain your opinion at a very early date upon the question whether the Austrian-German proposals are consistent with the international obligations of Austria under the Treaty of Saint-Germain and the Protocols signed at Geneva on the 4th October, 1922. He would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

OWEN O'MALLEY.

List of Papers.

- (1) Treaty of Peace with Austria. [Cmd. 400 (Treaty 1565).]
- (2) Resolution of League of Nations and Protocols signed at Geneva, October 4, 1922. [Cmd. 1765 (Treaty 1660).]
- (3) Protocol communicated by German Ambassador and Austrian Minister, March 23, 1931. [C. 1879/673/3/1931.]

Report of the Attorney-General.

ARTICLE 1 of the 3rd Protocol of the 4th October, 1922, indicates that Austria's undertaking in the 1st Protocol is a political declaration. Moreover, the 3rd Protocol contains specific provisions (e.g., in article 5) for protecting the security of the creditors and the guarantor Powers. I think that the economic provisions of the 1st Protocol have a political object which may be distinct from the protection of the security, and that those provisions should not be read as limited to what is necessary for the protection of the security.

2. The independence of Austria referred to in article 88 of the Peace Treaty and in the first paragraph of Austria's undertaking in the 1st Protocol appears to be political independence.

But in the second paragraph the economic independence of Austria is mentioned, and "cette indépendance" in the last line (line 2 of p. 6) according to the natural construction of the sentence, relates to this economic independence and not to the political independence previously mentioned.

3. The immediate question is whether Austria has by the recently concluded agreement impaired or prejudiced ("porté atteinte à") her economic independence by granting to Germany a special régime or exclusive advantages calculated to threaten the economic independence of Austria. A question which may arise in the future and cannot conveniently be entirely separated from the immediate question, is whether Austria is likely in pursuance of the agreement to make a treaty which will have that effect. There may be a doubt whether at the present stage there has been any "octroi d'un régime spécial ou d'avantages exclusifs." But it is to be observed that the treaty is to be made first between Austria and Germany, and subsequently there may be negotiations for a similar treaty with any other country that desires such a treaty. Thus Germany has already a priority which gives her a privileged position, and might, perhaps, be said to give her exclusive advantages. It seems to me fairly clear that if the treaty were made, there would then be a special régime and exclusive advantages in favour of Germany, unless and until they were generalised by the accession of other countries.

4. The most difficult question is whether the special régime and exclusive advantages conferred upon Germany by this agreement, or likely to be conferred upon her by the proposed treaty, are calculated to threaten the economic independence of Austria. That is partly a question for economists, but also may depend partly upon legal considerations and I will give my opinion upon it as requested.

5. This agreement carefully preserves the political sovereignty of Austria in all respects (articles 1 (1), 5 (1), 6 (1), 9 (1) (3), 11 (3), 12 (2)). If economic independence means no more than political sovereignty in regard to economic policy, I think it is and will be unimpaired by the agreement or proposed treaty. But since the protocol contemplates that economic independence may be impaired by granting to another State a special régime or exclusive advantages (which would not naturally involve any diminution of sovereignty), I think the phrase "economic independence" must have a wider meaning.

6. I think the phrase "economic independence" cannot be paraphrased adequately as meaning either "non-subordination" or "separation": those words would be more appropriate as explanatory of political independence. It is difficult to conceive an economically subordinate country, unless it were actually tributary: and it is difficult to find much meaning in the phrase "economically separate countries."

I think a better paraphrase would be "effective liberty of action in economic policy."

I think economic independence in that sense implies a power to bind oneself by agreements, and the making of such agreements is an exercise of economic freedom. Austria's economic independence would not be impaired by making ordinary commercial or tariff treaties.

But I think it not improbable that the proposed treaty between Austria and Germany might have the eventual effect of rendering Austria economically dependent upon Germany in the sense that, while Austria would remain legally free to take such action as she chose in the economic sphere, it would, for commercial and other practical reasons, become impossible for her to act otherwise than in accordance with the wishes of Germany or to sever the partnership without disastrous consequences to herself. Much would depend upon the part which customs play in the national economy and internal administration and commercial life of Austria. The immediate effect of the treaty would be to constitute an Austro-German free trade area enclosed by a tariff wall. That position would probably continue for three years or more, and it might well be that no similar treaty would be concluded with any other country. In the meantime, Austria's external markets would be increasingly found in Germany, and her external supplies would be increasingly obtained from Germany, since the tariff arrangement would tend to deflect Austria's trade with other countries into Germany. Eventually, Austria might become a part of the economic system of Germany as fully as Florida is part of the economic system of the United States of America, or Wales is part of the economic system of Great Britain, and might find herself in a position in which she could not sever the partnership without dislocating her industrial and commercial organisation.

1931

6

GENERAL.

7. These are conceivable consequences of the proposed treaty. Whether such consequences are or not likely to ensue is not a question upon which a lawyer as such can express an opinion.

A lawyer can merely express his view as to the meaning of the term "economic independence."

It is for economists to determine what consequences would in all probability follow from the proposed treaty, and whether the economic independence of Austria, in the sense in which I have explained this phrase, would be threatened.

Upon the hypothesis that the economists would answer this question in the affirmative, I express my opinion that the proposed treaty probably would be a breach by Austria of her undertaking in the 1st Protocol of 1922.

8. The attitude of the Powers to the proposed customs union between France and Belgium after the Treaty of London of 1839, appears to afford general support to my view as expressed above, but the question is narrower in this case, because the protocol expressly allows to Austria freedom in the matter of customs tariffs and commercial or financial agreements, subject only to the proviso.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.

Law Officers' Department,
March 31, 1931.

GENERAL.

[W 11474/5/98/1931]

No. 1^A.

[Colonial Office.]

[January 19, 1931.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, December 23, 1930.

I AM directed by Lord Passfield to refer to Mr. Bowker's letter of the 6th August, 1930, forwarding an opinion* of the Attorney-General on a question which arose as to the position of Palestine in relation to the Colonial Development Act, 1929, and the Palestine mandate.

2. The question then referred to you was—

Whether, if a loan was made to the Government of Palestine under Section 1 (1) of the Act on the condition (Section 1 (2)) that material, &c., to be bought with the money so advanced should be purchased in the United Kingdom wherever possible, there is anything in article 18 of the Palestine mandate which would render it a breach of the obligations of His Majesty's Government as a mandatory that a loan should be accepted by the Palestine Government on this condition.

* Confidential, 13525, p. 24.

Loans or grants to mandated territories under Colonial Development Act, 1929: as to attaching conditions for purchase of materials, &c., in United Kingdom.

GENERAL.

7

3. The Attorney-General expressed the opinion that, if it was in the interests of Palestine to borrow money at the rate of interest specified and subject to the condition mentioned above, the proposal would not fall within the prohibition of article 18 of the mandate. But he considered it essential that the condition should be made one of the express terms upon which the loan was granted, and that it should be made clear that it was entirely for the Palestine Government to make up their minds whether they desired to accept the loan on these terms.

4. The further question has now arisen as to the position of the other mandated territories (viz., Tanganyika Territory, Togoland, and the Cameroons) in a similar respect. A copy of Command Paper 1794, containing the texts of the mandates for these three territories, is enclosed for convenience of reference and for return in due course; your attention is invited to article 7 of the East Africa (i.e., Tanganyika Territory) mandate (p. 20), and article 6 of each of the other two mandates (p. 3 and p. 11). It will be observed that the terms of all these articles are identical. I am to enquire whether in your view the opinion of the Attorney-General regarding Palestine would apply equally to the three territories mentioned above in this paragraph, in the event of it being decided to make a loan under Section 1 (1) of the Colonial Development Act to the Government responsible for the administration of any one of them, viz., the Government of Tanganyika Territory, the Government of the Gold Coast in respect of Togoland, or the Government of Nigeria in respect of the Cameroons.

5. I am also to enquire whether the said opinion may be taken as being equally applicable, mutatis mutandis, to the purchase of materials in the United Kingdom with moneys advanced as a free grant from the Colonial Development Fund to the Government of any of the following four territories, viz., Palestine, Tanganyika Territory, Gold Coast in respect of Togoland, or Nigeria in respect of the Cameroons.

6. It will be seen that the previous reference regarding the making of a loan to the Palestine Government and the preceding paragraph of the present reference deal only with the purchase of materials in the United Kingdom with moneys advanced from the Colonial Development Fund whether by way of loan or grant. Frequently, however, assistance given from the fund (whether loan or grant) represents only a portion of the total cost of a scheme of development, and this measure of assistance is given on the condition that the balance of the cost of the scheme shall be met from the funds of the local Government concerned. In such cases it is usually impossible to say precisely what items of expenditure are properly to be regarded as chargeable to the Colonial Development Fund contribution and what as properly chargeable to local funds. I am, therefore, further to enquire whether it would be contrary to the articles of the mandates previously quoted to make it a condition of any such loan or grant that materials, &c., to be bought for the purpose of a scheme towards which any measure of assistance whatever is being given from the fund shall be bought in the United Kingdom wherever possible, irrespective of whether such purchases are regarded as being actually met from the moneys advanced from the fund or from the moneys contributed by the local Government (from whatever source they are found).

7. It may be convenient to summarise briefly the questions under reference to you. They concern the purchase of materials in the United Kingdom:—

- (i) With moneys advanced on loan from the Colonial Development Fund to the Governments of Tanganyika Territory, Gold Coast in respect of Togoland, and Nigeria in respect of the Cameroons.
- (ii) With moneys advanced as free grants from the Colonial Development Fund to the Governments mentioned in paragraph 5 above.
- (iii) With moneys spent by any of the Governments mentioned in paragraph 5 above upon a scheme of development towards which assistance is being given from the fund, irrespective of the actual source of such moneys.

I am, &c.

R. V. VERNON.

GENERAL.

Enclosure.

Mandates for Tanganyika Territory, Togoland and Cameroons.

[Cmd. 1794 (Parly. 5160).]

Report.

As the material portions of the three mandates in question are similar in their terms, we deal with the East Africa mandate in the observations that follow.

Article 7 of this mandate, in so far as it is material to the questions submitted, is in the following terms:—

"The mandatory shall ensure to all nationals of States members of the League of Nations, on the same footing as to his own nationals, . . . complete economic, commercial and industrial equality; provided that the mandatory shall be free to organise essential public works and services on such terms and conditions as he thinks just."

This article must be read together with the more general provisions of the whole mandate, and especially article 3, the material portion of which is as follows:—

The mandatory shall undertake to promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of the inhabitants. The mandatory shall have full powers of legislation and administration.

It is clear in our opinion from the general tenor of the whole mandate that the primary consideration of any administrative act by the mandatory must be the well-being and social progress of the inhabitants of the mandated territory. At the same time the administration must be such as to give equal opportunities in all commercial and industrial matters to the nationals of all States members of the League of Nations.

It is important to notice that article 7 is positive in its form and calls for positive action by the mandatory to ensure equality and not merely negative action to see that no inequality is brought about. There is, however, the proviso to the second paragraph of this article which from its position in the article is in our opinion intended to qualify the duty of the mandatory as to equality of treatment in the case of the organisation of essential public works and services. In such cases the mandatory is entitled to organise the works and services on such terms and conditions as he thinks just even though these terms and conditions may lead to inequality of treatment between nationals of different States. This provision was no doubt inserted in order that where there existed undertakers of public works and services in the mandated territory or in a neighbouring territory belonging to the mandatory, he might entrust the new public works and services in the mandated territory to such undertakers, whatever their nationality. In our opinion, the "organisation" of public works and services would include amongst other things the construction of public works and plant for public services. We presume that the moneys dealt with in the questions submitted to us would all of them be expended upon "essential public works and services" within the mandated territory.

The general principles as to the administration of the territory by the mandatory in respect of such essential public works and services are therefore as follows:—

- (1) It must be for the well-being and social progress of the inhabitants.
- (2) It must be on such terms and conditions as the mandatory thinks just.
- (3) Unless there is some reason to the contrary under (2), it must be so carried out as to ensure complete commercial and industrial equality to all nationals of States members of the League of Nations.

In applying these general principles the mandatory must, of course, consider the matters involved from the point of view of the mandated territory and its inhabitants, and not from the point of view of the inhabitants of the country of the mandatory. We turn now to the specific questions submitted to us.

- (1) If it is necessary for the mandated territory to obtain a loan, and if it is to the pecuniary advantage of the mandated territory to obtain these loans with conditions as to the purchase of materials in this country attached to them, then it is obviously just that the conditions should be carried out. Unless there is some alternative proposal for a loan upon more favourable terms from other quarters, or unless there is some reason why the condition is unduly onerous, it would in our opinion prima facie be to the advantage of the mandated territory to accept the loan and to carry out the conditions attached to it. It must be borne in mind in deciding whether the mandated territory is advantaged by such a loan that enhanced price of materials may be so great as to offset the advantage in reduced interest charges, and this is one of the matters that must be considered in arriving at a conclusion as to whether the mandated territory obtains any pecuniary advantage by obtaining a loan from the Colonial Development Fund.

GENERAL.

A great difficulty would no doubt arise if some other country or combine of manufacturers (e.g., Germany) were to offer a loan on better terms with a condition attached that all purchases of materials should be made in some other country (e.g., Germany). In this event it would in our opinion be almost impossible for the mandatory to advise the Administration to refuse such an offer once the offer of the mandatory to lend money on similar conditions had been justified on the basis above set out.

We mention this aspect of the matter as it is suggested that questions may be raised internationally in respect of the condition attached to the loan from the Colonial Development Fund, and great care will be required in justifying the acts of the mandatory in such a way as to preclude the possibility of such an offer from another country or group of foreign manufacturers.

(2) In the case of free grants from the Colonial Development Fund no difficulties can arise in our opinion. As the money is a free gift to the mandated territory, it must in our opinion obviously be to the advantage of the territory unless the conditions attached are so onerous as to make the gift valueless.

(3) This case is in our opinion the most difficult and must to a considerable extent depend upon the precise facts, more especially upon the proportion which the loan from the fund bears to the total expenditure to be undertaken.

In cases where the scheme of development could not be undertaken even in a modified form without a loan, the considerations would in our opinion be somewhat similar to those under (1) above, although it would be far more difficult to demonstrate that the condition as to expenditure in this country of moneys not loaned was a genuine condition of the loan, and was not merely an attempt to get round the provisions as to equality of treatment in article 7 of the mandate. It would in our opinion be dangerous and unwise to attach any such condition as to the expenditure of moneys not loaned unless the loan were substantially of the whole of the moneys to be expended.

Section 1 (2) of the Colonial Development Act, 1929, gives power to the Government, to whom loans or grants are made, to apply them "either directly or through any person or body of persons." Under this section, therefore, the Governments of the mandated territories could apply the loan through undertakers or contractors. Under the proviso to paragraph 2 of article 7 of the mandate the mandatory is free to organise essential public works and services on such terms and conditions as he thinks just. It would therefore be possible to arrange for the construction or organisation of public works and services through an undertaker or contractor and for the undertaker or contractor to apply the loans. If such undertaker or contractor purchased all his materials in this country, it would, we think, be difficult for anyone to question the transaction or to raise the question of inequality of treatment, as the whole transaction would come under the proviso of paragraph 2 of article 7, and so would be taken out of the main words of that paragraph.

The words of article 7 differ so considerably from the words of article 18 of the Palestine mandate that we have thought it better to deal with the whole matter afresh rather than go into a detailed comparison of the two articles in order to see whether in the result the same principle applies in the present cases as applied in the case of Palestine.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.
R. STAFFORD CRIPPS.

Law Officers' Department,
January 19, 1931.

[For No. 1^B, see p. 28.]

1931

10

GENERAL.

[U 407/14/750]

No. 2.

[June 3, 1931.]

*Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.*Heading of confidential
official documents.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, May 15, 1931.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Henderson, to request the favour of your advice on the following matter:—

2. At present all confidential documents printed for His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are headed: "This Document is the Property of His Britannic Majesty's Government." This practice is understood to have been introduced in 1892 by an administrative decision of the then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Rosebery) at a time when the Foreign Office had occasion to consider the position as regards the retention by public servants upon retirement of documents supplied to them in the course of their official duties. At present the object of the practice may be regarded as twofold: (1) to indicate to the recipients that the document in question is an official one and will not become their private property, and to impress upon them the necessity of its careful custody; (2) to facilitate, so far as possible, proof of the offence in the event of it becoming necessary to take proceedings in relation to the document in question under the Official Secrets Acts.

3. It has, however, been pointed out that the phrase in question is probably inaccurate as a statement of law, since "His Britannic Majesty's Government" is not an entity known to the law as one in which property can be legally vested. The correct statement would appear to be that the document is the property of His Majesty.

4. Moreover, there was, as you are aware, considerable discussion at the recent Imperial Conference as to the use of the term "His Britannic Majesty" as a convenient abbreviation of the King's full title for treaty and other purposes. Certain Dominions raised, and refused to withdraw, objections to the use of the term in relation to matters with which they were concerned, on the ground that the word "Britannic" implied an exclusive connexion with the United Kingdom and could not properly be employed of His Majesty in relation to the Empire as a whole or in relation to any Dominion. In support of this view, they adduced the phrase now under consideration, arguing that, since the Government to which the document belonged was certainly the Government of the United Kingdom and no other, the use of the phrase showed that the Government of the United Kingdom regarded the phrase "His Britannic Majesty's Government" as denoting themselves and no other of His Majesty's Governments. To this argument it was difficult to find a convincing reply, and, in view of the desirability of ultimately securing acceptance of the use of the phrase "His Britannic Majesty," whether in connexion with the Empire as a whole, the United Kingdom or any one of the Dominions, it may well be desirable to make a change in the practice which leads to misconstructions of the nature indicated above. You will appreciate that it is not a question of any of the Dominions asking for such a change; the Dominions who used the argument in question would doubtless prefer that the present practice should continue; the object of any change would be solely to deprive those Dominions of an argument which at present they are in a position to use with some effect.

5. In these circumstances, it is proposed, as the result of discussion between the Departments concerned, to submit to the Cabinet the question of the desirability of making a change in the existing practice. But, before doing so, it is desired to obtain your opinion as to the phrase which, in the event of a change being made, should be substituted for that now in use.

6. From the point of view of possible proceedings under the Official Secrets Acts, there would seem to be considerable advantages in using the phrase "Official Document," since this is the phrase employed, without definition, in Section 1 (2) of the Official Secrets Act, 1920, which is the provision under which proceedings in relation to such documents would most probably be taken. This being so, and in view of the considerations mentioned in paragraph 3 above, it is suggested that the most convenient phrase to employ would be "Official Document. This Document is the Property of His Majesty."

GENERAL.

11

7. I am accordingly to request you to be good enough to favour Mr. Henderson with your opinion as to whether, in the event of its being decided to make a change, the phrase suggested in the preceding paragraph could properly be adopted, or whether there is any alternative phrase which would, in your opinion, be preferable.

I have, &c.

PERCY A. KOPPEL.

Report.

We are of the opinion that the statement that a document is the property of His Majesty is more accurate in law than the statement that it is the property of His Majesty's Government. We think that, from the point of view of possible proceedings under the Official Secrets Acts, the words "Secret and Official" would be the most satisfactory to employ. We are therefore of opinion that the most convenient phrase to employ would be: "Secret and Official. This Document is the Property of His Majesty."

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.

R. STAFFORD CRIPPS.

*Law Officers' Department,
June 3, 1931.*

[W 11573/11082/50/1931]

No. 2^d.

[Board of Trade.]

[September 1931.]

Memorandum by the Attorney-General.

I HAVE considered whether the policy of preventing or restricting direct prohibition of import would or would not bring us in conflict with our existing treaties. The two treaties to be considered are: (1) The Treaty with Germany of the 2nd December, 1924; and (2) the International Convention of the 8th November, 1927.

It is to be observed that, although the first treaty only applies to Germany, yet under the "most-favoured-nation" clause other nations would be able to object unless prohibitions applied equally to Germany. If, therefore, we are prevented by the German treaty, we are effectively prevented from prohibition against all countries. In my view, the direct prohibition of import with the object of restoring the balance of trade would be a breach of the German treaty. The only words under which such prohibition could be justified would be the words "public safety," and I do not think that these words could be construed as having any such wide meaning as would be necessary to support the direct prohibition. It will be observed that, in article 5 of the international treaty, an express exception is made authorising prohibition of importation in extraordinary and abnormal circumstances, and this article is inserted notwithstanding the fact that article 4 has already authorised prohibition relating to "public security," which phrase I cannot distinguish from "public safety." Moreover, the interchange of notes attached to the German treaty appears to indicate that the phrase "public safety" therein contained is to have a narrow, and not a wide, construction. It will be observed that I have throughout used the phrase "direct prohibition of import." I desire to make it plain that I do not think that the treaties in any way prevent our putting on an import duty on any particular article, even although this duty was at such a rate as to amount, in fact, to a prohibition.

For example, though there would, in fact, be no distinction between putting a duty of 1,000 per cent. and prohibiting importation, the former method, as a matter of law, would be in accord with the treaty, the latter method would not.

